Machel Speech

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 28 Nov 80 pp 3-4

[Excerpts] The president of the FRELIMO Party and president of the People's Republic of Mozambique, Samora Moises Machel, inaugurated the Second Conference on the Coordination of Development in Southern Africa (SADCC-II) at the military club in Maputo with a major address which was followed attentively by all those present. In his speech he spoke of various aspects connected to the strategy approved by nine countries in this African region with a view to being able jointly to overcome the underdevelopment which characterizes them. The following is the text of his address.

"Mr President, heads of national delegations and international organizations, and delegates:

It is with satisfaction that the People's Republic of Mozambique welcomes the second cooperation conference of Southern African nations here in Maputo.

Nine countries in which the aftereffects of colonial domination still make themselves felt today in their economic backwardness are present at this conference.

Representatives of the five continents, representatives of countries with different levels of development, and international economic and financial organizations are represented at this conference.

All here, in the diversity of their economic systems, are seeking to establish a joint platform for concrete action with a view to promoting the development of this zone of Africa.

To all the delegates we express the warm welcome of the People's Republic of Mozambique.

The holding of meetings and conferences on regional cooperation is a part of a qualitatively new stage in Southern Africa. It is the result of the development of the national liberation struggle process in our zone, which has already entered into its final phase. Apart from the liberation of Namibia and the elimination of Apartheid in South Africa, the basic question posed now has to do with the rapid development of the countries in Southern Africa--development allowing the advancement of the material and social well-being of the peoples.

In our countries we encounter the blatant contradiction between the dimensions of the resources we have and the economic lag which characterizes us.

Our countries are not poor. Their wealth has been kept in a latent state, wasted or utilized without benefit to our peoples.

One of the most important concentrations of natural resources in the world is to be found in Southern Africa.

All of this wealth still remains idle or is being wasted, like the water of the rivers which empty into the sea without generating energy or irrigating the fields. All of this potential wealth makes the acute state of underdevelopment to which colonial domination doomed our countries still more dramatic and inconsistent.

The effects of colonial domination are still to be found in our countries.

The exploitation and the plundering to which we were subjected by the colonial powers caused grave distortions and deformations in the economies of our countries.

These are seen in the fact that our economies are characterized by real per capita yields which are among the lowest in the world, despite the immense wealth which our countries possess.

The economies of the countries in Southern Africa were conceived and organized as a function of South Africa.

South Africa was transformed into the focal center of the zone. The highway and railroad networks converged upon it. The surplus manpower from the countries in the region, paid for at laughable prices and subject to an inhuman and racist regime, were channeled toward it. South Africa became the supply center for raw materials, equipment and services for these subordinate industries existing in the region.

Through this process, the beginnings of which go back to the organization of the system of colonial exploitation at the end of the last century, our countries were subordinated to South Africa and economically chained to the dungeons of Apartheid. This dependence represented a basic condition leading to the situation of underdevelopment in which our countries find themselves.

The struggle we are waging to reduce our dependence, perticularly on South Africa, is an integral and essential part of the struggle for the right of our peoples to the development which will enable them to enjoy the fruits of their labor.

On the other hand, the dependence of our countries on South Africa was seen as a tool for the strengthening and defense of the Apartheid regime, which has been condemned by the entire international community.

The struggle for the real economic independence of the nine countries is not a closed process. It comes within the general struggle of mankind for political liberation, for the economic and social emancipation of the peoples. Consolidating the independence of the free countries in the region means weaking the racist regime and creating the conditions enabling the peoples still under domination to participate fully in this grandiose project.

As soon as Namibia is independent and Apartheid has been liquidated in South Africa, these countries can with every right benefit from the advantages of the regional cooperation we will establish.

The struggle for the development of the natural resources of our zone to the benefit of our peoples is not directed against any country or group of countries. It is not in conflict with any of the other regional and interregional institutions in existence. The underdevelopment in which Southern Africa finds itself is the common enemy.

In order to develop we must first of all be able to rely on our own ability and experience. To this end it is essential for us to make an inventory of the abilities and experience of each of our nine countries in all sectors of activity, so that we can benefit therefrom in our cooperation.

We can rely on the participation of all the countries and organizations on the basis of mutual and advantageous cooperation, consistent with noninterference and respect for the right of each people to its independent development.

In this campaign to raise the standard of living of our people, we want modern technology, the technology of the 20th century, the technology enriched by the advances of science in the era in which we live. We want to train technicians who are highly skilled and competent.

We also want to promote a healthy and real cooperation which will make possible the rapid and stable growth of our economies.

Mr President, Delegates:

The dimensions of the tasks we are setting for ourselves in order to achieve progress, self-sufficiency and development in this sector of mankind represent a challenge which our peoples are determined to meet.

The effects of the world situation we are experiencing today are reflected in our economies, and they represent a threat to the implementation of our development strategy. World inflation, which affects our economies in general, is felt in particularly serious form in the economically backward countries.

The dizzying rise in prices, those of equipment and oil in particular, without a corresponding increase in the price of the raw materials we produce, has seriously aggravated the economic situation of the countries in the process of development and can be a factor contributing to discord.

The present situation in this sector requires that we seek ways of fully utilizing the resources existing in our countries. Specifically in the energy sector, water resources, if properly used, will make it possible to supply a large part of the energy necessary for the development of our regional programs.

The coordination and development of the systems of transportation and communications in our zone is a crucial aspect of regional cooperation.

All of the countries in the zone will benefit from the development of the transportation and communications sector because of its importance to cooperation, to the normal shipment of raw materials, trade in products among the countries in the region and between them and foreign countries. The developed countries, which are interested in seeing trade exchange with our zone develop in rapid, efficient fashion and at competitive prices, will also benefit from it.

The appointment of the Southern African Transportation and Communications Commission is a reflection of the importance we assign to the coordination of the transportation and communications systems, which are indispensable to the rational use of the existing infrastructures and the implementation of new projects.

In the spirit of economic cooperation and mutual aid which characterizes the actions of the nine countries in the zone, we believe that the coastal countries should assume the responsibility for creating the conditions necessary to enable their ports to serve as a platform for shipping products abroad and to the interior.

It is necessary, then, that the capacity of the existing infrastructures be increased and that others be established so that they will correspond to the level of economic and trade development foreseen.

The question of cadres is a basic one for the development of our countries.

Therefore it is necessary that broad programs for the training of the cadres essential to the realization and the continuity of all our projects be undertaken.

Mr President:

We are meeting together at this conference because the development of Southern Africa benefits the world's economy. The economic development of the countries of Southern Africa makes a contribution to the development of mankind.

Within the framework of the complementary economic roles of the countries in this zone, we want to develop industry, establish basic industry and mechanize agriculture. We do not want to be eternally just raw material suppliers.

We want to promote the development of economic and trade relations within the context of bilateral or multilateral cooperation. We are in a position to move ahead with viable projects on the basis of which we will obtain mutual benefit.

The advance of the economic area covered by the nine free countries in the region will create more favorable market conditions for investment on a more attractive economic scale.

The economic area to which we refer is not closed. There are nine nations today. In the future certainly more countries will participate. Thus we will be contributing to cooperation on a continental scale.

This is a question of an experiment involving countries with unequal levels of development, and countries with different social systems, seeking to establish a platform for cooperation advantageous to all the participating parties.

Mr President:

This conference is of great signifincance to the People's Republic of Mozambique.

Mozambique is a country building socialism, working to triumph over the underdevelopment inherited after centuries of colonial exploitation and aggravated by ten years of colonial war.

We value this conference and the cooperation it seeks to build, for it evidences the desire of all our countries to create progress, to establish the basis for a common and mutually advantageous effort in the struggle for economic and social development.

We believe in cooperation on the basis of equality of interests and mutual advantages. Therefore we do not identify cooperation with aid.

We are prepared to launch and develop specific cooperative action in various sectors with the countries and organizations which respect our sovereignty and independence, our right to decide our own future for ourselves.

The programs which will be analyzed by this conference are bold. They are programs which seek to break out of underdevelopment in Southern Africa.

Our countries are determined to triumph over all difficulties, all obstacles in the path of the implementation of their legitimate aspirations for peace and progress. They are determined to advance along the path of cooperation and development.

It is our hope that this conference will represent a significant new step in the process of transforming international economic relations.

We believe that it can demonstrate the viability of establishing specific mechanisms for cooperation on the basis of equality and mutual benefits among countries and international organizations, independent of their political and economic systems and their state of development.

We will make our conference an important step toward the success of the joint effort involving our capacities and potential.

This conference should then make a positive contribution to the more general effort to establish a new, just and equitable economic order.

It is in this spirit that we reiterate our welcome to all the delegates and we wish good work and the greatest success for the second cooperation conference of the countries in Southern Africa.

The struggle continues!

Many thanks."

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 26 Nov 80 p 3

[Article by Antonio Makwala: "A Fading Smile"]

[Text] While the countries participating in the Conference on the Coordination of Development in Southern Africa continue their work to establish some future planning in Maputo, Pretoria is watching with a mixture of sarcasm and apprehension.

Sarcasm, in truth, because the economies of the Southern African countries are so dependent on South Africa and so fragmented that from the heights of the throne of regional economic power in South Africa the present is seen as unchangeable. There is apprehension, because the ambitious desires of Southern Africa for economic liberation are based on the recent political triumph in Zimbabwe. The cohesion of the Front Line State, which at a given point seemed so fragile and so near the breaking point which South Africa sought so assiduously to provoke, is too real an item on the political agenda in Southern Africa for the leaders in Pretoria to watch the struggle which Southern Africa is waging in the economic sector entirely calmly.

The strategic development approved by the SADCC countries on 1 April of this year in Lusaka has two aspects: regional economic integration and joint action to insure international support of the development projects. At the beginning this was the last thing which could raise any eyebrows in Pretoria, because this would involve great involvement in Southern African countries on the part of the West, in particular the member nations of the EEC. This could mean a change in the exclusivity of the extensive investments in South Africa, which have in significant fashion represented complicity in the perpetuation of the Apartheid system throughout the successive governments of the Nationalist Party.

If Great Britain, France, Italy and other EEC countries eventually make their money and technical capacity available to the countries which are neighbors of South Africa, this precisely could become a political and economic alternative for their major investment policies in South Africa. Certainly this will mean more coming from Europe and less from South Africa, thus leaving the path open for political pressures on Pretoria from the West.

Speaking at a joint session of the Development Committee of the European Parliament in Brussels recently, President Quett Masire of Botswana, who is also president of the SADCC, put it rather clearly when he said that European development in the countries with majority regimes in Southern Africa "represents a constructive contribution to changing the Republic of South Africa." He added: "Once this change (in South Africa) has occurred, a long process will begin. Massive support and an effort in the direction of independent economic development in the countries with majority regimes in Southern Africa is a basic element in this process."

Without a doubt the money and the technical capacity of the West is not the result of angelic purity or charity, nor is this aid any less problematical for the independent development of the nations than the whip was in the colonial period prior to independence. But this is a problem which the countries affected must resolve in accordance with their own development philosophies. What concerns South Africa is the possibility that the West will abandon South African shores for a more enduring alternative for Western capital and political influence.

And if an indicative setting is needed, one can look precisely at Giscard D'Estaing's plans in the Middle East.

Yes, it is true, South Africa is still smiling, but if one looks closely one will see that the smile is fading.

WESTERN PRESS 'MISINFORMATION' ATTEMPTS DENOUNCED

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 5 Nov 80 pp 1, 12

[Editorial: "The Semantics of Misinformation"]

[Text] Because it is an irreversible process, as the elimination of the last bastions of colonialism in Africa becomes inevitable, the imperialists, through their powerful misinformation and propaganda machine, are intensifying maneuvers to divert international public opinion from an examination and evaluation of the uncheckable progress of the National Liberation Movements.

To achieve this end, the professional misinformers have adopted a method of confusing aggressor with victim, occupiers with occupied, directly involved parties with those who, because of their internationalist mission and ideals of freedom, unconditionally support the struggles of peoples who are still oppressed and their respective vanguards.

The current use of this particular tactic, which is as old as imperialism itself, is a significant act of desperation; the Western media have determined to "distract" everyone and, at the same time, even to "humanize" the vile apartheid regime, placing it in the same category as another aggressive and occupying regime: Morocco.

On close examination, although the two regimes practice a policy of occupation and repression, the difference between them, reflected in the system in effect in the respective countries, absolutely cannot be ignored, at the risk of falling in with the game of considering the Botha clique as a "normal" regime, to be condemned only for its illegal occupation of Namibian territory. All the world knows that the reality is much more cruel.

This explains the carefully-designed semantic aberration that a certain foreign newspaper, widely known for its "mission," has been publishing regarding the liberation struggles of the brother peoples of Namibia and the Sahara.

In fact, at a time when the international community, through the United Nations, is intensifying efforts to find a peaceful solution for these African issues, the "talking vultures" of the West would have it believed that, at this very moment, the African countries whose geographic location and ideological option leads them to provide the most direct support for these struggles have decided to betray their own principles.

According to this press, Angola and Algeria, weary of their willing sacrifices in their unconditional and multifaceted support to SWAPO, the ANC and the POLISARIO Front, have decided to enter into direct negotiations with Botha's South Africa and the Morocco of King Hassan II, the very regimes that oppress the Namibian, South African and Saharan peoples, and to assume the role of parties directly involved in the resolution of the conflicts at issue.

The logical interpretation intended in these reports is that Angola and Algeria have betrayed their own principles and the just aspirations of their brother peoples in struggle.

This misinterpretation is all the more deliberate, considering that the reactionary forces in the field, from the actual oppressors to the African puppet regimes and the Western powers supporting them, recently suffered a major defeat in the UN General Assembly, which rejected the Moroccan-Senegalese proposal for the Sahara and demanded that Rabat withdraw its troops from occupied Saharan territory. Another setback was the UN secretary general's reiteration of his intent to go ahead on discussions between SWAPO, South Africa, a Western contact group and the Front Line countries, with the valuable addition of the Angolan proposal to create a demilitarized zone.

Another factor of concern to the Western powers cannot be ignored: the measures that have been recommended, some of which have already been carried out by certain African countries, such as Nigeria, which are prepared to use every weapon that might "enlighten" certain powers. The South African Radio has recently begun to mention--arrogantly, but with a certain amount of concern--the measures announced by the Lagos government regarding the use of petroleum as a means to apply pressure, through the multinationals, to cut off support to South Africa.

Thus the activity of a certain foreign press is understandable; it has no argument to convince anyone of the need to "defend the West...in Africa."

It is even more understandable when we see who is most avidly raising the spectre of "betrayal" of the part of Angola and Algeria, as the nationalized press, led by ANOP [Portuguese News Agency] is doing in Carneiro's Portugal.

The only reply to this moribund raving is a practical reaffirmation of support by the progressive African peoples and all the peace-loving forces for the peoples in struggle in Africa, Asia and Latin America. They all have the same enemy: imperialism.

The progressive press in the countries where the imperialist press is headquartered also has an important role to play in enlightening public opinion about the true progress of the liberation process there where opression and domination still exist.

The sharpening of the contradictions between the proletariat and the bourgeoisie is characteristic of the present stage of development of the world's productive forces, meaning that any and every struggle between exploiter and exploited becomes a universal struggle, and that all the progressive voices have an obligation to combat the misinformation and confusion of anti-popular verbalism.

REVIEW OF PARTICIPATION, ACCOMPLISHMENTS IN LABOR SECTOR

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 5 Nov 80 p 4

> [Text] Day by day, Angola's workers are more conscientiously carrying out the tasks of national reconstruction. Noteworthy in this context is the mobilizing role of Angola's union federation in motivating and expanding the professional awareness of each worker.

The effective engagement of the workers in the struggle to implement party decisions and directives is seen in various areas of the nation's life. On 11 November 1980, the Angolan people will celebrate the fifth anniversary of their independence. In 1975, the MPLA (then a movement) appealed to all the people to rebuild the country. The working class has answered that appeal with great determination.

Since independence, the UNTA (National Union of Angolan Workers) has already organized three socialist emulation plans. The first one was carried out in 40 production units. The second one was effected in 80 companies, and the current, more general, plan takes in 375 work centers. About 100,000 workers are engaged in this plan, which has an important place in strengthening the nation's economy.

The workers are facing various problems in performing their jobs, such as the shortage of raw materials, accessories and spare parts and problems with energy and fuel. Even so, all this has not entirely prevented them from carrying out their task of increasing production. Despite countless shortages, during the second stage of socialist emulation, starting in June, production averaged 87.17 percent of the goals set by the UNTA, as against 81.13 percent in the first phase.

The third emulation plan was initiated in February of this year. In August, 170 workers were considered outstanding, and 2,537 workers and 92 companies distinguished themselves, as well. In the same month, 20,390 workers performed 220 days of voluntary labor.

The "Agostinho Neto Column," in which a large number of workers are enrolled, recently rebuilt the city of Mongua, which had been destroyed by the South African racists. This action was of great significance in improving professional awareness and national unity. The column is constituted by employees of companies in various provinces of the country, who are imbued with the spirit of national reconstruction.

All Areas Reflect Reconstruction Spirit

The spirit of reconstruction is reflected in all areas of the nation's life. The Angolan Government is constantly extending the campaign to eliminate or reduce illiteracy. Thus the first training seminar for instructors in the national dialects began on 13 October in Luanda. The seminar marks a new phase in the struggle against illiteracy. In the provinces, the 23 participants will insure the success of important pilot projects in the Kikongo, Kimbundo, Umbunda, Chokue, Mbunda and Kwanyama dialects, for which standard transcriptions were recently made official.

The workers' participation is also noteworthy in the fish processing industry. Production of dried and semi-cured fish received special mention in the recommendations of the first MPLA congress, because fresh and frozen fish are not available to communities in the interior.

Production in this sector increased from 19,000 tons in 1977 to about 23,000 tons in 1979. Recovery has been slow. This year, production reached 54 percent of the production in 1973. In the first half of this year, the increase over the same period in previous years was 41 percent of the 1973 levels. [Sentence as published]. These were the results registered in this sector.

The fishing sector has about 20,000 workers, 30 percent more than in 1976, the year of its reactivation, and 67 percent of the number employed in the colonial period. Some 52 percent are engaged in fishing and ship repairs; 74 percent of the workers are linked to state companies, 7.5 percent are in the private sector, 1.2 percent are in cooperatives and the remaining workers are self-employed. There are about 5,000 manual fishermen, of whom only 7 percent are organized in cooperatives.

The sector is striving to carry out the directives of the first congress. Thus two centers have been created: a retraining center in Luanda, and a center for professional training in Mocamenes. The Ministry of Education created the "Helder Neto" intermediate institute to train skilled workers for sea and land operations. Some 108 scholarship students are attending intermediate and high-level courses abroad.

Despite a whole series of problems, the agricultural workers are becoming increasingly conscientious. Production of cassava, vegetables and yams has shown indisputable growth in the 3-year period from 1978 to 1980. A significant increase is expected this year over last year. According to data and projections for the latter half of the year, this is possible, although production is still below the goals set by the first congress.

The wheat-milling industry is now in operation. Last year, production reached 60 percent of the goal, set at 80,000 to 90,000 tons. An 18-percent increase is expected over 1979 production, or 70 percent of the goal set. Production increased by 105 percent from the first congress to last year, and is expected to increase by 142 percent by the end of the year.

All these statistics give a general idea of the Angolan workers' engagement in the process of national reconstruction.

In this current phase, the role of Angola's union central is enormous. Although various circumstances make some absenteeism unavoidable, the workers have still not fully and effectively gained professional awareness. This is because of the long colonial "night" to which the people were subjected. Each worker must feel responsible for his production sector. Only thus will production and productivity be further improved in all sectors of national life.

MOXICO MEETING SURVEYS SUPPLY DIFFICULTIES

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 5 Nov 80 p 2

[Excerpts] Lwena--The fourth regular session of the Moxico Province Committee of the MPLA-Labor Party took place recently in the municipio of Luacano. The session was chaired by Lt Col Marques Monakapui (Bassovava), member of the MPLA-Labor Party Central Committee, coordinator of the party's Province Committee and provincial commissioner of Moxico.

The purpose of the meeting was to review the activities conducted since the third session and to analyze the current political, social, economic and military situation in the province. Most of the committee members attended.

Regarding the political, social, economic and military situation in the province, it was concluded that, despite efforts to improve the living conditions of the people, various problems persist, specifically with respect to supplies of essential products, building materials and fuels, as well as certain irregularities in the flights linking the province to the rest of the country.

The Party Provincial Committee recommended that all its members, the MPLA-Party Youth, the mass organizations and the general public make a great effort to increase production and productivity and take greater responsibility in carrying out higher-level party directives.

The participants in the fourth regular session of the province committee also recommended that the Provincial Commissariat put an end as soon as possible to the persisting situation of self-supply [workers appropriating goods for their own use], sabotage, lack of dynamism and irresponsibility on the part of some government officials in performing their duties. They further recommended more forceful action to acquire fuels for the province.

The meeting also recommended that the Ministry of Energy take steps to normalize the electric power supply, and that the human and material resources be made available to install the power line from the Dala Dam, which is already in an advanced stage of construction.

At the end of the proceedings, the participants approved a motion of support for the MPLA-Labor Party Central Committee and Comrade Jose Eduardo dos Santos, president of the party and the republic, for the way in which they have guided the nation in the construction of the socialist society and have supported the just struggle of peoples for their freedom, especially in Namibia and South Africa.

USSR ADVISORS AT OFFICERS' GRADUATION CEREMONY

[Text] Yesterday morning in the Defense Ministry in Luanda, 20 superior officers were commissioned in a ceremony presided over by Col Pedro Maria Tonha (Pedale), member of the party's Political Bureau and Mozambique's minister of defense.

The 20 officers commissioned as lieutenant colonels attended the fourth superior officers' training course, which ended recently in Huambo. The 40month course provided the officers with the necessary knowledge of modern military technology, which will permit better performance at all levels of the armed forces.

Concluding the ceremony, the minister offered congratulations for the successes in improving our defense capability, and offered thanks for the internationalist support we have received in this area. "Our cadres," he said at one point, "still have some difficulty mastering military technology; we are increasingly aware of the need for continuing training to insure the defense of our revolutionary conquests."

Speaking of the need to improve discipline, Colonel Tonha urged the graduating officers to be the first to set an example, since discipline is a decisive factor in the successful performance of their duties, given the countless responsibilities imposed by the revolution.

Finally, the defense minister once again reaffirmed the Angolan people's determination to continue to lend their unconditional support to the peoples struggling for their freedom and independence, particularly the peoples of Namibia and South Africa.

Attending the ceremony were Col Joao Luis Neto (Xieto), member of the party's Political Bureau and vice minister of defense; Lieutenant Colonel Orlog, member of the Central Committee, commander general of the Navy and vice minister of defense; Lt Col Ciel da Conceicao (Gato), commander-general of the FAPA/DAA [?People's Air Force/Airborne Division] and vice minister of defense; Soviet advisors and several other officers of the general staff of the FAPLA [Armed Forces for the Popular Liberation of Angola].

BRIEFS

ARREST ALLEGATIONS DENIED—Using lies and slander, the enemies of the Angolan revolution constantly seek to distort the image of the People's Republic of Angola. Thus, almost every day, a certain foreign press publishes reports, allegedly originating in Angola, of incidents that have not occurred here and have never occurred here, as any impartial observer may easily verify. A current example is the case of the alleged arrest of foreign citizens, as if it were a violation of human rights to punish common criminals, as if proven offenders did not belong in jail in any state of law such as ours. Denying the rumor circulated by the more reactionary Portuguese news media, and immediately echoed by a certain ratio station that systematically attacks the Angolan revolution, an official source contacted in Luanda stated that our constitutional law is scrupulously observed, and that no one anywhere in Angola has been arrested without reasonable cause. Moreover, as the official stressed, no one can be arrested or tried in Angola except under the terms of the law, and all accused are guaranteed the broadest rights to defense. Finally, as he told us, all individuals are equal before the law; they enjoy the same rights and are subject to the same duties. Therefore, reports that anyone in Angola is being held unlawfully are unfounded and untrue. [Text] [Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 5 Nov 80 p 7] 6362

CENSUS RESULTS SHOW SLOWDOWN IN POPULATION GROWTH RATE

Bissau NO PINTCHA in Portuguese 4 Nov 80 p 3

[Text] The growth rate of Cape Verde's population fell in recent years due mainly to the great emigration of the 1970's, the National Census Commission reports. The data were presented at a meeting led by Comrade Jose Brito, state secretary for cooperation and planning, marking the end of the first phase of the commission's work.

Preliminary data released by the commission show a growth rate of Cape Verde population between 1970 and 1980 of 0.8 percent, and the rate of 1.8 percent in relation to the 1960 census and 2.3 percent in relation to that of 1950. The same data register a reduction in the growth rate of some islands in relation to the growth of 1970.

These reductions occurred on islands of major emigration, both internal and external. That is the case of Boa Vista, where the population fell 0.4 percent; Sao Nicolau, which showed a drop of 1.8 percent; Bravo, 1.2 percent less; and Santo Antao, 0.4 percent less.

On the other hand, some islands had minor increases in the growth rate, as in the case of Fogo, with 0.5 percent; Maio, with 1.7 percent; Santiago, with 1.2 percent; and Sal, with 0.5 percent more.

Meanwhile, the township of Praia grew considerably, where population is estimated at 39,794, an increase of 3.6 percent, a quite significant rate compared to the national average. Sao Vicente township, whose population is 41,792 persons, is next, with a growth of 2.8 percent.

The National Census Commission added that Cape Verde has a resident population of 296,093 inhabitants and a present population of 288,845; a male population of 137,154 and female population of 158,939; a total of 56,206 housing units; and a total population composed of 58,206 families.

Population distribution according to islands is: Boa Vista, 3,397; Brava, 6,984; Fogo, 31,115; Maio, 4,103; Sal, 6,006; Santiago, 145,923; Santo Antao, 43,198; Sao Nicolau, 13,575; and Sao Vicente, 11,792 inhabitants.

NORMAL ELECTRICITY SUPPLY SET FOR DECEMBER

[Text] The anomalous situation resulting from a shortage of electric power which has existed in the city of Bissau since 2 October due to a fire in the capital's electric-power station will not be completely normal until 20 December.

Meanwhile, the problem will be partially solved by 10 December, when two generating sets of 1,000 kilowatts each begin to function. They arrived in the country recently from the German Democratic Republic. In fact, with these two generators the power shortage will be less severe.

It is reported, however, that tomorrow, Friday, a Portuguese team will arrive in Bissau. They are from the General Electric Company and will make the needed repairs to the main group whose damages are in the alternators. Furthermore, the damaged set needs several parts that are also arriving tomorrow, mainly 1 ton of copper rods for the coils. Both repairs and purchase of materials will be financed by the Swedish SIDA [expansion unknown].

Meanwhile, the Portuguese General Electric Company sales specialist was in Bissau several days, having returned to Portugal yesterday. He studied the situation and made some concrete proposals for repairing the machine, on terms acceptable to our government, which decided to give the "green light" for starting the work immediately.

REPORTAGE ON MACHEL'S VISIT TO SOVIET UNION

Visit to Frunze

["Some extracts" from speech by President Samora Machel at a rally in Frunze, capital of the Kirgiz Soviet Socialist Republic, on 20 November]

> [Excerpts] During a rally held the day before yesterday in Frunze, capital of the Kirgiz Soviet Socialist Republic, President Samora Machel stressed the friendship existing between the peoples of Mozambique and the USSR. Here are some extracts from President Samora Machel's speech:

First of all, we want to thank you for the words addressed to the Mozambican people and their vanguard party, the FRELIMO Party, a Marxist-Leninist party. They are not mere words. They are profound; they come from the bottom of each Soviet citizen's heart. They convey the admiration, friendship, fraternity and comradeship between our peoples, between our parties. They convey proletarian internationalism.

These words of warmth and affection could only have been addressed to those belonging to the same family. What family? The socialist family.

We find the Soviet people have an extraordinary past.

In the Soviet Union we defeated the reactionary forces. We defeated the big landowners; we defeated the exploiters; we defeated the agents of imperialism; and Lenin proclaimed the first socialist state here on our planet.

And the revolution was not limited to the Soviet Union. Today the revolution, socialism is being built on four continents. The people of all continents want the revolution. They abhor exploitation. They are fighting against oppression; they are fighting against racism; they are fighting against apartheid--a daily burden on our continent, on Africa.

But we want to say to you: we will overcome. In Mozambique, we defeated colonialism, we achieved freedom, we proclaimed independence. Today we are a sovereign state.

The armed struggle is the highest form of our culture. And we are winning ideologically. Our current enemy is now making its appearance. Our current enemy is underdevelopment. We are fighting against poverty, against misery. And when we say that we mean: hunger in our country, organized by the exploiters, by the colonialists, by the racists. That is what we are fighting against. Against privation, against lack of shelter. We are fighting for building schools, for building a hospital. In short, the happiness and well-being of each citizen.

And with the help of the Soviet people, led by their great Communist Party of the Soviet Union, headed by the great internationalist and great revolutionary, their outstanding leader Leonid Brezhnev, we will also overcome underdevelopment in Mozambique.

To have political, economic, social, cultural, scientific and technological cooperation, this friendship must be based on a solid foundation and, above all, on Marxism-Leninism. For that reason, since the first moment we set foot in this great land, we have not felt like strangers. We have felt right at home.

Our conversations wtih Comrade Leonid Brezhnev were very fruitful. Leaders of the USSR party and state participated. These conversations essentially were about our cooperation in all fields, in all sectors of activity. We can say they were very successful.

Our cooperation will constantly increase; as in the past, our cooperation will be mutually advantageous to our peoples, for the benefit of our peoples. It will consolidate socialism in Mozambique.

The understanding shown in the conversations, the results achieved therein reveal that the Soviet Union and the socialist countries continue to be the steady bulwark, the solid rearguard of all the peoples and nations that are struggling for their liberation, that are struggling for progress, for peace, for understanding, for socialism; that are struggling to liquidate exploitation of man by man, that struggle for happiness and well-being.

The results of the conversations are a guarantee that socialism will be consolidated in Mozambique and cooperation between our countries will benefit the interests of our peoples.

We wish to transmit the warmest greatings from the Mozambican communists, from the Mozambican workers, the Mozambican peasants and cooperativists, from all Mozambican workers and say: "Long live communism in the Soviet Union. Long live the leader of the Soviet Union, Leonid Brezhnev. Best wishes for the success of the 26th Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union."

May our relations grow ever stronger.

Against Capitalism

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 23 Nov 80 p 3

["Full text" of speech by President Samora Machel at a rally in Tashkant, capital of the Uzbek Soviet Socialist Republic, on 22 November]

of Tashkent. On the occasion the supreme leader of the Mozambican Revolution gave the important speech which we transcribe below in full:

Comrade Rashidov, alternate member of the Political Bureau of the CPSU Central Committee;

Comrade leaders of the party and state of the Uzbekistan Soviet Socialist Republic;

Comrades and friends:

Thank you, people of Uzbekistan, for the words addressed to the Mozambican people and their FRELIMO Party. Thank you, people of Uzbekistan, your workers, your peasants, your revolutionary intellectuals, all the Uzbek workers represented so honorably by you here today.

Thank you, Uzbek communists, for being able to mobilize the people in the spirit of proletarian internationalism, in the spirit of friendship and fraternity between peoples.

Your words were of friendship, of solidarity, of comradeship in arms. Your words convey the feeling of class unity that unites the Soviet workers with the Mozambican workers, unity that was forged and is being cemented by our common past, by our history of suffering, by our common struggle against the forces of feudalism, the forces of reaction, the forces of colonialism, the forces of imperialism.

We said that our peoples are identical in our past, in our present and in our future. It is true. But the Mozambican people have not had 56 years of socialism. The Mozambican people are emerging from five centuries of colonial-capitalist domination. The Mozambican people have just ended 16 years of war. They had to take up arms and struggle for 10 years against Portuguese colonialism. They had to take up arms and struggle 5 more years against the Rhodesian racists, to achieve their freedom, their independence, to reaffirm their personality, to carry high the banner of solidarity and proletarian internationalism, to reaffirm their culture.

We freed ourselves. We are free. We are independent. And we did not struggle, we did not sacrifice in order to become the new exploiters. We do not know how to manage capitalism. We refuse to be managers of capitalism; we refuse to learn how to exploit the people. The blood that we shed during the armed struggle demands that the happiness and well-being of our people become a reality. Happiness that only socialism and communism can bring.

Just as the people of Uzbekistan 56 years ago, today also the war of the Mozambican people is against hunger, is against poverty, is against sickness, is against illiteracy, is against ignorance, is against superstition. Today our struggle is for everyone to have food to eat, for everyone to have clothes to wear, for everyone to have shoes, and for everyone to have a home. It is for our children to be born and to live, to go to school, to have nurseries, to be happy, to have toys and candy, a balloon, a tricycle, a ball. All this brings joy to the child. It develops the child; it develops the child's intelligence. This is what you have done in your country. Thank you, Comrade Rashidov.

Today our struggle is for our women, our mothers and sisters, to be really free women, healthy, elegant, beautiful as the women of the Soviet Union, as the women of Uzbekistan. It is for our old people to be able to live happily; it is for everyone to have hospital and medical care; it is for our culture to flourish even more, to become the sun that warms us and is maintained forever.

That is why we in our country decided to make the decade of the Eighties the decade of victory over underdevelopment, the decade in which we will complete the socialization of agriculture, relatively advanced mechanization; the decade when our industrial base will be consolidated. And, with your help, we will be victorious. With your solidarity, with your support, friendship and cooperation, we are sure we will triumph. We are certain of victory because we have a Marxist-Leninist party, the firm FRELIMO Party, rooted in the people, because we have our people united in the decision to build happiness, because our people are generous, our people are hard workers, our people are not afraid of difficulties and are not afraid to sacrifice; because our nation is rich; it has great potential. Because victory is being organized and we are organizing victory.

We are sure of victory because of the ties of fraternal cooperation, based upon proletarian internationalism, that we are developing with the Soviet Union and other friendly socialist countries.

We came to the Soviet Union on a visit of friendship. We are returning to our country with highly beneficial results. Our friendship has been strengthened. Our mutually advantageous cooperation will expand. In this visit we met with complete understanding from Comrade Leonid Ilich Brezhnev, influential communist, militant and dedicated internationalist, reliable friend of the Mozambican people and promoter of our unity and cooperation. Cooperation between our two peoples, the Mozambican people and the Soviet people, made a qualitative leap. Our visit was a success. And we are sure that many Uzbek workers will soon come to Mozambique, to teach us how to grow cotton, to teach us how to grow wheat, to teach us how to cultivate silk, to teach us how to produce rice, to teach us how to produce corn, to become well dressed, so that we can become elegant, as you are. We are sure of this.

We are certain the Uzbek comrades will be able to blend their intelligence, their energy, with their Mozambican brothers in arms, in various fields of activity.

On behalf of the Mozambican people, on behalf of the FRELIMO Party, on behalf of the People's Republic of Mozambique, we say: you will be welcome. You will be right at home with us, just as we are here. You will be part of our family, the socialist family.

Of course, you will not find the smae material living conditions that you enjoy in your country, but you will find friendship and affection, you will find understanding and joy, you will find solidarity and fraternity, you will find work and the certainty of victory.

[Text] Upon his return to our country, President Samora Machel last night sent a message to Soviet President Leonid Brezhnev in which he thanks him for the warm reception he received in the USSR and sends the Soviet communists and the Soviet people in general proletarian greetings from their brothers in arms of the People's Republic of Mozambique.

The following is the full text of the message:

In ending our official visit of friendship to the great nation of Lenin, the Soviet Union, we send our deepest thanks for the warm, friendly and comradely reception we were given by the Soviet people, by the Communist Party leadership and by the government of the Soviet Union.

The Order of Friendship between Peoples, which was bestowed upon the Mozambican people, constitutes for us a powerful incentive to strengthen friendship between our brother peoples--eternal friendship, indestructible friendship.

The agreements we reached are a valuable instrument for fulfilling the ideals of socialism and communism that inspire the working classes of Mozambique and the Soviet Union and will greatly strengthen cooperation between our peoples, parties and states.

Please convey to the Soviet communists, workers, peasants, cooperativists and revolutionary intellectuals best proletarian wishes from their brothers in arms of the People's Republic of Mozambique.

On the eve of the 26th Congress of the glorious Communist Party of the Soviet Union, we wish the Congress the greatest success, certain that it will be able to establish new and great tasks for the Soviet workers to consolidate building the material and technical bases of communist society.

MACHEL ANNIVERSARY MESSAGE TO BREZHNEV

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 8 Nov 80 p 1

[Text] "The Great October Socialist Revolution, directed by the immortal Lenin, constituted a historical turning point in the correlation of forces between the peoples and imperialism, between the proletariat and the exploiter classes," says a message sent by President Samora Machel to President Leonid Brezhnev on the occasion of the 63rd anniversary of the October Revolution.

In that message, the Chairman of the FRELIMO Party and President of the People's Republic of Mozambique stresses the positive development of brotherly relations between the two peoples, parties, and states. Here is the complete text of this document.

"Comrade Leonid Ilyich Brezhnev, Secretary-General of the Central Committee of the CPSU;

"Chairman of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the USSR,

"On the occasion of the 63rd anniversary of the Great October Socialist Revolution, in the name of the FRELIMO Party, the Mozambican people, and the cabinet of the People's Republic of Mozambique, I send the most brotherly and the warmest congratulations to the CPSU, to the heroic Soviet people, and to the Council of Ministers USSR.

"The Great October Socialist Revolution, directed by the immortal Lenin, constituted a historical turning point in the correlation of forces between the peoples and imperialism, between the proletariat and the exploiter classes. The victory of October established the basis for the secure and invincible support of the struggle of the oppressed peoples and the international proletariat. Through many generations of revolutionaries all over the world, the defense and consolidation of Soviet power during the hard years of struggle against imperialist encirclement and Nazi aggression quite rightly constituted the touchstone of proletarian internationalism.

"With the victory against fascism came a spread of the conquests of the proletariat and the liberation struggle of the oppressed peoples developed impetuously. Today real socialism is triumphing and is striking deep roots on four continents. It is to the glory of the Soviet people, educated by its Leninist party, that it can say, through many and varied manifestations of solidarity, including the sacrifice of its own lives, that it participated in the battle for the liberation of humanity, for the triumph of the cause of peace and socialism.

"Guided by the principles of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism and governed by the Friendship and Cooperation Treaty which links us, brotherly relations of cooperation have developed between our peoples, parties, and states.

"These relations constitute an incentive and powerful support for the defense of the cause of peace, national independence, and socialism in Africa, for victory in our battle against underdevelopment and for the consolidation of our socialist state.

"In this message of greetings I would particularly like to wish a long life and good health to Comrade Leonid Brezhnev and ever greater prosperity to the Soviet brother people.

"The struggle continues! Socialism will triumph! Respectfully yours."

FOREIGN MINISTER INTERVIEWED IN USSR

[Report of interview with Joaquim Chissano, Mozambique's minister of foreign affairs, by Vitale Mirni and Nikolai Goluk, date and place not given]

[Text] Joaquim Chissano, member of the Permanent Political Committee of the FRELIMO Party Central Committee and foreign affairs minister of the People's Republic of Mozambique, is visiting the USSR as a member of the delegation led by President Samora Machel. Chissano granted an interview with Vitale Mirni, APN special correspondent, and Nikolai Goluk, Soviet Radio and Television Correspondent in Mozambique. Following is a summary of the interview.

"The discussion between the Soviet and Mozambican leaders have gone well, in a spirit of deep understanding, based on principles and practice that should inspire similar discussions, particularly between our parties.

"Therefore, I am convinced that the discussions constitute another milestone in the history of relations between the CPSU and FRELIMO, a solid foundation for broader cooperation in all areas--economic, cultural, technical and scientific.

"During our stay in Moscow, I also had a chance to meet with various CPSU leaders, with whom we studied the possibilities for cooperation between our parties. Exchanging views with the director of the Soviet Association of Friendship Among Peoples, we examined the possibility of broadening relations between the two countries' social organizations.

"During the meeting with Comrade A. Gromyko, Soviet foreign affairs minister, I also had occasion to take an accounting of the Mozambican and Soviet positions in their diplomatic and international contexts.

"Therefore, I feel that our visit was frankly positive; it now remains for us to apply the principles agreed upon.

"With regard to our visit to Kirgiz, my first visit to this Soviet republic, we had a chance to observe the development there, and we know it is representative of all the Soviet Union, further confirming the reality of the construction of communism in the USSR, which deeply gladdened all of us."

USSR AMBASSADOR STRESSES FRIENDSHIP TIES

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 7 Nov 80 p 2

[Interview with Ambassador Valentin Vdovin: "Cooperation Between People's Republic of Mozambique and USSR Reflects Struggle of Both Peoples for Construction of Socialism"]

[Excerpts] "The victory of the Great October Socialist Revolution has become a profound part of the consciousness of millions of people all over the world as the principal event of the 20th century because that victory radically, for the better, changed the road of development of all humanity," said Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the USSR to Mozambique Valentin Petrovich Vdovin during a press conference given to the Mozambican media.

During the conference, which was held toward the end of the afternoon the day before yesterday, in the official residence of the ambassador, basically in connection with the "63rd anniversary of the First Socialist State of Mankind," particular reference was made to solid relations of friendship and solidarity linking the parties, the peoples, and the governments of the USSR and the RPM [People's Republic of Mozambique].

Valentin Petrovich Vdovin particularly stressed the official visit which President Samora Moises Machel, the supreme leader of the Mozambican Revolution, will pay to that socialist country within several days. "We are convinced that the Soviet people will offer him a warm and brotherly reception, along with all members of his party. This visit will certainly make for deeper relations and strengthen friendship and cooperation between our countries, peoples, and parties," observed the ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary of the USSR in Mozambique.

"Under the leadership of the FRELIMO Party, the Mozambican people achieved great successes in the construction of the new life and the consolidation of revolutionary power in the country, heading toward the construction of socialism, eliminating the consequences of colonialism and overcoming economic backwardness," said the diplomat who then talked about relations of close friendship and fruitful multilateral collaboration which were developed between our two countries ever since the time of the armed national liberation struggle.

In talking about relations between parties, he said that contacts are being developed between the CPSU and the FRELIMO Party which "are based on loyalty to the principles of Marxism-Leninism, proletarian internationalism, and our ideals of peace, liberty, and socialism."

Concerning cooperation between the USSR and the RPM, Valentin Petrovich Vdovin said that it is being carried out broadly in the economic, cultural, and technical fields. "The Soviet and Mozambican specialists are working together to draft the general scheme for the development of the Limpopo valley. Our economists are collaborating with the Mozambican side to draft the annual and long-term plans for the development of the economy." He then specified the various sectors of the national economy to which Soviet cooperation extends, that is, health, education, geology, agriculture, among others.

In conclusion, the ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary of the USSR observed that "for us Soviets, it is a matter of great satisfaction that the 63rd anniversary of the Great October Socialist Revolution should be commemorated so broadly in the RPM."

ANC WOMEN'S SECTION DELEGATION MEETS WITH OMM LEADERS

[Text] A delegation of the Women's Section of the African National Congress (ANC) of South Africa, led by Ruth Mampate, which is making a visit of friendship to our country, had a meeting yesterday morning with the secretary general of the OMM [Organization of Mozambican Women], Salome Moiane.

The purpose of this meeting was an exchange of information about the work that is now being accomplished by the Mozambican people in general and the women of our country in particular in building socialism and about the progress of the South African people in their struggle against apartheid.

This exchange of information as well as the rest of the program of visits by the ANC delegation will result in study of ways the OMM can support the liberation struggle of the South African people and in particular the struggle waged by the women of that country.

At the meeting, Salome Moiane began by referring to the transformations made in our country since national independence, notably the achievements already made by the Mozambican people and the guidance outlined by the party for our nation's economic and social development.

The OMM secretary general then referred to the very important role played by women in the struggle for national liberation as well as activity that they even now are engaged in to implement the guidelines given by the party and the government.

Ruth Mampate, in turn, in speaking about her country, reported that the struggle against apartheid has now gained a new vigor. "The victories of the peoples of Mozambique, Angola and Zimbabwe have given a boost to the struggle of the South African people, given them more strength and more courage and for this reason we are fully convinced that we will overcome."

The head of the South African delegation asserted that the number of women who have joined the ANC recently is growing. "The situation has reached the point where women no longer fear anything, whatever it may be. In any demonstration against the oppression the South African people are made to suffer by the government, the women are present at the side of the men. They are determined to face everything," Ruth Mampate added.

During its stay in our country, the delegation of ANC women will have an opportunity to visit some enterprises and sectors of social activity, notably the Maputo Central Hospital, the MEC [Ministry of Education and Culture] nursery and others.

Tomorrow the delegation goes to Cabo Delgado, where it will visit a former liberated zone and other centers of public activity. During its stay in our country the delegation will also go to the politico-military preparation center in Moamba and will have a meeting with OMM cadres and members to transmit the experience of South African women in the struggle against apartheid.

Besides Ruth Mampate, the ANC delegation includes Jessica Monase, also a member of the Women's Section of the African National Congress of South Africa.

ROUTINENESS SEEN AS THREAT TO POLITICAL, ORGANIZATIONAL OFFENSIVE

[Editorial: "Continuing the War Against the Domestic Enemy to the End"]

[Text] When the causes of the failures in the accomplishment of the plan for 1980 were analyzed on Tuesday by the enlarged meeting of the cabinet, it was found that, among the most important ones, were precisely those ills which the political and organizational offensive has already enabled us to detect. In particular we have here disorganization, lack of discipline, neglect, sabotage, red tape, a routine spirit, incompetence, and corruption. In a word, this involved the physical and ideological action of the domestic enemy.

This is why--as President Samora Machel pointed out during the closing session--one decisive requirement for the accomplishment of the plan next year is the pursuit and continuous in-depth development of the political and organizational offensive.

In its first phase, characterized by the campaign, the offensive already enabled us not only to detect the ills to be cured or to begin to be cured in the case of many of them. This work continued during the following phase, the consolidation of the advances achieved. It is therefore essential that, as the seventh session of the Central Committee pointed out, the offensive become a permanent methodology for victory over underdevelopment. It is necessary to make sure that the offensive will become a way--our way--of working, living, and making the revolution. All of us must realize that the offensive begins in us, that it is above all a political, ideological, and cultural process through which each and every one transforms himself. Only in this way will we be able in the end to drive out the enemy who has infiltrated our midst, only in this way will we continually improve our capacity, our working methods, only in this way will we make the cure radical and irreversible--amputating where necessary.

Launched against routine work, the offensive today faces the main threat from routine. "Conducting the offensive" here and there, for some persons, has already become a routine act, an administrative action which does not have any profound meaning in terms of the offensive. In the final analysis we must recover the offensive, we must get it going again and prevent it from becoming "inoffensive." We must fight precisely against this danger without a moment of hesitation. The Seventh Meeting of the Central Committee alerted us to that already in reviewing the first phase of the offensive.

It is in this sense that the continuation of the offensive is an essential requirement for the accomplishment of the 1981 plan--and, in longer-range terms, for our success during the decade. That applies to its continuous in-depth development and to its entire political, ideological, and cultural dimension.

To quote once again from the remarks by president Samora Machel, which we referred to earlier, it is necessary to continue and resolutely to complete the war which we have begun against the domestic enemy.

BAKERY OWNERS MEETING ON BREAD SHORTAGE

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 14 Nov 80 p 2

[Text] To give a correct reply to the Central State Plan and to the problems related to the planning sector, a meeting was held yesterday in the meeting hall of the EMOSE. The meeting was presided over by the chairman of the Executive Council of the City of Maputo, Maj Gen Antonio Hama Thai.

This meeting, which was attended by bakery owners, analyzed the system of flour distribution, sale of bread, present situation of the bakeries, their difficulties and discipline of the workers.

In his speech, Antonio Thai began by praising the manner in which the bread supply problems in the city of Maputo were presented. "Our plans are to organize sale and distribution of bread in the stores. We are not organized in the field of bread distribution," he said. "If the distribution were done fairly, we would have overcome the problem long ago," he added. He was referring to the fact that some bakery owners had incorrect attitudes because it has been proven that some of them sell bread under the counter for the benefit of their relatives and friends.

About this matter and other cases of lack of discipline, the chairman of the Executive Council of the City of Maputo gave guidelines for taking punitive measures ranging from reprimand to explusion from this occupation in cases of repeated offenses.

As to the distribution of flour, the concern of those who took part in the debates was evident because flour quota was reduced by the distributing units; this does not allow reaching a reasonable average of bread production to satisfy the need of the customers.

About the bread distribution to the various stores, the manufacture of bicycles suitable for carrying bread is being considered as a manner of solving the transportation problem. In the meantime, some of the problems raised will be studied more carefully to solve the present bread supply crisis.

WHOLESALE FOODSTUFFS COMPANY DEFICIENCIES REPORTED

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 18 Nov 80 p 3

[Text] "Since its creation, COGROPA [Wholesale Foodstuffs Marketing Company] has never fully succeeded in delivering the quotas assigned by the Domestic Trade Ministry for the provinces," [Vicente Leitao], national director of this state enterprise, told our reporter in Maputo.

The serious problems in meeting production goals at all levels were at the crux of a series of vast and complex bottlenecks, responsible for this truly touchy situation in the lives of the people.

According to Leitao, COGROPA is currently rife with inadequacies, shortages, incompetence and mistakes, and its operation is increasingly jeopardized by much more serious factors.

For example, to conduct planning and programming for the human and material resources currently at its disposal, the wholesale marketing enterprise needs to know the production plans of the factories and of the supplying companies.

When, however, the response is that it is practically "impossible" to fulfill the requirement right now, or when, after a study of COGROPA's obligations, the production units understand that "despite our willingness to serve, there are still some details we cannot control," the outlook for improving distribution to the various provinces indicates there are still many problems and difficulties to overcome.

Moreover, although positive steps have already been taken, the efforts in this area are offset by the problems that still characterize the machinery for importing the essential products, raw materials and spare parts that the country lacks.

Finally, according to Leitao, COGROPA "grew very rapidly," without the means or conditions for this growth, when we consider the broad range of products the enterprise handles (from rice to detergents), to supply a public that is more concerned with acquiring essential items.

Although the efforts underway to limit the above-mentioned range of products are tending to restore priorities in supplies, the "precocious" growth of COGROPA calls for a broader dispersal of efforts.

UN FOOD ASSISTANCE FOR FORESTRY SECTOR DEVELOPMENT

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 13 Nov 80 pp 1, 2

[Text] The United Nations WFP [World Food Program] will provide 28,672 tons of food for forestry project workers, in support of the working plan to promote forestry development in Manica and Maputo provinces; this agreement was signed on 12 November 1980 by Janet Rae Mondlane, national director of international cooperation, and by Juan Blanch-Soler, the UN/WFP representative in the PRM [People's Republic of Mozambique.]

According to the WFP representative, this agreement is the largest signed so far with any member nation in the UN's history and will help the Forestry and Wild Life Department of the Ministry of Agriculture increase the planting of rapid-growth varieties in Manica and Maputo provinces, to provide raw material for forestry industries and supply the urban populations with charcoal and firewood.

These are the biggest forestry projects in our country: the project to develop forests and forestry industries in Manica and the planting project to produce firewood and charcoal in Maputo. The Manica project mainly consists of planting tropical pines and setting up a forest products industrial complex which will include a sawmill, a plywood factory and a combined pulp and paper factory.

The primary purpose of the Maputo project is to plant eucalyptus trees to provide a large share of the firewood and charcoal needed in the city of Maputo.

Both projects include protective measures against fires, road building, development of small animal stock raising, agricultural production, construction of communal villages and health clinics, and vocational training for the workers.

The aid granted yesterday is the result of the PRM's request to the WFP. In response to the Mozambique Government, the WFP approved the food assistance program during the 10th session of the Food Aid Policies and Programs Committee, recently held in Rome, Italy.

The WFP will supply the workers and their families with food rations, based on the number of days worked. The funds generated by the sale of food will be used to promote the objectives of the projects and speed up the socioeconomic development of the provinces of Manica and Maputo, particularly in controlling fires, producing charcoal and firewood, raising crops and fishing, and other activities. Some funds will be used to build health clinics and schools for the workers' children, provide drinking water supplies and vocational training.

The WFP will provide 23,406 tons of cornmeal; 2,341 tons of beans; 1,755 tons of dried fish and 1,170 tons of vegetable oil; the total cost in food aid is estimated at $19.37 million, including freight and a subsidy for in-country transportation, handling and warehouse costs for an estimated 5-year period.

CENTRAL COMMITTEE OFFICIAL'S MARITAL PROBLEMS AIRED

[Text] The Permanent Political Committee of the Central Committee of the FRELIMO Party yesterday released a communique which we are publishing in its entirety below.

The Permanent Political Committee of the Central Committee of the FRELIMO Party met on 6 November to analyze the grave problems which for quite some time have been besetting the family life of one of its members, Comrade Mariano de Araujo Matsinhe.

The behavior, the attitudes, the family life of the wife of Comrade Mariano Matsinhe, Mrs Margarida Mandlate, as a matter of fact, have constituted an open and declared clash with the political line of the FRELIMO Party, a conflict with the most elementary principles of education, morality, and ethics. Like a vulgar aspirant to membership in the bourgeoisie, Mrs Margarida Mandlate in her daily life permanently displays her admiration for the decadent tastes and values of the bourgeoisie.

Her attitudes and behavior are all the more serious since she is the wife of one of the leaders of our party and our government.

Having been married 12 years ago, at a time when our people was struggling by force of arms against Portuguese colonialism, Mrs Margarida Mandlate began ever since then to display attitudes of tribalism, regionalism, racism, individualism, seeking to create, through intrigue, situations of divisionism and bad relations between her husband, who already then was a leader of the Liberation Front of Mozambique, and the cadres and fighting men.

Realizing that these were the vestiges of colonial-capitalist society which had educated her and which had swept her along, the FRELIMO tried by all means to change her, to educate her, to try to get her to live the reality of the struggle of our people, to become involved in activities where she could learn how to live with the people and for the people. The FRELIMO Directorate itself, through personal contacts, tried to make her see her weaknesses and mistakes so that she might reflect upon them and get back on the right track.

Mrs Margarida Mandlate responded to the efforts made by the FRELIMO Directorate by sticking to her negative attitudes and ways of behavior of tribalism, regionalism, racism, intriguing, vanity, and personal ostentatiousness. This reaction by Mrs

Margarida Mandlate to the efforts of the FRELIMO Directorate began to demonstrate her resistance to the transformation which the people and the revolution were demanding of her. This attitude has been taking hold for the past 10 years, a period of time during which there was constant conflict at home.

After independence, in spite of warnings regarding the reality which she was going to find in Lourenco Marques at that time, Mrs Margarida Mandlate insisted on continuing with her negative behavior. Her behavior continues to display moral values characterized by bourgeois society. Having come from a poor and modest family--which through hard work and sacrifice enabled her to have an education--she denied her class origin, she easily forgot the past of exploitation and humiliation by the colonial bourgeoisie and instead assumed the values and ways of life of that bourgeoisie.

In particular, her home life began to become the subject of public talk because of the way in which she downgraded the education and training of her children, the way in which she failed to show respect for her husband.

She began to become the mouthpiece for family problems outside the home, telling her problems to persons with whom she identified. Lately she has taken the initiative in her own home to live separately from her husband, even going so far as to create conflict situations for him and insulting him in front of his own subordinates.

The home is not a party cell and Mrs Margarida Mondlate does everything to make sure that this is not so.

In view of the seriousness of the situation, the Permanent Political Committee of the Central Committee of the FRELIMO Party decided to meet to analyze the case, having invited Mrs Margarida Mandlate and some family members to attend the meeting.

In analyzing the case, it was found that the behavior of Mrs Margarida Mandlate revealed an attitude openly hostile to the political line of the party, the people, and the revolution, that her behavior was a reflection of her superficial, irresponsible mentality impregnated with tribalist, racist, individualist values, a mentality characterized by the spirit of intrigue and low morality. It was found that her resistance to the transformation which is expected of her was an open demonstration that she wants to remain on the side of the enemy's values, on the side of the values which seek to destroy the revolution. It was found that her best friends are the big enemies of the revolutionary process underway in the country and that her behavior continues to be guided by her admiration for the exploiters, for the decadent values of the bourgeoisie, to which she feels she is an active aspirant.

Analyzing the case in the utmost depth and considering that the separation of the couple in their own home was already a fact, the Permanent Political Committee, Central Committee, FRELIMO Party decided:

1. Officially to approve the divorce between Comrade Mariano de Araujo Matsinhe and Mrs Margarida Mandlate;

2. To take charge of the education of the children, with the exception of the youngest who, in view of his age, will temporarily remain with the mother;

3. To give the necessary support to the mother of Mrs Margarida Mandlate;

4. To instruct the local government agencies, where Mrs Margarida Mandlate developed her activities, to proceed to a proper explanation of the case;

5. To assign Mrs Margarida Mandlate to production tasks so as to create conditions that will enable her to assume the new moral and social values of the new society which we are building.

The Permanent Political Committee, Central Committee, FRELIMO Party, expresses its sympathy and esteem for Comrade Mariano de Araujo Matsinhe for the efforts he always made to achieve the transformation of Mrs Margarida Mandlate as well as for the way in which he always managed to present the case to the appropriate party agencies and it encourages him to get over this difficult time in his life.

The struggle continues!

ATTENTION GIVEN TO COOPERANTS' HOUSING NEEDS

Residences Built

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 8 Nov 80 p 3

> [Text] Solving the housing problem for hundreds of cooperating technicians who are on duty in the country's capital--many of whom are being put up in hotels and boarding houses--has become one of the concerns of the government, according to Janet Mondlane, national director of international cooperation.

Janet Mondlane spoke during an interview given the day before yesterday to our reporter in the course of which she stressed the most important aspects characterizing current activities; she also mentioned the major effort being made by the Mozambican government to provide better living conditions for the cooperants in service in the RPM [People's Republic of Mozambique].

In this context, organizational work is about to be completed so that it may be possible, this month, to start allocation of about 260 housing units intended for the cooperants.

"Our main concern right now is to get all of the cooperants out of the hotels and boarding houses, in the homes of friends or relatives, and put them up in their own homes. This task from the very beginning is the responsibility of Motecnica which is an agency of the National Planning Commission," the national director of international cooperation told us.

She added: "The question of housing cooperating technicians is a problem which is making itself felt throughout the land, but with greater emphasis in the capital where a large percentage of those cooperants are stationed."

Putting Cooperants Up In Hotels Is Not an Adequate Solution

As Janet Mondlane said, the only solution to this problem, obviously the most viable one, was to build more homes for these cooperants. "But it was impossible overnight to complete the construction of these homes. This is why we had no alternative other than to put them up in hotels, since at this point we did not have apartments for this purpose," the official explained.

Continuing her explanations, the national director of international cooperation said that "under these conditions it is impossible to receive more cooperants who are necessary for the accomplishment of the great projects with a view to the country's development."

As we reported in our edition yesterday, in addition to more than 115 housing units in their final phase, work has been started on about 145 housing units of the "bungalow" type in Mahotas and within the Coop, located in various parts of the city of Maputo in districts with apartments of various types [as published].

Releasing Hotels and Boarding Houses For Use By Guests and Visitors

Once the above-mentioned houses have been allocated to the cooperants, we will not only have solved the problem of housing them as such but we will also have available a significant number of rooms in hotels and similar establishments for the accommodation of those people who visit the capital.

The lack of hotel rooms in the city of Maputo--which has been gradually getting worse for quite some time--was another problem which director Janet Mondlane took up and which is also a consequence of the fact that hundreds of cooperants are living in those buildings.

"A hotel is not the proper place for people to live permanently with children. By the end of the current month, for example, a big conference for the coordination of development in southern Africa is scheduled here in Maputo. If by that time we have not gotten all of the technicians out of the hotels, we are going to have tremendous difficulties in putting up our invited guests who are coming to attend that conference," said Janet Mondlane.

"In addition to that," the national director of international cooperation added, "in view of the large number of cooperants who are housed in hotels, we had to put together a price list which is way out of proportion to what the hotels should be charging. This is why I want to say again that this is not the best solution to the housing problem."

Major Effort to Resolve Issue

In the effort to complete the work in progress, specifically, the latest start on about 260 housing units earmarked for cooperation technicians, various agencies, including Public Works and Housing, Electricity of Mozambique, and the Southern Regional Construction Company, have been making a tremendous effort to complete the work within the next several days.

Members of the Mozambican Women's Organization from the districts of Hulene and Malhangalene have been a big help in the job of cleaning those houses. "All of this enables us to say that by 15 November, at the latest, we will start the allocation of these houses to the cooperants," Janet Mondlane said in conclusion.

International Cooperation Official Interviewed

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 9 Nov 80 p 3

> [Text] Intensive organizational work is being done at this moment at a rather fast pace by government agencies with a view to improving living conditions of cooperating technicians serving in the country and living in the capital, specifically regarding housing.

These efforts involve the latest completion of about 145 "bungalow"-type housing units in the districts of Mahotas and Coop, plus another 115 apartments of various types in the zones of the lower part of the town and Polana.

It is expected that the allocation of these houses to the cooperants who are presently housed in the various hotels and boarding houses in the capital, as well as those who live in the homes of friends or relatives, will be started this month. During the first phase, these houses will be distributed to workers who are quartered in the four big hotels in the city of Maputo, that is, Polana, Turismo, Tivoli, and Cardoso. During the distribution of these houses, priority will also be given to family groups consisting of several individuals (particularly with children); it will also be necessary to take into consideration some specific cases which might arise.

Motecnica and CIT Teams Begin Hotel Inventory

Another fundamental job at this moment is to prepare an inventory of cooperating technicians residing in the capital. In this context, a survey will be started this weekend, covering these workers who are billeted in the Turismo, Tivoli, Cardoso, and Polana hotels. This program will in the future cover the other facilities mentioned above.

The hotel survey will be conducted by four teams made up of personnel from Motecnica and the CIT (Information and Tourism Center), with one team for each of the hotel industry establishments mentioned.

In these buildings, the teams--together with the hotel employees--will record the name of the family head, the makeup of his family group, the agency he works for, and the date of his arrival.

Public Works Officials Visit Future Cooperant Homes

In the meantime, officials from the Ministry of Public Works and Housing yesterday afternoon visited the homes in order to take a first-hand look at the state of organization of the homes where cooperating technicians on duty in the country will be living shortly.

During the visit, Ministry of Public Works and Housing officials inspected the interior of a "bungalow" in the district of Coop which is already furnished.

Early last night, Janet Mondlane, national director of international cooperation, gave an interview to our reporter on this issue which we hope to publish in the next edition.

IMPLEMENTATION OF COOPERANTS' HOUSING PLAN

Housing Allocation

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 14 Nov 80 p 3

[Excerpts] According to the national director of international cooperation, Janet Mondlane, about 300 cooperant technicians serving in the capital of our country who have been living in four large hotels of Maputo--the Polana, Cardoso, Turismo and Tivoli--will be taken from these hotels beginning today and taken to the new homes where they will reside.

During the first phase, 116 of the 260 dwellings (apartments and others of the bungalow type) in the areas of Coop, Mahotas and other points of the city, which are almost completed, will be distributed among the cooperants.

As we have said above, the first phase covers only the cooperant technicians who are living in the four large hotels of Maputo. According to Janet Mondlane, this measure is due to the need to immediately vacate these establishments of the hotel industry, to be available for the participants of the Second Conference for the Coordination of Southern African Development to be held at the end of this month.

Because of the samll number of houses in which to accomodate the cooperant technicians living in the above-mentioned hotels, it will be necessary to place two or more cooperants (single) in each residence, according to the number of rooms in the house.

Distribution Priority

The distribution of the houses will be made according to certain priority, and prime consideration will be given to the composition of the family unit.

The proximity to the place of work will also be taken into account and this will be the reason for grouping in the same location or area of technicians who are posted at the same place of work.

Explanation to Public

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 19 Nov 80 p 2

[Excerpts] Hello, Bila. It has been a long time since I saw you. Where have you been?

Here, Sitoi. I have not taken a step outside this province.

Ah! I thought you were traveling, but since you are here, I am going to take advantage of this opportunity to ask you some questions that have been bothering me from the first day I heard about them.

Tell me what is going on. What is bothering you?

Well, Bila, this is what has happened: Last Saturday while I was talking with a friend and we were reading the newspaper of that day, my friend started to shake his head and say things that did not make sense. We were reading the report about the distribution of the 260 recently completed houses among the cooperants. My friend said he did not understand why the government was concerned with distributing these houses among the cooperants when many citizens lack housing. He told me about his case. He said he has been looking for a house for more than 1 year.... Bila, I tried to tell that man why our government made that decision, but he seems to have been born with his ideas in his head....

My friend Sitoi, our government is and will always be interested in solving the problems of its citizens, that is, us. I cannot conceive nor can I equate this decision with lack of interest in the problems of the citizens. Sitoi, my friend, you must know that the cooperants who come to work in our country left their homes and other innumerable comforts to come and participate in the reconstruction of our fatherland. They brought their wives and children, but because the government was unable to place them in houses or apartments, it was forced to house them in hotels.

Sitoi, you think that a family already accustomed to a certain life style can live in a hotel without being uncomfortable? On the other hand, a hotel is a place for people in transit from one province to another or from one country to another. Hotels are never, anywhere in the world used as residences. Furthermore, if the situation continues, it will affect the economic organization of these hotels, since the prices being charged are not the same as those usually charged.

I am beginning to understand.

The situation I have just outlined is not limited to the capital province. It is common to all provinces of our country and is a national problem, my friend! However, once the houses have been distributed among the cooperants, not only will their housing problem be solved, but also a significant number of hotel rooms and similar establishments will be freed to accomodate visitors to our country.

Bila, how could the individual in question talk that way?

Unfortunately, individuality still has not disappeared. The man with whom you spoke is one of those who place their personal interests above national interests. They are selfish, incapable of thinking about the future. They live only in their present.

Many thanks, Bila. You have been very useful.

You are welcome, Sitoi.

FRIENDSHIP ASSOCIATIONS END MEETINGS

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 8 Nov 80 p 1

[Excerpts] The need for developing contacts toward the establishment of cooperation programs which would make it possible increasingly to consolidate existing relations of friendship between the Mozambican and the Soviet peoples was one of the conclusions arrived at during the conversations which ended yesterday in Maputo between the delegations of the AMASP (Mozambican Association of Friendship and Solidarity With Peoples) and the USSARC (Union of Soviet Societies of Friendship and Cultural Relations With Foreign Countries).

In their conversations, the two delegations were headed, respectively, by Abner Sansao Mutemba, AMASP secretary-general, and by Yuriy Olenenko, chairman, Motion Picture Committee and Minister of Motion Pictures of the Socialist Soviet Republic of the Ukraine and representative of the USSARC during Friendship Week Between Peoples of the RPM [People's Republic of Mozambique] and the USSR which ends in Maputo today.

During that meeting, the two friendship organizations exchanged viewpoints on work done by each of them, as well as on organizational matters, arriving at the conclusion that contacts between the AMASP and the USSARC must be stepped up so that, in a short span of time, cooperation programs may be established which will contribute to a better mutual knowledge among the peoples of Mozambique and the Soviet Union.

The delegation attended the activities during Friendship Week between the Mozambican and Soviet peoples and was headed by Yuriy Olenenko; it left Maputo yesterday to return to its country.

Press Conference

Before leaving to return to his country at the end of Friendship Week between the peoples of the RPM and the USSR, the chairman of the Motion Picture Committee and Minister of Motion Pictures of the Soviet Socialist Republic of the Ukraine granted a press conference in the course of which he talked about his impressions regarding Mozambique.

During the meeting, in the course of which Yuriy Olenenko addressed the national and foreign media, and which we reported in detail during our morning edition, the head of the cultural delegation from the Ukraine stressed the fact that contact with the AMASP enabled him to get an idea of the great sympathy and friendship which the Mozambican people have for his country's people.

Yuriy also was quite optimistic regarding the future establishment of cooperation relations between the AMASP and other friendship organizations of that socialist country, stressing the fact that the coming meeting between presidents Samora Machel and Leonid Brezhnev will certainly constitute an important step toward the consolidation of relations between our two peoples.

YOUTH ORGANIZATION DEFICIENCIES NOTED

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 17 Nov 80 p 3

[Text] "Although I am young, and Mozambican, I do not take part in the activities of the OJM [Organization of Mozambican Youth]. Here at school, for instance, the OJM has not made itself felt, leading me to believe that the organizational structure is not functioning well, particularly in recent months." These were the words of young Joao Alberto Manhica, a secondary school student in the nation's capital, exchanging views with out reporter on the celebration of the youth organization's third anniversary, which will take place within 2 weeks.

Manhica's opinion was shared by many other young people with whom we discussed the activities of the OJM in their sectors.

The situation, which reveals how poorly this mass democratic organization has fared among the youth, is also characterized by the lack of organization in many of the rank and file structures created to dynamize the process of bringing young people into the organization, and by the elimination, for various reasons, of certain secretariats at various levels.

Among the aspects noted by the young people who spoke with our reporter was the lack of support and encouragement for the young people who, on their own initiative, are seeking to promote activities to occupy their free time in their schools, factories and neighborhoods.

Poor OJM Penetration Among the Young Masses

As we were able to ascertain, the OJM achieved its highest level of organization in the neighborhoods, schools and workplaces immediately after it was created. As time passed, however, both the members and the activists who insured its operation in that period abandoned their activities, leaving the offices to a very small group to continue the work.

The lack of recreational activities and study groups to discuss specific and timely issues in the life of the young people were among the problems frequently mentioned in our conversations with youth in the most varied sectors of activity.

EDITORIAL HAILS SOCIALIST WAY TO DEVELOPMENT

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 16 Nov 80 p 6

[Editorial: "Common Struggle for Socialism"]

[Text] President Samora Machel's visit to the Soviet Union, which begins today, should constitute an important step in consolidating and strengthening the relations of cooperation and friendship between the FRELIMO Party and the CPSU, between the governments of the RPM [People's Republic of Mozambique] and the USSR, and between the two peoples. As is known, these relations were forged during the armed struggle of the Mozambican people against Portuguese colonialism, and they gained new dimensions, at the state level, when the country proclaimed its independence.

Today there is a broad area of cooperation between the two countries, encompassing widely varying fields. It is expected that, as a result of the high-level discussions to take place in Moscow, this area will be expanded even further, particularly in the economic sector.

As President Machel has stressed on many occasions--most recently in his visit to three European socialist countries--cooperation between socialist countries in varying stages of economic development is fundamental to the consolidation of socialism itself. This cooperation, this development of increasingly close ties between the Marxist-Leninist parties and between the states that are building socialism, is one of the primary guarantees that socialism will be victorious in its worldwide confrontation with capitalism and imperialism.

True socialism is being built today on four continents. Ever increasing areas of mankind are freeing themselves from capitalist and imperialist oppression and choosing the socialist path of development. Particularly for the countries that are still underdeveloped economically, it is becoming increasingly evident that only this choice--the socialist option--can insure the progress, development and welfare of their peoples.

In our area, the People's Republic of Mozambique is thus following the socialist path of development. Despite the difficult historical conditions under which our country is building socialism, the achievements of the RPM already constitute a model and a source of inspiration for many other peoples.

The development and deepening of relations between the RPM and the USSR, the country of Lenin and the world's first socialist state, thus emerge as a reinforcement of the natural alliance between two peoples, parties and states engaged in a common struggle for common goals.

ZAMBEZI RIVER CAIA BRIDGE CONSTRUCTION--Construction is scheduled to begin early next year on the bridge over the Zambezi Rover at Caia, Sofala Province, it was reported yesterday by the Beira bureau of Radio Mozambique. Construction of the future bridge will be directed by CETA, the state enterprise for Major Engineering Construction Projects. The bridge will be 2,386 meters long and 92 meters wide, and will be supported by 32 pillars. According to Paulino Saimone, administrator of Caia, completion of the bridge construction project could constitute an enormous qualitative leap in the development of the nation's economy, since this zone of the province could become the strategic point for communications between north and center and center and south. Also assisting in construction on the Caia bridge are the foreign firms GEOTECHNICA (Brazilian), which is handling the surveying and foundations, TETRA (French), which is providing technical assistance and construction supervision, and trauscomplekt (Bulgarian), which is also providing technical assistance. In addition to the Zambezi bridge construction, CETA is also building the Central-Northeast Highway, for which the groundwork should be completed in 1982, according to the timetable. It is noted that highway construction had been halted because of enemy action. Work was resumed last February on the Matondo-Inhamitanga and Inhamitanga-Inhaminga connection, a 12-km stretch for which the ground leveling has already been completed. USSR DROUGHT ASSISTANCE--The Red Cross of the USSR, through the USSR embassy in Maputo, offered a gift of 3,000 kilograms of medications and medical materials intended for the victims of the drought which is spreading in six provinces of the country. During the ceremony which took place yesterday in the capital and which was attended by Abner Sansao Mutemba, secretary-general of the AMASP (Mozambican Association of Friendship and Solidarity With Peoples) and the counsellor of the USSR embassy in Mozambique, the first part of the gift was turned over and it is expected that the remainder will arrive in Maputo on 14 November. The gift, whose value has been estimated at 454,000 meticals, consists of vaccines, medications, miscellaneous medical materials, bandages, vitamins, and other items which will be distributed throughout the stricken regions. As the counsellor of the Soviet embassy in Maputo emphasized, the aid given by the Red Cross of the USSR is a sign of solidarity of the people of that allied and friendly country. Talking on the occasion of this presentation, AMASP Secretary-General Abner Sansao Mutemba emphasized that this aid has a profound political meaning which is a part of the traditional support given by the USSR to FRELIMO. BULGARIAN DELEGATION MEMBERS'LIST--Late yesterday morning a delegation of Bulgarian specialists arrived in Maputo to discuss questions connected with cooperation in the fields of agriculture, industry, transportation, machine-building, trade, and other economic sectors with Mozambican officials; the delegation was headed by Emil Hristov, member, Central Committee, chief, Economic Planning Department, Bulgarian Communist Party, and of the Council of State of the People's Republic of Bulgaria. The delegation also included Vladimir Lambrev, first deputy head, Department of Industry, Party Central Committee; Nikolai Georgieff, chairman, construction and transportation machinery committee; Kiril Milanov, deputy head, agriculture and livestock department, Party Central Committee; Gerassim Gerassimov, general manager, "TRANSCOMPLECT"; Nikofor Avramov, department head, Ministry of Foreign Trade; and Katchezar Petrov, chief specialist, Ministry of Foreign Trade. Talking to the media moments after their landing, the Bulgarian delegation head emphasized that this trip is a part of the agreement signed recently between presidents Samora Machel and Todor Zhivkov, during the last visit made by the supreme leader of the Mozambican revolution to that socialist country in Europe. In that context, conversations were held with Mozambican leaders to find ways for providing impetus for the development of economic relations between Mozambique and Bulgaria. Rui Gonzalez, secretary of state for accelerated development of the Limpopo and Incomati valleys, received the visiting delegation at the Mavalane International Airport. SOVIET BOOK FAIR--"Soviet Book Week" opened on 3 November 1980 at the headquarters of the National Book and Record Institute in Beira. This 5-day sales exhibit will be open to the public during normal business hours and will feature children's, scientific-technical, historical, political and other kinds of books from a wide variety of Soviet writers. The National Book and Record Institute and Mezhdunarodnaya Kniga sponsored this exhibit as part of the festivities marking the 63d anniversary of the October Revolution. Yesterday, the crowd of visitors warranted postponing closing day until next Saturday; the large numbers show the public's great interest in Soviet books. They will be sold when the exhibit ends. INFORMATION COOPERATION WITH PORTUGAL--Leite Vasconcelos, taking the place of the national director of Mozambique information, and Lobo Coelho, an official from the office of the state secretary for communications in Portugal, signed a memorandum yesterday on cooperation between the two countries in various areas of information, said AIM [MOZAMBIQUE INFORMATION AGENCY] in a telegram to our staff. The memorandum was signed yesterday afternoon at Radio Mozambique headquarters in Maputo in the presence of Minister of Information Jose Luis Cabaco and Jose Cutileiro. After talks in our country's capital, the two parties agreed to establish "a correct flow of information" between Mozambique and Portugal and, on that basis, mentioned some possible areas of cooperation, such as Mozambique's directly contracting Portuguese technicians from the communications departments to speed up the selection process and exchanging journalists to deepen mutual understanding of the realities of both countries. The memorandum also calls for preliminary contacts between Mozambique Radio and Portuguese Radio Broadcasting so they may reach a cooperation agreement. In addition, AIM and ANOP [Portuguese News Agency] agreed that the existing agreement between the two parties had to be implemented and expanded. At the signing ceremony, Mozambique Minister of Information Jose Luis Cabaco called this memorandum a gateway to developing relations between Mozambique and Portugal. OFFICIAL IN NICARAGUA--Jose Oscar Monteiro, secretary of the Central Committee for Party Organization, continued his visit in Nicaragua, at the invitation of the FSLN [Sandinist National Liberation Front] national leadership, this visit began on Monday. Yesterday, Monteiro, who is heading a FRELIMO Party delegation, visited the Ministry of Culture and other places of political and social importance in Managua, the Nicaraguan capital. According to information our staff received, Oscar Monteiro was scheduled for a press conference in the Nicaraguan Ministry of Foreign Affairs yesterday afternoon. The Mozambique leader, who visited Cuba, has already had various meetings with Nicaraguan authorities. [Text] [Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 13 Nov 80 p 1] 9479

HUNGARIAN BUSES--A new fleet of Ikarus 70 buses of the conventional (nonarticulated) type will arrive in our country in the first half of December. The Maputo TPU [Urban Public Transport] will receive 50 of the units and the remaining 20 will go to the Beira TPU. Of Hungarian manufacture, the buses have a 100-passenger capacity. Their acquisition, including spare parts, represents an investment of over 150,000 contos in foreign exchange reserves. The buses were shipped last Monday and on their arrival they will be unloaded directly at the ports of Beira and Maputo. Although the acquisition of the new buses is a large step in minimizing the transport crisis, which is being sharply felt in the nation's capital, it does not constitute, by itself, a solution to the problem. As a spokesman for the National Highway Transport Directorate indicated, at best, the 50 buses for the city of Maputo will make it possible to repair the units that are now out of operation there. Hence the introduction of the new fleet can in no way be seen as the solution to the transport problem, since most of the existing fleet is currently out of action. On the other hand, we also learned that an offensive is to be launched in the maintenance sector of the Maputo TPU, to permit the rapid repair of immobilized equipment, without which the new fleet cannot effectively handle the large flow of passengers observed at the bus stops and terminals. INSECTICIDE SHORTAGE EXPLAINED--From the beginning of 1980 to date, the domestic firm that manufacturers Baygon insecticides has worked only 2 months, producing 145,157 cans of the product. The firm, the nation's largest company in the sector, has the capacity to produce about 107,200 cans of insecticide per month. It has not done so only for lack of raw material, which was ordered a year ago. The production from the only 2 months the company was in operation this year (September and October) has already been distributed. There are still some rare instances of business establishments that still have the product in stock, but on the national market it has been scarce, or even unavailable, since last year. Although the factory has a reasonable amount of the basic product used in the manufacture of the insecticides (a chemical product called "baygon"), the plant lacks other components, such as the methylene, the gas, the deodorant and the valves. Some of the components were received this year, but in quantities sufficient for only 2 months of operation. Nor has the company made maximum use of plant capacity, since there have been breakdowns in the machines, causing some interruptions. As we were told by a Baygon official, it is unlikely that they will receive the raw materials for plant operations this year, which means we could be doing without insecticides for a long time. CABO DELGADO AGRICULTURAL DEVELOPMENT--Many of the expected 275 Romanian technicians, as well as the necessary equipment to carry out the 400,000-hectare Agricultural Development Project in this province, are now in Cabo Delgado. The project, which will also include Niassa Province, is expected to take 20 years to complete effectively. It should benefit agriculture, animal husbandry, industry, forestry, mechanization and research. According to Radio Mozambique's provincial station in Cabo Delgado, the agriculture sector will focus on production of cotton, corn, sunflowers and beans, while the livestock sector will concentrate on production of meat and milk. The industrial sector will produce feed and oils, as well as various products used in the sausage industry. Other reports regarding the project noted that, by its final phase, the undertaking will involve 20,000 workers, of whom about 460 will be technicians. CONFERENCE OF THE AUTONOMIST YOUTH FRONT

'Unemployment Cancer of Youth'

Saint Denis TEMOIGNAGES in French 14-16 Nov 80

[Interview with Ary Yee Chong Tchi Kan of the FJAR [Autonomist Youth Front of Reunion]

[14 Nov 80, p 6]

[Text] Following is an interview with Ary Yee Chong Tchi Kan of the FJAR:

TEMOIGNAGES: The first question which comes to our mind on these occasions is this one. Why hold this Conference of youth?

[Answer] There are many reasons. But let us say that it is the need for the young members of the FJAR to meet and bring themselves up to date on the present situation of Reunion youth. That will let us sensitize the young people in a better way to the real problems of their country and to the solutions to change the situation.

TEMOIGNAGES: And what is the situation?

[Answer] One of the essential features of the life of young people today is unemployment, of course. Up to that point, nothing new. But presently unemployment has become something like a generalized cancer in the body of Reunion youth. No one is protected from this illness. Whether one has a diploma or not!

In effect, until the last few years, he or she who had a diploma could think of presenting his or her piece of paper in order to obtain a small job somewhere. For the rest, one only worked at school for that. He who did not have a diploma was out of luck. Now today, the young people are unanimous in recognizing that their diploma no longer makes it possible for them to escape the "cancer."

The baccalaureate was considered to be a diploma of great value, but it is no longer of value to its possessor. It once was a great tradition to congratulate those who passed their "bac" examination. Now, congratulating someone on passing the "bac" may seem out of place, to the extent that one no longer knows whether one is congratulating him on taking his first steps as one of the unemployed. Only a few right wing mayors, who have no scruples at all, still amuse themselves with this little game. I tell you, it is almost contemptible!

The baccalaureate degree (I am still using this example because I find it significant) also was a passport to obtain a position in the civil service, especially as a teacher: a substitute for professors, teachers, etc. Now there is saturation in the government administration. And in the field of education the demographic decline has led to the closing of classes. Let us add to that the decision of the government not to increase the number of teaching positions, contrary to needs certified by the trade unions.

Suddenly, many capable teachers and professors are unemployed or suspended from work.

Consequently, most of those who, after they have passed their "bac," go to the faculty at Saint Denis are potentially unemployed.

Candidates for the liberal professions sooner or later will meet the same fate. At least, unless they absolutely do not hope to earn more or as much money as their colleagues today.

TEMOIGNAGES: The least that one can say is not optimistic.

[Answer] We do not want to dramatize things at all. We simply note the human mess resulting from the colonialist policy of the government.

Another thing, look in the town administrations or in other services of the government, there are young men with bachelor's degrees (more often, young women with bachelor's degrees). They are filling out papers! AMG sheets [sic], certificates of birth and death, etc. Is that not a mess? Did one have to get a "bac" for that? The situation is such that work not requiring a high intellectual level or a high level of training will be done by people with significant diplomas. I know some people who have bachelor's degrees who are drivers and deliverymen or clerks at a construction site. That is one aspect of the mess! I also note that out of 1,200 persons with bachelor's degrees the majority of them are unemployed. The two or three who have a job will not have it for long.

TEMOIGNAGES: And regarding emigration, what is the attitude of the young people?

[Answer] The other new element in the situation concerning young people is the reduction in emigration.

The government had established a whole system to take the young people out of Reunion. It was done to avoid an explosion (one should recall the words of Michel Debre recently on television.). The government thought it had found a "solution" to the problem. But the results are to be seen today. This is the result of a policy which is incoherent and filled with contradictions, as only colonialism is capable of being. At present young people who have emigrated are coming back and do not wish to leave again.

In general, our youth will have to bear a constant worsening in the number of unemployed, over the coming years.

But will the young people stand for it? And until when?

TEMOIGNAGES: Will the young people sign up for manual labor? Do they receive unemployment compensation?

[Answer] Contrary to the reactionaries, who accuse the young people of being "lazy," I must say that they are looking for work every day. They go to the ANPE [National Association for the Advancement of Education]. They go around to all the construction sites. They buy stamps and envelopes to write and to apply for jobs. But finally, they are fed up! Some of them receive 2 weeks of unemployment compensation in a year, but most receive nothing at all.

As far as your second question is concerned, you should know that the FJAR has been at the heart of the struggle to get unemployment benefits. But the conditions for payment established by the government cut out the majority of the young people. We will still fight to make the government back up. But on the other hand the young people know that that is not what will change their situation fundamentally. Hence their demand for work. To have a job like other people. To have money. To be able to spend it when they want. To have their own form of leisure activity and to decide on their own life themselves. To put their brains, their hands to the service of Reunion and of the people of Reunion.

[Text] TEMOIGNAGES: You have just spoken of young unemployed people who emigrate, etc. But there are 190,000 young people in school. How do they see their future?

[Answer] I would like to make some small comments on that figure.

In general, the young people in the colleges and the lycees are more and more aware that their future is blocked. They are not blind. They see and discuss things with their friends, who are also unemployed. When they come home, they live the harsh reality of children of the unemployed. They are sensitive to that. In that way they become aware of things. There is an individual and individual revolt. And when that acquires a collective and considered speed, that amounts to a strike.

When one sees, for example, the attitude of the vice rector and the head master of Saint-Louis, who is trying to repress strike by the closing of the lycee, I tell myself that, truly, they have not understood anything.

Because the young people have made a clean sweep of their situation. And today, in every school, there is a reason for a strike.

It is up to the school administrators to show that they are concerned about the future of the young people in school. But can one ask this much of them when they are, for the most part, composed of supporters and zealous servants of a regime, whose victims are specifically the young people?

In the FJAR we tell ourselves that each one should assume his own responsibilities! We will always provide our support to the students as we have always done.

TEMOIGNAGES: Good! I would like to move to another question. We note, more and more, an increase in delinquency, theft, rape, drug abuse, etc., in which many young people are involved. How do you see that?

[Answer] We do not have the right to isolate facts and judge them as such. Let us leave that for the sensationalist press, which is bourgeois in outlook and scornful of young people.

Finally, what is this society in which we live? How was it created? The present, colonialist society is constantly based on theft, violence, domination, self-centered profit seeking, drunkenness, alientation, blackmail, and fraud, carried out by a minority of people who have power over the mass of young people. The consequence of that is the distortions which one sees everywhere. We are not making excuses. We want to have the responsibilities placed where they belong. It is too easy to deprive an honest man of work, of money, and of food, and then accuse him of theft. Who can foresee the reaction of a starving man? Consequently, in the FJAR we think that these problems will not be settled by repression and blind condemnation. It is necessary to give to these young people the means of acting like a man, that is, of being a worker.

TEMOIGNAGES: In general, then, what is the most profound desire of our youth, on the eve of the opening of your conference?

[Answer] There is no possible question of what that is. We state in the FJAR that the youth of Reunion want to live and work here, in their own country. This is also the central theme of our conference.

The government has tried (and continues to do so, moreover) by all available means to destroy this feeling. This is done through the schools, propaganda, the Army, emigration, etc. It has not succeeded and it will meet with other failures. Today, even Chirac recognizes the error of uprooting our young people. But he avoids facing up to the foundation of the problem. He does not want to put the colonial system in question. This is incompatible with the desires of the young people of Reunion who say, "We have had enough of a government which is 13,000 km away from here and which does not know the realities we face and which oppresses us." More and more the young people understand that Reunion must be led by people of Reunion who serve the country and all of the people, especially the poorest of them!

This is a normal reaction. If it were not, what good would it be to replace a colonialist exploiter by someone from Reunion with the same point of view?

Moreover, you will hear the young people speaking of that at our conference on Sunday [16 November].

TEMOIGNAGES: Then it remains for us to wish success to the young people of the FJAR. Our wish goes especially to all the young people who write us and contribute to our Wednesday editions. We will see you at the "Rendez-Vous of Youth."

'We Want To Live, Work'

Saint-Denis TEMOIGNAGES in French 17 Nov p 6

[Text] Yvon Virapin, a young man from Saint-Andre, yesterday opened the conference of youth organized by the FJAR in Le Port. In the name of the leaders of the Autonomous Youth Front of Reunion [FJAR] he greeted the thousand young people who had come from different parts of the island to the port. He also greeted the representatives of democratic organizations, members of the FRAPPAR [Anti-Colonialist Front for the Self-Determination of Reunion] who had responded to the FJAR invitation. The delegation of the Communist Party of Reunion was composed of Paul Verges, Elie Hoarau, and Lucet Langenier.

After this, with everyone in the hall standing up for the singing of the international anthem of youth, the podium was turned over to Ary Yee Chong Tchi Kan, secretary general of the FJAR, for his report (appears below).

The report was followed by several speeches by young people on unemployment, education, domestic servants, and democratic municipal administration.

These speeches were given in between the singing of revolutionary songs of Reunion and of the whole world, sung by an enthusiastic audience.

Then Paul Verges delivered a speech which was listened to attentively by the young people. On several occasions the secretary general of the Communist Party of Reunion was interrupted by strong applause as he set out the policy of our party.

The conference then adopted a general declaration (see below), a resolution for more liberal programing of FR3 [local radio station], and a message to the World Federation of Democratic Youth on the occasion of its 35th anniversary.

The report of the commission on representation was presented by Jean Yves Langenier, with Ary Yee Chong Tchi Kan making the closing address. In the closing address he urged the young people to strengthen their organization, to prepare for a large conference of young people in the next 10 months, and to expand the circulation of JEUNE REUNION, the organ of the FJAR.

An enthusiastic singing of the "Internationale" marked the end of the work of the conference and, after a luncheon to mark its closing, the delegates joined each other for an afternoon of recreation.

The holding of this conference, the level of its organization, the number and determination of the delegates assured its success. This is a stage which will count in the forward march of the Autonomous Youth Front of Reunion.

General Declaration of Conference

Saint-Denis TEMOIGNAGES in French 17 Nov p 7

[Text] "Forward in Our Struggle for a Better Future!"

Meeting in response to the call of the Autonomist Youth Front of Reunion, a thousand young people of Reunion, from all parts of the island, congratulated each other on the success of the conference of youth held on 16 November in Le Port.

It was a political success, both in terms of the number of participants and in terms of the very quality of the different reports and speeches.

It was a striking demonstration of the desire of a growing number of young people of Reunion to participate in the changes which justice and human dignity demand.

The difficult situation facing youth and the people of Reunion in general, far from being an act of fate, is the result of the colonialist policy carried on by the government. This evil policy leads our economy, based above all on agriculture, to its ruin. Unemployment is increasing.

Difficulties of all kinds each day strike a growing number of families. Regarding our youth, what is the future which the government has made for them? By a large majority the young people of Reunion have no other alternative before them but unemployment here or the trap of emigration to France.

This situation is intolerable. The conference of youth energetically condemns the colonialist policy of the French Government, which schemes, under its demagogical use of the term "department," the destruction of the economy of the active forces of our people.

Taking into account the most profound aspiration of our young people, the conference proclaims:

1) the right of the youth of Reunion to be able to live and work in the country, in complete liberty, for the future of the people of Reunion. No one has the right to exile our young people.

2) the urgent necessity for Reunion to be led by people of Reunion, within the framework of an autonomous government which is democratic and based on the people. The young people have had enough of a government which is located 13,000 km from here and which makes decisions without considering the realities of our country. However, there is no doubt that this right will not be fully accepted except through the struggle of youth and of the militant, progressive movement of Reunion for change.

On the other hand we are aware that our struggle cannot be dissociated from the great struggle of the peoples of the world for social or national liberation. Our struggle is an integral part of the struggle for peace, in particular the struggle which seeks to make the Indian Ocean into a Zone of Peace. The conference of youth declares its solidarity with all youth in the world, and in particular the heroic youth of South Africa and of Palestine.

The youth of Reunion is the majority of the population. Organized en masse in the FJAR and with other democratic organizations, we will go forward in our struggle for a better future.

Ary Yee Chong Tchi Kan Speech

Saint-Denis TEMOIGNAGES in French 17 Nov p 6

[Text] "We love our country. We want to save our people. Power must be in the hands of the people of Reunion."

Dear comrades and friends.

The situation is getting worse. Our country is going off course. Those who lead us have conducted and are still conducting the economy and people of Reunion toward catastrophe. We do not wish to dramatize anything, but it is necessary for us to be aware of what is coming. It is our future, young people, which is in question.

Ruin of the Economy

To begin, I invite you to note how the government is in the course of destroying the economy of our country. Slowly but surely. Here are some figures which are worth more than a long speech:

"In agriculture:" in 1962 there were 24,000 farmers planting sugar cane. In 1980 there are fewer than 12,000 planters of sugar cane. About 12,000 planters of sugar cane have been ruined and have therefore had to abandon this crop. In 1963 Reunion produced 230 tons of geranium essence. In 1979 it produced 76 tons, thereby ruining 5,000 out of the 8,000 planters who were engaged in cultivating this crop at the beginning of 1960.

"In animal husbandry:" In 1943, during the war, there were 230 head of livestock for 1,000 inhabitants. Today, 30 years after, there are only 40 head of livestock for 1,000 inhabitants.

"In fisheries:" 10 years ago the government listed as an objective the catching of 10,000 tons of tuna by the year 1975. We have never gone beyond 1,000 tons per year. By contrast the Formosans have caught 10,000 tons of tuna last year--right near our coasts!

"In industry:" There were 13 sugar mills at the beginning of the 1960's. There remain 7 suguar mills today. And already the death warrant of La Mare has been signed for next year and that of Quartier-Francais for the following year!

I could continue to give figures like that for a long time. But these few examples are enough to show what the government wants to do with our country. Agriculture, animal husbandry, fisheries, industry--these are the foundation for the economy of a country. It is like the foundation of a house. Destroying the foundation means bringing down the whole building. Now, the policy of the French Government, its political and economic system, aim precisely at this objective: to prevent the development of our country and to force us to buy elsewhere, in large part in France, Europe, and South Africa. The capitalist societies of France, Europe, and South Africa are enriching themselves on our backs.

At present Reunion imports 80 percent of what it consumes! Here is a game: check in your house everything which is from Reunion and what is not.

In short, we can say that the policy of the French Government is to destroy our economy in order to sell its own products and those of its capitalist and racist friends.

Unemployment

Such a policy inevitably leads to unemployment. The number of unemployed increases every day. Every day workers are laid off. Officially, there are 45,000 persons listed for ANPE [unemployment benefits]. We estimate that the more correct figure of unemployed is 60,000!

At present, out of 100 persons unemployed there are 70 young people, under 25 years of age, girls being a little more numerous than boys. No one is any longer protected from unemployment. Here are some recent examples from the month of August of this year. Some 1,200 young people have received their baccalaureate degree. Well, most of them have no jobs! And those who do have jobs are not even sure of keeping them.

For the entry exam for teachers' college 600 candidates with baccalaureate degrees presented themselves. Only 33 were accepted. The others were refused. Last year 30 persons were needed to form a group of artists. Some 1,200 young people made application for it.

Every August the schools turn out 10,000 young people into the job market. Meanwhile, factories are being closed, and people are being dismissed by the hundreds.

You understand therefore, dear friends, how the government and the political right wing groups make themselves ridiculous when they speak of the achievement of the economic status of a department!

This year 1,000 planters of geranium will be ruined. More than 1,000 planters of sugar cane and of vetiver oil will suffer the same fate. And they are the poorest in their profession. Industry has hardly 5,000 workers. This is barely half of the group of young people who leave school in August.

The achievement of the economic status of a department, as preached by the political right wing, is truly ridiculous.

The schools no longer train young people to be responsible men and women at the service of their country. The schools resemble a factory for turning out the unemployed.

Today, many young people in school ask themselves the question, what good is school. They no longer have the taste for making an effort in school. They have nothing!

Whatever effort they make, they already know the result. Resignation has seized them; at times, distress and revolt. From now on we can understand that they want to show their discontent and their wish to revolt.

And as far as the FJAR is concerned, we say to the young people in school: /You Have Good Reason To Go On Strike!/ [printed in boldface]

Waste

The result of this unemployment is that we are looking at a real waste of our youth. All these intelligent brains, these capable hands no longer are useful for anything. Furthermore, a young person without a job is looked down on by the people. He is called names. He is humiliated, scorned, rejected like a pariah dog. He is the one they accuse! He is considered to be lazy, a good for nothing. They see him already as a bum and a thief! He is the one they blame!

When there is trouble in a neighborhood, the police immediately turn to the young man out of work. He is questioned, insulted, even tortured at times. He is the one who is pursued by the police!

Dear friends. Are we lazy? Are we unable to work? We are right to reject humiliation and scorn!

The young people are not out of work of their own free will. The guilty party is the French colonial government! We are /Victims!/ [printed in boldface] Without work, without money, without anything to eat, without a normal life, the youth of Reunion accuse the French colonial government and declare all those who support this regime of unemployment and of misery equally guilty.

Emigration

Dear friends. Out of its desire to destroy our economy, the colonial government has created unemployment. Suddenly, it is encountering and will continue to encounter the discontent of the people and of the youth of the country, as a consequence of this unemployment. Our anger is ready to explode. So the colonial government is beginning to fear us.

It invented the BUMIDOM [Overseas Migrations Office] and emigration. Emigration was proposed as "the chance for our youth," as social advancement, as "national solidarity," even as cultural development! Think of it, "The young man from Reunion taking a plane--no! a Boeing--to discover the land of his ancestors, the Gauls!"

The publicity and the propaganda were beautiful! Today, what is the reality? The young people of Reunion in France are exiles, with everything that involves in terms of psychological or psychic distress, etc. He suffers exploitation, racism, and contempt. Today, thousands of people from Reunion want to return here. But they no longer have the means. They are caught in a trap.

On the other hand the truth is that the majority of the people of Reunion in France will never return to Reunion to live. Some parents have not seen their son or daughter for 15 years!

There are explanations for that:

1) the lack of money to pay for an airplane ticket, which is expensive.

2) the majority of our compatriots have found jobs in the PTT, the SNCF, at an automobile factory, at hospitals, etc. Now, Reunion is far from being in a position to offer 2,000 jobs in the PTT, in automobile factories, or several hospitals, etc. As far as a railroad or subway is concerned, nothing remains but a short stretch of an autorail service!

And the government finds that this is not enough. How it declares that it is necessary to make 10,000 more young people leave each year! And for that it receives the support of all those who support emigration: Lagourgue, Virapoulle, Debre, and Bertile, the socialist.

But we must answer them. Why, those who love emigration so much, for what reasons do they not leave themselves?

Yes, why do people like Lagourgue, Virapoulle, and Bertile hang on to their privileges? If they are great givers of advice, why do they not give a good example? Let them go!

As for Debre, what has he come here to do?

Ah! Emigration for us young people; that's what they want! And meanwhile, they fill their pockets here in peace!

In this way the French colonial government is in the course of committing a great crime: the destruction of a people. Two examples to make us think.

"In Martinique:" In 1974 there were 334,832 people there. In 1979 there are no more than 311,859. The population of Martinique has declined by 23,000 compared to 5 years ago.

"In Guadeloupe:" In 1974 there were 324,580 people there. In 1979 there were 313,125, or 11,405 people less. In a few dozen years what will happen to these people?

"In Reunion:" The significant decline in population growth from 1974 to 1979 makes us fear the worst for the coming years. From a total of 476,000 people in 1974 we have gone up only to 479,000, or hardly 3,000 more. And as this is not fast enough, the government decides that it is necessary to make 10,000 more young people leave each year! And this happens when we have just seen that the population has only increased by 3,000 in 5 years.

Dear friends. Faced with this colonialist will to destroy the people of Reunion, the young people of the FJAR must be sensitive to that. We are the bearers of the survival of our people, since we are young. We will never let the government destroy our people.

What Is More Precious

Are we young people from Reunion? Well, we should know that what is most precious for a young person from Reunion is his own people. They are its history! They are its culture! They are the economic development of his country. If this is not so, what is a young person from Reunion without the people of Reunion?

Now, we have just seen that the colonialist government, presently represented by Giscard-Barre-Debre, wants to see the disappearance of our people. However, if the government feels itself to be so strong, it is because in Reunion even so-called people from Reunion support the government, apply its decisions, and help it in its tasks of destruction.

These men and women are known. We have to assemble against them, to denounce them, to fight them. They must know that any person who supports the policy of the government is a declared enemy of the people of Reunion and of its youth.

In effect, we see and we hear people like Lagourgue, Virapoulle, and Fontaine sniveling on the benches of the National Assembly, but on every occasion they fall on their knees before the government and then support its policy.

So you call that the actions of responsible people from Reunion?

When the smallest problem comes up in Reunion, they go to see the government. They have never appealed to the people of Reunion to settle their own affairs, to take their own responsibilities in hand. Do you call that the actions of responsible people from Reunion?

What of these so-called people from Reunion, who spend their time on television and on the radio, in order to deceive the people of Reunion?

And Wilfrid Bertile, the socialist who associates himself with Lagourgue, Virapoulle, and Fontaine to say that it is necessary to continue with emigration? You call that a responsible man from Reunion?

These personalities of the political right wing and another group spend their time in selling our people and our country to the French colonialists. By their attitude they assist in the destruction of our people and of all things that pertain to Reunion: the language, the history, the culture, etc.

They have only one purpose: that it bring them money and preserve their privileges! They are in the course of selling off the economy of our country to the racists of South Africa. South Africa is the second-ranking trading partner of Reunion.

The man of Reunion is he or she who loves his country and his people. He fights to preserve and to value his cultural, linguistic, and historical patrimony. He is for the development of his country and the preservation of his people. He fights against the French colonialist government and the exploitation of Reunion. He fights for the equality of all the people of Reunion. He cannot accept the exploitation of the people of Reunion by other people of Reunion. He is for friendship and fraternity between the peoples of the world, particularly in our geographic region. He sacrifices himself to defend his people.

Today, there are not 36 solutions to save our people and our country. It is not a matter for 2 or 3 people.

We must oppose to the government and its supporters the strength of the unity of the majority of the people of Reunion and of its youth.

To begin with we, the young people of the FJAR, reaffirm our wish to live and work in Reunion. No one has the right to exile us! By what right do Giscard, Barre, Debre, Bertile, or Virapoulle say that it is necessary to exile young people?

It Is Here That We Will Decide

Dear friends. We love our country. We want to save our people. We demand work here in Reunion. For that it is necessary that the people of Reunion, even us here, in Reunion, decide what it is necessary to do or undertake. We have had enough of submitting to a government which is 13,000 km away and whose members do not know anything about conditions here.

It is necessary to change this situation. Actually, only one solution answers this need in a responsible way, and that is democratic and people's autonomy.

With democratic and people's autonomy the power of decision will be here, in the hands of the people of Reunion. It is here that we will decide what is good or bad for ourselves. We will do everything to develop the country, to create the maximum number of jobs. We will make here everything that we can. The products which we cannot manufacture we will buy wherever it is most advantageous, in relationships of equality.

Young people of the FJAR, young people of Reunion.

To obtain all that, there is no other way than to carry out the greatest possible assemblage of our youth to fight against the government and its supporters. That will take the time necessary, but the achievement of our hopes is at the end of the efforts we make.

Long live the Autonomous Youth Front of Reunion, the center of hope of the people of Reunion!

Young Women's Voices Heard

Saint-Denis TEMOIGNAGES in French 18 Nov 80 p 4

[Text] On Sunday several speeches by young people were made which illustrated or filled in the report presented by the secretary general of the FJAR, Ary Yee Chong Tchi Kan, at the Conference of Youth.[1] In particular, there was a speech made on the situation facing young women in Reunion today. We publish this statement here, exactly as presented by Josie. It raises many problems, but many young women of Reunion will be found to agree with these views.

Dear friends and comrades. I am a young woman from Le Port. I have had the good fortune to be employed by an association in my city and I am a leader of a youth group. But how many others around me, in my neighborhood, in my city, on the whole island have no jobs?

In several areas of Le Port we have sections of the FJAR. There are many young women, for the most part looking for a job. Each one of them would have liked to come here to tell you what the life of a young woman is in the present situation in our country.

The problems that a young woman can have in this colony of Reunion are not to be found only in Le Port but everywhere on the island. Everywhere they are faced with the same problems. In Le Port we have thought about these problems in each group of the FJAR, and I give you these reflections which we have arrived at in common.

To Serve Man

From her earliest age, a young girl finds herself faced with accomplished facts: she learns very quickly that she was made, before anything else, to serve man and to be a mother of a family. For that she is taught to be a good homemaker and a good mother. Taking care of her little brother, cleaning the house, washing the diapers of the newest born in the family, putting the rice on the stove, sorting the laundry, these are the jobs which our mothers give us when we are between 6 and 8 years of age.

Having been raised in this way, young women pass the torch on to others. We do not want to criticize our mothers, because we know that this kind of training is linked to the capitalist and colonialist system in which we still live. In our society a woman is not considered the equal of a man.

This kind of training we also learn at school. The school lectures are essentially based on the development of women in the service of men. To women are reserved, as if it were nature which wanted it this way, all the domestic tasks: the kitchen, the home, the dishes, the laundry, dressmaking.

Enormous Problems

On leaving school (after 16 years of age for most girls) the true problems of youth begin for us: confrontation with our parents, confrontation with the working world. At that age girls, like boys, aspire to a certain liberty. This is the age of friends, of group outings. This is also the age when, unfortunately, parents begin to "tighten up" on us. We do not have the right to go out without permission (not always given!). We find ourselves acting like a real homemaker in the house. Some of us do not accept this "family prison." They leave their families and are at the mercy of those looking for easy prey: the BUMIDOM [Overseas Migration Office] and prostitution.

Regarding girls who can still find work in Reunion, they have to face enormous problems. Girls are the most exploited, especially shopgirls and domestic servants. Exploitation both on the job, where it is always necessary to work longer and be paid a ridiculous salary which does not relate to the hours of work actually performed, as well as exploitation in the sense of the caprices and the abuse of the boss, who too often tries to profit from his position by exercising blackmail on the young woman.

Beguiled with Illusions

But the majority of young women remain at home, although they only ask for the chance to work. But in a country which imports everything which is needed, in a country where there are no factories, where dismissed workers ceaselessly swell the group of unemployed, the young woman who is just at the age to begin working after leaving school is condemend to unemployment.

She may also be condemened to emigration. Through its false propaganda the government does everything it can to encourage young people to leave their country and fly off to France.

The young women are beguiled with illusions which radio, television, the right-wing newspapers, and the government carry throughout the day. Driven from their country by unemployment, they arrive in France and quickly, alas, discover the reality which they must face:

-- There are 1.5 million unemployed in France, and women are the first victims of this unemployment

-- There is racism, aggravated for a young woman by other, humiliating acts of aggression for her

-- There is the problem of difficulty in adapting to life in France

-- Finally, there is the problem of alienation from her country of birth. All of that involves an unhappy life for the young woman who has emigrated.

We Must Fight

Dear comrades. It is important for young women to understand our problems well and to consider carefully the gravity of our situation, as we have just done. But that is not enough.

It is necessary for young women, with all the other young people and the workers, to fight to ensure that this situation comes to an end. We the FJAR we are fighting for a change. It is necessary to fight with all our hearts and with all our will for this change. This change is Autonomy.

Long live the Autonomous Youth Front of Reunion! Long live the autonomy of Reunion!

Youth of the World

Saint-Denis TEMOIGNAGES in French 18 Nov 80 p 4

[Text] Following is the text of the message which the Conference of the FJAR decided to send to the World Federation of Democratic Youth on the occasion of its 35th anniversary:

The 988 young people of the FJAR, who have met together today, 16 November 1980, in their conference, greet the 35th anniversary of the World Federation of Democratic Youth.

Conscious and concerned over the unity of the youth of the world in its fight for peace and progress, our conference has been held under the emblem of this 35th anniversary and under the slogan of the World Federation of Democratic Youth: "Young people, unite! Forward for a lasting peace!"

The youth of Reunion cannot forget that in war it is the young who are the first victims.

This is why today, more than yesterday, facing the forces of imperialism, with the U.S. at their head, the youth of Reunion recall the oath sworn by the young people who established the World Federation of Democratic Youth on 10 November 1945, 35 years ago:

"We swear to remember this unity which we have forged in this month of November, 1945. Not only today, not only this week or this year, but forever. Until we have built the world which we have dreamed of and for which we have fought. We swear to build the unity of youth in the whole world. Out of all races, colors, nationalities, and beliefs. To eliminate from the earth all traces of fascism. To establish among all the peoples of the world sincere and international friendship. To maintain a just and lasting peace. To eliminate misery, frustration, and forced inactivity. We have come to confirm the unity of all youth. To salute our comrades who have fallen and to swear that able hands, clever brains, and the enthusiasm of youth are ready.

"We will never be lost again in a war. Forward for our future!"

The Image of the Youth of Reunion

The composition of the Conference of the FJAR was a faithful image of the youth of Reunion who have come out of the masses of the people. Out of 988 delegates who presented their credentials, 51.9 percent were young women. The average age of the delegates was 18, with the age group from 15 to 22 years the most numerous.

The Slogans at the Conference

Beside numerous posters of the FJAR and of the World Federation of Democratic Youth, which decorated the walls of the Louis Payet gymnasium on Sunday [16 November], the organizers of the conference displayed several emblems in the hall with the following slogans:

--We wish to live and work in our country, for the future of the people of Reunion!

--Enough of emigration!

-- Indian Ocean Zone of Peace!

-- No to apartheid!

--Long live the 35th anniversary of the World Federation of Democratic Youth!

--WFDY: "Young people, unite! Forward for a lasting peace!"

PLANTING, HARVESTING CAMPAIGN TO RESULT IN GRAIN DEFICIT

Dakar LE SOLEIL in French 16 Nov 80 p 3

[Article by Sidy Gaye: "The Deficit Will Rise to 400,000 Tons: Appreciable Decline in Grain Production"]

[Text] The 1980-1981 agricultural season, which in a climate of uncertainty was quite late in getting off the ground, will have a grain deficit on the order of 400,000 tons compared to the plan's projections. The total grain harvest has been estimated at 674,000 tons.

In spite of the enthusiasm of farmers at the start of the season for food crops, bearing in mind the delay in rainfall which portended bad harvests and the continuing increase in areas sown with cereal crops which have thereby gained ground over peanuts, once more our country cannot get enough from its harvest of millet, sorghum, rice and corn to satisfy the whole of its food needs.

In fact, according to the first estimates of the office of the director of Agricultural Production made on the basis of a sampling effort, which can be improved on, the production of millet and sorghum should be on the order of 552,300 tons. Compared to the previous year when this production was 496,000 tons, a slight increase will therefore be recorded.

However, in spite of this slight increase in millet and sorghum production, the countryside has not, at the ending of this last season in the 5th 4-year economic and social plan, achieved the objective of 750,000 tons for these two kinds of crops which had been assigned by it previously.

As for production of paddy rice during this same season, Mr Coly, director of the Agricultural Production office, estimates it to be 68,000 tons, that is to say a decline on the order of 44,000 tons compared to the previous season. The plan anticipated 228,000 tons this year.

According to his explanations, this fairly sizable decline is due to the fact that this season was not very successful in the Casamance region which usually produced no less than three-quarters of the national harvest. In the opinion of the director of the Agricultural Production office, the Basse Casamance zone (particularly the departments of Bignona, Oussoye and Ziguinchor) has suffered the most during this season which is drawing to a close.

The major explanation for the decline of production in this zone which is particularly good for growing rice can be found in the rainfall delay which could not help but present farmers with problems difficult to overcome.

The rice growers who traditionally used to replant seedlings tried to repeat this method of cultivation in spite of the disapproval of extension workers which was motivated by the rainfall delay; this made them lose precious time which they could have gained by sowing directly. This turned into almost nonexistent harvests for all those who tried to do replanting. Since the varieties used mostly had long growing cycles, the premature end of the rains almost jeopardized the entire harvest.

As far as corn is concerned, it has been one of the few food crop efforts which has done relatively well. This year the production was 53,700 tons while last year it only hit a ceiling of 45,000 tons. This figure however does not reach the projections of the 5th plan which aimed for 62,000 tons by the end of this last season of the 4-year period covered.

This result recorded in corn production, which when all is said and done is a positive one compared to other grains, is basically explained by its short cycle and its capacity for drought resistance at the cycle's beginning.

Therefore we see that generally the results of this agricultural season which is drawing to a close are far from being satisfactory. The 1978-1979 season, which was the best of all the last three and which enabled 800,000 tons to be produced in millet and sorghum alone, was far and away above the quantitatively weak performance of this season, since millet, sorghum, corn and rice only add up this year to 674,000 tons.

The zones which have been most seriously affected are located in the center and the south of the country. The Diourbel and Thies regions as well as the north-central part of Sine-Saloum have pockets where there was no harvest at all, while the northern zone (Fleuve) and the east zone (the department of Kedougou) recorded the best results.

Rice, sanio, and sorghum, which have long cycles (more than 100 days) suffered the most from the delay and shortfall of rain. Souna millet and corn which need less than 90 days of normal recorded rain performed the best.

PEANUT HARVEST FOR 1980-1981 EXPECTED TO BE POOR

Dakar LE SOLEIL in French 17 Nov 80 p 3

[Article by Sidi Gaye: "Agricultural Season - According to the DGPA [Directorate General of Agricultural Production] Estimates: Peanut Production Will Be Less Than 500,000 Tons"]

[Text] The peanut harvest of the 1980-1981 season will barely go over 500,000 tons according to the first soundings made by the DGPA. Production of peanuts for oil should be on the order of 400,000 to 500,000 tons. The harvest of peanuts for eating will not be greater than 4000 tons.

Cotton as well will not do any better, since the technicians from the Ministry of Rural Development are expecting national production on the order of 22,000 tons. Therefore, for each of these cash crops varying declines by comparison with the results of the previous season are being registered. This decline is even more sizable if one refers to the 1978-1979 season which was the best of these last three rainy seasons of the 5th 4-year plan, none of the projections of which plan has been achieved.

In fact, the production of peanuts for oil which last year (the 1979-1980 season) was 787,000 tons will have come down this year nearly a third, and 2 years ago, in 1978-1979, the Senegalese rural areas had harvested 1,050,000 tons while this year samplings guarantee only less than half of that volume. The plan's objectives were fixed at 1,200,000 tons for this season which is drawing to a close.

The trend is worse regarding peanuts for eating since only half of the previous season's production (8,300 tons) is counted on this year. That represents less than a third of the harvest of the good rainy season (1978-1979) which had made possible the production of 10,400 tons, and it represents one-seventh of the plan's projections.

Cotton production (22,000 tons) will have fallen in volume by nearly a quarter from last year. In terms of production it will only represent a third of the 33,800 tons which were produced in 1978-1979. The plan anticipated more than double that production.

These estimates foreshadow difficulties for the year shaping up. In the opinion of the director of the Agricultural Production office, these poor performances are basically explained by the combined effect of the weak resistance to drought at the beginning of the cycle these three types of cash crops have, by the inadaptability of the long cycle varieties which predominate in these three planting efforts, but also by the low utilization this year of production inputs such as fertilizer. These factors were aggravated by the delayed onset and premature end of the rains as well as their unequal distribution and their irregularity.

Regarding peanuts for oil, for example, an immediate consequence of the irregular onset of recorded rainfall was the chaotic accomplishment of sowing such that at the end of July only 60 percent of the areas reserved for that purpose were sown. The remaining 40 percent were only seeded during August. For these late sowings only rainfall which extended up to the end of October would have been able to guarantee a normal yeild. That was not the case since the last rains fell during the first 10 days of that month!

In contrast to past years it was the Louga and Fleuve regions which fared best this year. The north zone was the best watered area in the country this year. Normal rainfall added to the recent introduction of short cycle crop varieties in these 2 regions, usually the most sorely tested ones, explain these good results. The Fleuve region, which had only produced 500 tons last year, tripled its peanut production this year.

So the Sine-Saloum region where a quarter of the production was in trouble, the Diourbel and Thies regions which recorded spectacular declines, as well as the Casamance region, had the hardest time.

Regarding peanuts for eating, they were the hardest hit of all cash crops because of their long cycle (it needs no less than 120 days of recorded rainfall) and their production is in trouble everywhere.

Cotton fared very badly as well for the same reasons but most of all because of this year's decrease in the area sown following the necessary stop in seedings starting 31 July. This crop effort was poor in all zones where it is grown.

SECOND INSTALLMENT OF STABEX ADVANCE RECEIVED

Dakar LE SOLEIL in French 22-23 Nov 80 p 4

[Article by Sidy Gaye: "The Second Installment of the Agreed-on STABEX Advance Is in Place: 2 Billion from the EEC to Senegal"]

[Text] Senegal has just received the second and last installment of the special STABEX (Fund for Export Earnings Stabilization) advance anticipated at the end of the current year to compensate for our losses in export earnings.

This second installment, which like the first was agreed to on request of the Senegalese authorities, amounts to 2,075.815,000 francs. Thus it brings the overall total of the special advance granted to Senegal by the Economic Community during 1980 to close to 7 and 1/2 billion of our francs.

One is reminded that, as a result of the particular difficulties our country was undergoing, the authorities had felt it necessary to send an appeal to their Community partners to be able to take advantage of the provisions of article 40 of Lome II. This provision authorizes a special STABEX advance to ACP [African, Caribbean and Pacific] countries if evidence of a serious situation which risks jeopardizing their agricultural season is provided to the Brussels governing authorities.

Thus as of last 4 July our country had received a first installment of close to 5,257,000,000 on the advance promised at that time. This was done after consulting the documents submitted by the requesting party and after approval by all EEC member countries.

This first installment was meant to help get elements of production into place as well as purchase 70,000 tons of fertilizer and 83,000 tons of seeds meant to insure a good start and good progress in the current agricultural season.

The second installment which we have just received will definitely be used in the same sector which as everyone knows will be specially put to the test this year.

However, as of next April it will be deducted from the overall total of STABEX transfers which will be paid to our country resulting from its losses in export earnings.

Going by what the EEC Commission delegation in Dakar says, these losses for peanut oil and oilcake are already estimated at 30 billion CFA Francs at least.

Therefore that means that the request for an advance made by our country based on the first 5 months of this year presents no likely risk for those supplying it. Whatever the future results which will be recorded in the course of the year may be, the EEC is almost assured of being paid back in full.

By way of information, one is reminded that the total of the funds paid to Senegal in July 1979 under STABEX went over 13 billion. Even if the number of countries benefiting from STABEX were to increase this year, putting a proportional strain on the individual amounts granted, that would not add any more to the risks.

DATA ON RURAL WELL DRILLING PROGRAM SET FORTH

[Article by Cherif Elvalide Seye: "9.2985 Billion Invested in 6 Years"]

[Text] A total of 9.2985 billion francs have been spent from 1974 until now for rural hydropower projects. This section and urban hydropower together constitute the two aspects of Senegal's water engineering policy. This large-scale policy has, moreover, been good for the establishment of a national company, SONAFOR [expansion unknown]. The latter was an expression of the government's desire to have its input in a sector where contracts amounted to billions and the trend was on the rise as long as the state was not intervening. SONAFOR, because of management problems, was almost dissolved; but apparently it was decided to reorganize the situation rather than taking action to dissolve it that would mean returning to the time when the private sector was in control of costs.

These investments of over 9 billion have made it possible to carry out 1,082 projects that were divided up among wells, hooked up well, drillings and hooked up drillings. These projects have been financed either by the government or by friendly countries or assistance organizations. Expectations have not been fulfilled over this 6-year period, for 2,048 projects were planned. Thus the fulfillment rate has been only 52.83 percent. This fulfillment rate is even lower when we concern ourselves with just the financial fulfillment rate. Investments were to be on the order of 25.668 billion. In the end, only 36.22 percent of this investment project has been fulfilled. According to the region, we notice a large disparity in the physical as well as the financial fulfillment rates.

Cape Verde has experienced the lowest fulfillment rate. For once, this region has not been the most fortunate. The quip, "Dakar is Senegal's desert," does not hold this time. Only 11 wells and 4 deep wells have been dug there. Out of 38 anticipated projects, only 15 have seen the light of day. Or a 39.47-percent fulfillment rate. This low achievement is explained by the implementation of other projects within the scope of urban and municipal hydropower. Moreover, the region's well brigade was only established in 1979 and its engineering equipment is still limited.

In Casamance however, 179 projects were implemented out of a scheduled 320. This is a 56-percent fulfillment rate. We notice that out of 2 anticipated engineering drillings, not one was carried out. Those carried out are primarily wells (153) and hooked up wells (all the ones planned for, 20 out of 20, were constructed). The drillings carried out rose to 4 and the hooked up drillings to 2.

The region of Diourbel has experienced the highest fulfillment rate with 69.7 percent. One hundred ninty-five projects were scheduled; 136 were carried out. The region of the Fleuve has also made a good showing with a 43.58-percent fulfillment rate. Out of the 312 planned, 136 projects were implemented. Sine-Saloum beats the Fleuve with 54 percent: 201 carried out of the 367 planned for. This has also made a good showing with 48 percent: 216 projects were anticipated; 104 were carried out. Finally Louga, also an arid region, has seen considerable work seeing that the fulfillment rate there is 53 percent. All the hooked up wells (3 out of 3) were dug and all the drillings (24 out of 24) were carried out. As a result, out of 250 projects, 133 have been fulfilled.

These overall figures dealing with a 6-year period should be toned down by the trend towards an improvement in putting objectives into concrete form. Noted in recent years, this trend does not show up in the 6-year statistics. Water remains so important for certain regions like East Senegal, Louga, Diourbel, and in some respects Sine-Saloum that we will never do too much for them. To be convinced of this, one has to have seen women in East Senegal travel kilometers on foot and spend the day around a well reaching 70 meters in depth to pull up a pail of muddy water. Every effort to put an end to such tribulation can only be welcomed.

TRADE UNION SEMINAR ON NATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Seminar at Praslin

Victoria LA NATION in French 27 Oct 80 pp 1, 2

[Excerpt] A seminar on the activities of the National Union of Workers of the Seychelles begins today at Baie Ste Anne in Praslin.

The opening session will be presided over by the organization secretary of the Progressive Front of the People of the Seychelles and minister of defense, Ogilvy Berlouis.

The seminar, which will last for a week and will be held at the center for worker education at Praslin, will be the occasion for discussing the means of making a larger contribution to the development tasks of the country.

In the course of his speech Minister Berlouis will discuss the relations which exist between the Front, the government, and the National Union of Workers.

Tasks of the Worker's Movement

Victoria LA NATION in French 29 Oct 80 p 1

[Text] The trade union members who are attending the training seminar at the center for worker education at Praslin today are continuing the study of numerous questions connected with the life and the functioning of the trade union movement in our country.

Led by Olivier Charles and Shelton Jolicoeur, respectively president of the National Union of Workers of the Seychelles and secretary for education and research of the National Union, the discussion today bears essentially on an explanation of new proposals for the structure of the trade union organization.

The work of the seminar continued yesterday [28 October], with a number of conferences and discussions led by responsible figures from the Progressive Front of the People of the Seychelles and trade union leaders.

The deputy secretary general of the Front and minister for transport and tourism, Matthew Servina, in the course of two lectures discussed the relations between the Front and the National Union, on the one hand, and the structure and functions of the different bodies in the Front.

The secretary for information and minister of education and information, James Michel, discussed the statutes of the Progressive Front of the People of the Seychelles.

These meetings, followed by discussions with the trade union members representing different sectors of activity in Mahe, Praslin, and La Digue, made it possible to have a broad exchange of views between the participants on the respective tasks of the different institutions, such as the Party, the trade union organization, and the government.

The numerous, animated discussions made it possible to discuss their respective roles and liaison between them.

Yesterday morning was devoted to a speech by the secretary for education and research in the National Union, based on the character and the role of the union. The speech and the discussion which followed it underlined the character and role of the union as a mass organization of the working class and, as such, a democratic body.

The discussion then continued on an analysis of the role of a trade union in a capitalist society and on the role of the National Union in education for a socialist society in the Seychelles.

New Trade Union Structures

[Text] The work of the trade union seminar at Praslin which began last Monday at the center for worker education on the island continued today for the fourth consecutive day of discussions and debates led by Jacques Hodoul, political secretary of the Progressive Front of the People of the Seychelles, and Olivier Charles and Shelton Jolicoeur, respectively president of the National Union of Workers of the Seychelles and secretary for education and research.

The political secretary of the Front today touched on two themes which were submitted for collective discussion: the mechanisms of capitalist exploitation of the workers and the concept of labor in a socialist society.

The discussion was then focused, yesterday [29 October], on the basic objectives of the trade union movement.

How to tackle and resolve conflicts in industry? That was the theme yesteday afternoon, which undertook case studies by working groups in the course of which the trade union members related difficulties encountered within their respective places of employment.

DETAILS ON TRADE UNION SEMINAR AT MAHE

Victoria LA NATION in French 20 Nov 80 pp 1, 2

[Article: "Trade Union Seminar at Mahe: 'Role of the Workers in a Socialist Society'"]

[Text] The secretary general of the Progressive Front of the People of the Seychelles and minister for administrative and political organization, Guy Sinon, yesterday at the Theatre des Palmes, opened the work of a trade union and political seminar organized on the initiative of the National Union of Workers of the Seychelles, with the collaboration of the Central Council of Soviet Trade Unions.

About 30 trade union members representing various sectors of activity in Mahe are taking part in the work of the seminar, which will continue until 28 November.

In his speech at the opening session, which was attended by members of the Central Committee of the Front and officials from the various ministries, including Ministers Hodoul, Ferrari, Michel, and St Ange, trade union leaders, the ambassador of the USSR to the Seychelles, the secretary general of the Progressive Front of the People of the Seychelles reviewed the efforts made for the benefit of the workers of the country since the Liberation on 5 June 1977.

At the same time he underlined the very important place which the organization of the workers has in the political system set up by the people since that date, clearly indicating that in this new society which is being built the workers should watch over the economy of the country, an economy which belongs to the people.

"It is the duty of the workers," he went on to say, "of all the workers, to contribute to the development of society in all its aspects, since this is the only way to raise the barriers which for a long time have lain across the road of prosperity."

He added, "In an economy like ours the trade union member, in effect, represents an effective leader for the mobilization of our efforts, in order to include the workers in the achievement of the objectives of socialist society and to bring them to a conclusion."

The secretary general of the Progressive Front of the People of the Seychelles then recalled that the holding of this seminar was the continuation of a process already begun in the training and education of the workers, in order to achieve the objectives of a socialist society more effectively and to fill the role which they have to play in the building of such a society.

Previously, the president of the National Union, Olivier Charles, emphasized the importance of holding such a training seminar, organized through the efforts of the trade union, in accordance with the orientation of the Front, whose leading role he recalled.

Elsewhere he expressed appreciation for the contribution of the Central Council of Societ Trade Unions to the holding of such a seminar. This contribution had also been provided at the time of the holding of a similar seminar in July 1978.

This contribution took the form of financial support from the Soviet trade unions for the organization costs of the seminar and provision of a Soviet lecturer who, in his response to the president of the National Union, transmitted the greetings of Soviet workers to their opposite numbers in the Seychelles, expressing appreciation for the fruits of the collaboration of the two national trade union organizations and for international solidarity which permitted the holding of such a seminar.

Under the title, "The Role of the Workers in the Building of a Socialist Society," those attending the seminar will discuss numerous national and international aspects of the place and role of the trade union movement.

More than 20 messages, which will be the subject of debate and collective discussions, will be presented by leaders of the Front and of the National Union, who will be joined by a Soviet lecturer, Eugene Roussakov, professor of political economy, sent by the Soviet trade unions on this occasion.

The trade union members will examine, as their work progresses, the history of the trade union movement in the country, its role and its tasks, and the place of the working class in economic and social development.

Elsewhere they will proceed to the analysis of the society of the Seychelles and of certain major economic questions, such as underdevelopment, the role of the trade unions in the establishment of a new international economic order, and they will also be informed of the experience of the Soviet trade union movement and of its achievements.

At the conclusion of their work, scheduled for 28 November, the participants in the seminar will evaluate the results of this event, the second of its kind to be organized, with the collaboration of representatives of the Soviet trade unions.

COUP D'ETAT, INTERNAL LABOR SITUATION

One Less Democracy in Africa

Paris LE MONDE in French 27 Nov 80 p 1

[Editorial]

[Text] By removing from power General Sangoule Lamizana, the longest-serving and highest-ranked soldier in the country, Col Saye Zerbo has not only overturned the military hierarchy which, up to now, has been scrupulously respected in Upper Volta. He has put parentheses around a democratic regime, until recently cited as an example in many African capitals. The first statements made by the new chief of state and the first communiques made public by the military reform committee for national progress, of which Col Saye Zerbo is president, leave no doubt on the matter. The prohibition of political activities in all forms and the outlawing of parties are among the first decisions made by the organizers of the coup d'etat.

It is true that it was the excesses of the alleged defenders of public freedom which dealt the finishing blow to what, up to last Monday was the pride of the intellectual elite of Upper Volta and a specific experiment carried on in the country. Neither the trade union leaders nor the political leaders are completely innocent in this affair.

Since 1 October the teachers' unions, for reasons more political than really pertaining to their organizations, had been engaged in a test of force with General Lamizana. While announcing last week that they were putting an end to a strike of 8 weeks, they let it be known that it was their intention to continue their acts of harrassment of a man whom they had regularly taken as a target for months.

The form of tripartism set forth by the constitution, now suspended, permitted the reemergence of sterile, personal quarrels. In Parliament rivalries had emerged into the open which had hardly any relationship either to ideological controversies or to the public interest. For reasons of pure personal opportunism, certain deputies of the minority had gone over to the majority, within which they did not always behave as loyal partners. For their part the deputies of the majority too often did not play the democratic game, except when the latter favored the interests of their electoral clientele.

The economic situation of the country has evidently not been unaffected by the change of regime. Listed among the poorest nations of the world, Upper Volta, whose resources presently being exploited are exclusively agricultural, is particularly affected by the drought which periodically ravages the Sahel region. Hundreds of thousands of residents of Upper Volta are forced to work abroad. To permit their families to survive, they emigrate temporarily to the plantations in Ghana and the Ivory Coast, because none of the governments which have so far acceded to power has been in a position to create new jobs in satisfactory numbers in the country. The question of development, which has never seriously been raised, is without a doubt the most important of all those with which Col Saye Zerbo and his team will face.

Having regard to the heavy list of liabilities which the organizers of the coup d'etat have fallen heir to, they must quickly provide proof of their determination. No one is in a position to say whether the immense majority of their fellow citizens, already subject to very austere living conditions, will agree to make a supplementary effort. What is certain, on the other hand, is that, after many months, the subtleties of parliamentary government no longer interest the ordinary people of Upper Volta. The massive percentage of abstentions noted at the time of the last elections provides testimony to profound disaffection with the games which have exclusively profited a small group of professional politicians.

Paris LE MONDE in French 27 Nov 80 p 3

[Text] Ouagadougou--"The existence of democracy in Upper Volta is gravely threatened by this series of strikes which is disturbing school activity. By their intransigent behavior, the trade union members threaten to bring the army out of the barracks once again," a deputy belonging to the government majority told us recently, with a sort of warning feeling. He preferred to remain anonymous.

The point of view of the opposition members of parliament was radically different. Thus it was that Joseph Ki Zerbo, leader of the Volta Progressive Front (FPV), established last year, said: "We are on the way to fascism because the notion of making the expression of an opinion into a crime is beginning to appear, once one has publicly expressed his disagreement with the government. It is a vicious idea to think that the people of Upper Volta must unite, even by force."

The trade union members, for their part, had held the same positions for 8 weeks. They intended, for the most part and until last Friday to pursue their claims by means of all the legal means at their disposition. Mr Toure Soumane, properly considered as one of the most combative elements in the Upper Volta trade union movement, leader of the Confederation of Upper Volta Trade Unions (CSV), which includes 19 professional groups, then discounted the threat of military dictatorship in these terms: "We have nothing to lose. Those who, on the contrary, have everything to lose are those who today are abusing their power by pretending to lend themselves to a kind of blackmail of fear, to which we refuse to give in." With as much intransigence he contended that the chief of state was sincerely playing the democratic game. He said on this subject: "General Lamizana has been chief of state since 1966, and we have much to complain about regarding him. In any case, it is not thanks to him that democracy exists in Upper Volta. Rather, it is exclusively due to the people and to the continual pressure the people are exerting on their leaders."

The Attitude of "Mr Maurice"

For Toure Soumana, "social conflicts do not threaten democracy. What amount to a real danger for democratic freedoms are the schemes of the team in power." Former mayor of Ouagadougou, former trade union leader turned businessman, Joseph Ouedraogo, who belongs to the parliamentary opposition, noticeably holds the same views. Defeated in the presidential election in 1978, forced to turn over his position as president of the National Assembly to his principal political adversary, Gerard Kango Ouedraogo, "Joseph," as his fellow countrymen call him, has never hidden his basic hostility against the present government. He recalls without prompting that it was he who, in January, 1966, called the trade unions into the streets of the capital, thereby achieving the eviction of former President Maurice Yameogo, and that it was his intervention with the crowds that, at the time, was at the origin of the appeal to the army. "If the trade unions," he said, "have been useful to Lamizana to bring him to power in 1966, today they could well be useful to chase him out of power."

Like all the opposition figures, former President Yameogo seemed to be rather favorable to the strikers. Retired in his native village of Koudougou, about 100 kilometers from the capital, "Mr Maurice," who always receives hospitably everyone who visits him, defends himself, however, from having held such views. "I am neutral in this matter," he told us at the time when the strike movement was in full swing. For the rest, the only concern of the former chief of state remains his rehabilitation. Desirous of regaining his civil rights, he scrupulously abstains from any direct attack against his successor.

General Lamizana explained his attitude toward the trade unions in this way: "I have never refused to discuss things with anyone, but I cannot accept permanent opposition. Everything is happening as if some people wanted to assassinate democracy, which was given to them as a gift."

According to the chief of state, now deposed from office, the trade unions, having seen most of their claims satisfied, continued to accuse the government of nepotism and of repeated violations of trade union rights for the sole purpose of overthrowing him. "This is not a strike," the president told us at the time, "but agitation of a political character, undertaken by foreign agents who use certain of our people to destabilize the country." He went on to say, in this connection, "What worries me is the progress of communism, due to the activity of a clandestine communist party of Upper Volta."

This view was equally that of Gerard Kango Ouedraogo, who denounced the activities of the same movement and accused it of being in close contact with certain foreign embassies, which he refused to name. While proclaiming, "Democracy has its limits; at present we are going through a period of anarchy," the man who is the true leader of the parliamentary majority and who has taken away from "Mr Maurice" a large part of his former supporters, refused to give in to discouragement. "I am not a pessimist," he said, "because the army of Upper Volta is patriotic and will not seek to impose on the people this or that form of conduct." Former deputy in the French National Assembly from 1956 to 1960, the president of the National Assembly of Upper Volta firmly believes in the virtues of parliamentary democracy. The former French parliamentarian, now prime minister, Joseph Conombo, practically paraphrased Gerard Kango Ouedraogo when he told us, "The Third Republic of Upper Volta strangely resembles the Fourth French Republic. I am not disturbed."

Perhaps this serenity could be explained by the fact that, among the ordinary people of the capital, and even more among the ranks of the farmers, the strike was unpopular. "Parents lived like rats the whole year, sweating blood to send their children to class, spending from 60,000 to 70,000 CFA francs* per year per child, not including the cost of school supplies," a nonstriking teacher explained to us. And he added, "Out of 37 secondary schools in the country, 23 are private and 14 are public and therefore require payment of fees, when the SMIC [minimum growth wage] is less than 15,000 CFA francs per month." One of his colleagues, who also continued to teach his courses, asked, "With more than 90 percent illiterates in French, the official language, can Upper Volta really afford the luxury of school strikes which are so ruinous for all?"

"No One Has Died Here for the Crime of Expressing His Opinion"

In more qualified terms, L'OBSERVATEUR, an independent daily newspaper, critical by principle because its director, Edouard Ouedraogo, said with a smile, "Democracy only wears out if it is not used." He wrote recently, in the name of one of his editorial writers, "Teachers forced by hunger to resume teaching would be, if not more negative, at least as negative as a year without classes." If, despite its sympathies for the FPV of Joseph Ki Zerbo, L'OBSERVATEUR does not go much further in support of the strikers, no doubt it is because he would like to avoid giving any pretext for the confiscation of what long constituted the target of the political regime in Upper Volta.

A neighbor of Benin and of Niger, where military regimes are in office, Upper Volta returned to parliamentary orthodoxy in 1978 for the third, consecutive time, after some years under military regimes. In effect the soldiers agreed, once again, to return to their barracks. It was at that time that one was able to see an outgoing president, a general besides, forced to enter a run-off election after the first ballot, when he faced three opponents. Moreover, the country had experienced several coalition governments, because the larger number of parties there had been the absolute rule for a long time. The present constitution institutionalized the tripartite form of government. Before the coup d'etat the National Assembly met regularly and debated major problems, even if the fragile majorities were often placed in question.

Five major trade union federations lived in constant competition. Freedom of assembly, of expression, of opinion, of conscience were almost complete. Facing the government press were other organs of opinion, which challenged, criticized, and attacked it, sometimes sharply. But the greatest source of pride of all the people of Upper Volta--at least until the coup d'etat--was that their country had never attracted the attention of Amnesty International or any organization for the defense of the rights of men. "In 20 years of independence no one has died here for the crime of expressing his opinion," a high official told us. And he concluded, "It is this priceless capital which we must preserve at any price." Will the new masters hold the same view?

AGRICULTURAL POLICY CHANGES REVIEWED

Paris LE MOIS EN AFRIQUE in French Oct-Nov 80 pp 66-73

[Article by Georges Frelastre, professor at Clermont-Ferrand Faculty of Economic Sciences and author of "Peasants and Collectivism": "Is Upper Volta's Agricultural Policy at a Turning Point?"]

[Text] From the very beginning, the rural development policies adopted by Third World countries were faced with a problematic choice. Should they give preference to vertical structures dealing with a given product such as cotton, hevea, coffee or rice in order to improve the volume and quality of the crop? Or should they opt for an integrated regional development seeking to ensure overall progress in a specific area, in which case the people as well as the various crops would be affected?

There has never been a clear answer to this question. The experiment conducted in this sphere by Upper Volta is significant. Initially, Upper Volta seemed to have opted for the "community development" model which was not conclusive in India. But for several years now, various types of vertical sectorial organizations have been added to these horizontal structures.

Regional Development Offices (ORD)

The national territory of Upper Volta comprises 11 Regional Development Offices [ORD] of very unequal areas. As new problems appeared, the various governments have tended to ask these agencies to find new solutions. The final outcome is that the ORD's have become catch-all institutions. Their many tasks involve providing supervisory personnel, supplying fertilizers and methods of production, building dispensaries, hospitals, a road system and promoting women's advancement. As for the marketing activities, they were originally assigned to these agencies then taken away from them and, finally, given back.

It is obvious that the ORD's tasks is too big compared to the means made available to them. Two main deficiencies are at the root of their difficulties. On the one hand, they do not have enough staff and often their staff is badly trained. On an average, the ORD can only assign one supervisory cadre to look after 1,000 farming units while they would need at least one cadre for every 150 units. On the other hand, the government has never given to these offices the financial resources which will enable them to carry out all their many responsibilities. For example, the Eastern Regional Development Office has an operational budget of some 100 million CFA francs but the grant it receives from the state amounts to 17 million francs. This explains its catastrophic financial situation. In 1978, the badly paid supervisory staff went on strike. It was decided to increase their salaries and to guarantee them a monthly pay of between 18,000 and 20,000 CFA francs instead of the 8,500 to 3,500 francs they were previously paid. But up to this day, this benefit has not been extended to every ORD because some of them are too poor to pay such rates.

The Regional Development Offices get their funds from three sources. The first source consists in the refunds from the SOTIFEX [Textile Fiber Company], a vertical structure initially organized to deal with cotton where profits are shared as follows: 70 percent for the Cotton Stabilization Fund, 20 percent for the company itself and 10 percent for the ORD's. The second source of funds is a 3.50 CFA franc tax imposed on every kilo of cotton sold. The third category of funds are national and international grants. Two of the existing offices seem to be in a relatively sound financial situation; they are the Bododioulasso and the Ougadoudou offices. But the Eastern Office is very short of money. Admittedly, the years of drought suffered by the country have further aggravated these problems but it is impossible to say to what extent these reverses are due to the force of circumstances and to what extent they are due to organizational shortcomings.

As regards rural development, Upper Volta seems to be suffering from the lack of an overall philosophy. The disparities which exist in the ORD's make it difficult to coordinate their objectives, since the end of 1978, the state has been trying to correct this situation and has created a Commission for the Standardization of the Offices which holds weekly meetings. It is too soon to assess the effectiveness of this initiative.

Volta Valleys Development Authority (AVV)

There is another structure of the regional type which seems to be favored by the government on account of the already encouraging results achieved since 1973. It is the Volta Valleys Development Authority [AVV]. The AVV is an agency in charge of controlled land settlement which sends selected peasants to reclaimed areas, mostly to places where large stretches of land had to be abandoned because they were insalubrious and had been devastated by oncocerosis. The candidates to make this move are selected from among the best farmers who meet the standard criteria. Very often they belong to the Mossi ethnic group because the plateau where these people live has a population density of 75 inhabitants per square kilometer and because many of them are attracted by the prospects of getting new and bigger farms and by the advantages offered to them.

Initially, the AVV was placed under the authority of the Ministry of Planning. Later it was attached to the Ministry of Rural Development but now, it is again under the Ministry of Planning. The AVV has a wider area of responsibility than the ORD's. It can carry out its activities in regions located in different ORD's. It is in charge of settling migrant peasants who agree to be permanently relocated in accordance with a schedule of conditions and of closely supervising them to make them comply with suggested farming methods. The AVV is also responsible for providing roads, wells, schools and dispensaries.

Five types of zones have been planned: reforestation zones (mostly planted with eucalyptus), dry crop zones, irrigated crop zones, livestock zones and, finally, tourist zones (reservations).

The goals of the AVV are ambitious. The figure put forward by its officials is 150,000 people working in the areas which the AVV expect to have organized by the year 2,000. Right now, 1,850 families (consisting of 8 members on an average) have been settled. This agency is thought to have a potential that goes beyond the scope of the usual ORD. It wants to encourage peasants to increase the added value of their products, for instance by doing the ginning operations in the case of cotton. When several dams, due to be built on the Voltas, are completed, the AVV intends to expand its sphere of action by going into industrial activities.

These results, this growth, are not achieved without creating a certain amount of tension with the ORD's. The ORD's point out that they are far from having the same financial and technical resources as the AVV which is why their activity is limited and only covers a small portion of the needs of just a few villages. They point out that, after all, the AVV works with the best human resources carefully selected from among the population of the ORD's.

In some areas, the AVV has one supervisor for every 25 agricultural units. These civil servants who are expected to do a lot since they have to give advice on farming methods as well as on matters of health, are better paid than the ORD supervisory staff. Those best qualified receive between 40,000 and 50,000 CFA francs per month.

The AVV argues that although it gets more substantial credits, some from international sources, that money is still insufficient to cover the wide scope of the tasks which it has to fulfill. The situation of the AVV treasury is a matter of concern. With running expenses in the order of 150 million CFA francs, the state only contributes 40 millions. The AVV's top officials want more external aid particularly to cover general expenses. They advocate a territorial decentralization of the AVV to avoid bottlenecks at central headquarters. They ask to be relieved of some of the tasks for which they are currently responsible: maintenance of roads, building of schools, training of women and so on.

The position of the AVV could eventually be strengthened as a result of the creation, in July-August 1980, of a bank specially geared to agricultural needs, the National Agricultural Credit Bank [CNCA]. Until now there was only a single National Development Bank for the entire economy. The AVV has agreed to become integrated in the system but wants to be granted a special status as a Regional Fund. Right now, the AVV can grant loans at an interest rate of 6 percent due to the external aid it receives and it wants to maintain this benefit for borrowing farmers (as long as their income does not reach a certain level allowing them to bear higher financial charges) while the CNCA will apply interest rates of about 10 percent.

Calling for special treatment in matters of agricultural credit, the AVV points out that its organization, of a horizontal type, is working along the lines of democratic participation of peasants in a "mutualist" type of system. In fact, in the initial stages, it will be very difficult for the CNCA to find peasants who are qualified to sit in the various boards of directors of the bank (local and regional boards, for instance). These positions will have to be filled by appointment rather than by election. On the other hand, the AVV has already tried to become structured. It has unit and village committees. There is a beginning of "participation" on the part of the peasants and this will prepare the ground for the emergence of an "elite" capable of playing a useful role in the mutualist credit system.

Creation of Vertical Structures

The problems confronting the ORD's are many and the government is looking for some way to reallocate their tasks. The present policy consists in saying that in the future, the ORD's must act as orchestra leaders on a regional level, that they must be a mere coordinating agency for the main purpose of ensuring an economic development, making the peasants receptive and persuading them to adopt suitable farming methods. It will no longer be a question of assessing the ORD's in terms of their rate of returns on investments. Their financial equilibrium presupposes that the peasants can shoulder the cost of the popularization of knowledge, something which seems impossible at present.

The tendency is to entrust the marketing activities to sectorial and vertical organizations. A case in point is the SOTIFEX for cotton. This company took over from the French Textile Company [CFDT]. The CFDT was obviously successful. It had an excellent supervisory staff and maintained a widespread and effective presence. All in all, the SOTIFEX represents the Voltaization of the CFDT which remains, however a partner of that company. It transports and markets the farmers' crops and, therefore, guarantees them an income. But SOTIFEX has also been asked not to neglect other crops, such as millet, sorghum, corn, groundnut, which should be encouraged by the example of what is done with cotton. And above all, the SOTIFEX uses part of the profits derived from the sale of its major product to subsidize farmers by giving them fertilizers, making more widespread use of the 20 to 30 HP small tractors which work for all kinds of crops. The activities of the supervisory personnel helps to avoid some of the mistakes made by some of the ORD's which did not have enough people on the field such as when they allowed the peasants to till the soil to a depth of 20 cms while the limit was 10 cms to avoid soil erosion.

The SOTIFEX, like the rest of the sectorial agencies, is in a better position to get bank loans, such as loans from the future Agricultural Credit Bank, because it can present a statement of receipts. Obviously, the same does not apply to the ORD's because, apart from the SOTIFEX refunds and the cotton tax, they are financed by government grants and international aid. Should these funds be withdrawn, the ORD's could no longer meet their commitments and banks hesitate to give a favorable answer to their requests for loans. Therefore the national credit policy encourages the development of vertical structures dealing with marketing. A National Grain Marketing Office (OFNACER) has been set up but its results are far from being as conclusive as those achieved by the SOTIFEX. This office markets about 7,500 tons of grain out of a total estimated production of 1.1 million tons. The situation in the sphere of rice farming illustrates this failure. The peasants are not responding to the organizers' suggestions urging them to improve their farming methods, to plant good quality seeds, to use fertilizers and a team of animals. What the peasants want is to be sure that they can sell their crops at a guaranteed price. But the OFNACER does not have the means to effectively embark on that policy. The price which the farmer gets for his rice is set at 63 francs per kilo but imported Pakistani rice is cheaper is Upper Volta. Local rice is not very much in demand among the consumers: it is badly cleaned and its appearance puts people off. Asian rice is more to the taste of the buyers.

The OFNACER has been forced to adopt a very strange financial policy. It receives international aid in the form of food supplies and a large part of its funds come from the sale of these donated foodstuffs. With that money, the OFNACER can engage in small-scale marketing activities for its national grain. The OFNACER is trying to build up reserve stocks, to influence the market by buying or selling depending on the price fluctuations, but it is sadly short of funds. Finally, since this office cannot guarantee markets for the farmers' crops its effectiveness is almost nil while its expenses are high.

Some experts believe that on a normal year, Upper Volta could not only meet its food requirements but also export food if a system could be organized to market, transport and store foodstuffs. It is patently obvious that exports do take place towards neighboring countries, such as Niger, but without official sanction.

The UVOCAM (Voltan Union of Agricultural and Market-Gardening Cooperatives) is another vertical structure operating mainly in the sphere of exports (green beans, leeks and so on). At the present time, this cooperative is losing money and its storage capacity is not fully utilized. In 1978, the UVOCAM handled 2,500 tons of produce and 2,000 tons in 1979.

Pragmatic Development

For their part, foreign or international agencies for development aid tend to offer a very flexible solution. Their solution is the "enclave-projects" dealing with a given region or a specific commodity as long as these projects are consistent with the potential of some or other area. This method has the advantage of avoiding the usual administrative heaviness. A "project" has no legal entity in a way but it enjoys financial autonomy. It is supervised by the Department of Agricultural Services of the Ministry of Rural Development and will keep technical control over the operation because its activities are considered to be on an experimental basis.

A typical example is the fruit project created in the form of a special budget account. It has already produced tangible results. In the past, there was a shortage of fruit supplies in Upper Volta. There was, for instance, a whole smuggling operation for bananas from the Ivory Coast. Railroad employees went as far as to conceal stems of bananas in the carriage axles of the RAN (Abidjan-Niger Railway Administration). Today, papayas, pomegranates and bananas grown in Upper Volta's plantations, mostly around Ouagadoudou, can be found in the market. This is why there is thought of turning the fruit project into a sectorial structure which could take the name of "Volta-Fruit" and would consist of production and marketing bodies and, perhaps, foreign importers.

Among the 18 projects currently under study, one could mention the Bagre project for two dams used for irrigation and electricity supply, and the Biessourou project to grow three rotation crops in an area of 210 hectares. These two programs fall under the supervision of the AVV.

The Central Fund for Economic Coop ration [CCCE] is now discussing a project involving the Eastern Regional Development Office which covers a large area (about one-fourth of the territory of Upper Volta). The area has a rich soil and is scarcely populated. In the long term, and from an optimistic viewpoint, the plan is to create 40,000 agricultural units. The CCCE thinks that for this first development project in that region, it would be better to select only the two areas which are best suited for this tentative experiment and allocate to them all the available credits. Should the results be satisfactory, the operation could be gradually expanded. The Voltan Government does not agree with this view. It talks about a "Balkanization" of the country and is afraid to see privileged regions springing by the side of abandoned zones. A solution must be found which reconciles the different viewpoints and meets, as far as possible, the requirements of the government, those of the Eastern ORD as well as those of the project's main sponsor; all of which is not an easy task.

The description of these Voltan structures leads to several conclusions. When it became an independent country, Upper Volta, like Togo[1] or the Central African Republic, opted for a system of integrated development. This is a very difficult policy to follow. It is relatively easy to acquire a technique, a "knack", when the task in hand is to achieve progress in a specific sphere of farming. But to change people's attitude of mind, to persuade them to change their habits in order to improve their education, their health and their productivity, is a far more complicated task. It requires very competent and versatile cadres, field men who are "jacks-fo-all-trades" and are inspired by a certain amount of faith as well as being well paid. To put it in a nutshell, this system of development is the most ambitious and arduous course and it costs a lot.

In this regard, Upper Volta has met with serious difficulties. Due to its lack of means, the ORD's policy seems to have run out of steam. On the other hand, the AVV which is a special regional organization with more substantial credits at its disposal, has achieved more conclusive results. With money one can always increase the number of supervisory cadres and, if pushed, one can always put one expert behind each peasant. But then, one must make serious comparisons based on cost-effectiveness.

In the case of some crops, Upper Volta has decided to follow the path of a vertical sectorial organization copying the example set by the Ivory Coast, a country which adopted this model, in the form of state-owned companies, when it became independent. As a result, SOTIFEX, OFNAGER and UVOCAM were created. These agencies have been successful insofar as they have been able to control the marketing operations and get financial means (means which are also necessary to control the marketing operations).

But when productivity is all one worries about, there is a risk of forgetting the people and since 1977 there has been a change in the agricultural policy of the Ivory Coast in an attempt to give priority to the human and social spheres which had been overlooked by the very effective and brilliant technical methods applied to the products.

In the sphere of development, the big danger lies in adopting a philosophy a priori then trying to blindly draw all the theoretical conclusions. In this sphere, it is advisable to be, first of all, pragmatic and to make assessments based on results. But in this question, Upper Volta has been so far handicapped. All its development projects have been adequately studied in advance but they have rarely taken stock of the situation afterwards.

(1) In Togo, SORAD (Regional Planning and Development Company) has total authority in matters of development.

Depending on the periods, on the temperament and competence of the leaders in charge of the economic sectors, it is a good thing to reappraise the doctrines from time to time, without creating instability of course, and to avoid carrying the principles to their logical conclusions as it is good to make policy changes when the facts gathered indicate that a system has weaknesses or faults. This "reappraisal" is what the Ivory Coast is attempting to do today. That country is trying to evolve towards an integrated development without abandoning the sectorial development which has had overall positive results. It is this kind of change, but in the opposite direction, that is taking place in Upper Volta under the pressure of its needs. Upper Volta wants to superimpose a sectorial development system on the integrated model.

ARMY OBSERVES NINETEENTH ANNIVERSARY

Defense Minister Speaks

Ouagadougou L'OBSERVATEUR in French 4 Nov 80 pp 1,4,5,10

[Text] One November 1961 to 1 November 1980: the Upper Voltan Army is 19 years old. This anniversary was celebrated all across our land last Saturday at the same time Christians were celebrating All Saints Day. It was 3 January Square in Ouagadougou which was the site for the event which included the speech by the Defense Minister Francois Bouda, awards, a very nice parade, and the inauguration of the new Ouagadougou officer's mess.

We offer you the entire text of the speech made by Francois Bouda, minister of defense and veteran affairs:

"When every year about the same time our National Army finds itself in the limelight of the news and public interest, it sees this anniversary as the occasion to recall first of all that it is, in its broadest scope, the army of the people in the service of the people.

In spite of traditional flourish which is associated with its background, military spirit is not a matter of strutting around for pleasure, nor is it improving one's self-satisfaction. Quite the contrary; the sharp and continuous awareness of duty, the feeling of being in the service of a great cause, and accepting in advance all the sacrifices that circumstances can require contribute at all levels of the hierarchy towards the creation of that natural aristocracy which is called military spirit.

And that military spirit, more particularly in these developing countries of ours, must encompass an area of concern expanded to cover the aspirations and the needs of the greatest number of people. That means that the feeling of being special, which can be sensed as much by military men themselves as by people not in the military, is in reality the expression of a complex feeling in which respect dominates, respect which the spirit of any vocation which is fully shouldered naturally produces in all the circumstances in which it becomes manifest.

And so our National Army stands guard, its gaze fixed on the borders, but well beyond our immediate territorial borders, to the extent that foreign struggles for influence which are growing more intense and specific represent challenges and dangers, since, after Asia and the Middle East, Africa in its turn is reaching stormy seas. That explains our duty to be vigilant.

Therefore, our National Army has the eminently difficult job of combining flawless national patriotism, limitless and unmeasurable availability in the economic area in relation to needs and means which still remain irreconcilable, and perhaps even also remaining sometimes the ultimate reference point in circumstances of national safety.

There, Mister President, president of the republic, head of our armed forces, is the tough and stern mission which our National Army, under your high authority, intends to take on, without fear and without weakness. No one can doubt that carrying out this assignment is perilous, since the means given for it could never be sufficient to guard so many fronts. It makes up for it with devotion, selflessness, and patriotism.

Of course the secrecy which must surround matters of national defense forbids such a subject to be taken up in a public speech. So I will allow myself to go over certain other areas, in a theoretical sense secondary ones but nonetheless important ones because of the effort devoted to them.

But I must first of all, after having regretfully saluted the departure of General Baba Sy, express our total satisfaction to have found in the person of General Bila Zagre a chief of general staff whose good points, competence and determination constitute the best guarantees for the future of our military establishment. And thus, without dramatic disruption, with the smiling but firm authority which we know him for, the new chief of general staff has undertaken, and pursued with diligence, actions intended to maintain and develop the dynamism of the armed forces while continuing activities previously begun.

I will content myself with saying that in the first instance these different actions are concerned with discipline, training, relations of the army to the population at large and military-paramilitary relations. Then, in the troubled area of activities for building up the nation, new formulas are being sought and tried out in order to best respond to these needs in the general context of the means which can be devoted to it.

Similarly, the establishment of an independent battalion of engineers, including armed and service compenents, seems to be able to effectively contribute to making the military presence and activity within our development institutions even more evident. This battalion is in fact called on to work in close collaboration with the different units of the National Army, with national and regional development activities in mind.

Also in this way repairs to the Ouahigouya-Djibo Road, begun in 1978, should be completed next December; furthermore, this battalion will as an additional mission be constructing military buildings in their entirety and exercise Army prerogatives in the area of city planning and government policy on property.

In order to permit our National Army to take on this whole range of responsibilities in the best of psychological conditions, it would be advisable to supply the officer corps and NCO's with the basic material facilities which are indispensable; with this as a goal, one should mention:

- the Officers Club-Mess, which is supposed to be opened this very day;

- the armed forces store, which is supposed to open up for business in the near future; and

- the NCO Mess-Hotel complex which will be in operation soon.

But the Army is first and foremost the quality of the men who make it up, at every level without exception.

Therefore a considerable effort has been carried on which I think can be already considered conclusive. Beside the actions aiming to restore strict discipline, individual and collective training in the troop units has been modernized and emphasized in order to perfect the quality of initiative, the quality of judgment, the field aptitude and the authority of leaders at all levels.

In parallel fashion, the improvement of NCO's by training courses and job training periods has been increased all during 1980.

For its part the Kamboince Military Academy, in spite of the delays due to the inadequacy of financial resources, is meant to make it possible to achieve a more effective training structure of officer personnel.

General culture for cadres is planned out from August 1980 to October 1981 on the basis of a series of lectures on various subjects dealing with military, political, economic, social and cultural fields.

This quick panarama seems to me to be explanatory enough to show that our national army, with means which are of course still modest, displays an all-round dynamism, forges ahead, and is still a school of responsibility and efficiency for the best service of the national cause.

I will permit myself to make a particular reference to that elite corps of which the National Gendarmerie is made up, which has fortunately always been able to succeed in combining its paramilitary obligations with courteous, indeed even friendly, relations with the groups of people with which it must most particularly make a point of having contact with.

Satisfaction of the Government

To everyone: officers, NCO's, men in the ranks, I express my satisfaction and that of the president of the Republic and that of the government. Certainly everything is still far from being perfect, everyone would want to go faster and make even further efforts. But, such as it is, with the means we have at our disposal, I say that our National Army does a good job.

Long live the National Army.

Long live Upper Volta."

Upper Voltan Armed Forces

Ouagadougou L'OBSERVATEUR in French 11 Nov 80 p 5

[Text] In the economic capital nothing special marked this 19th anniversary of the establishment of the Upper Voltan armed forces. The varied events organized for the occasion aroused the same enthusiasm and the same participation of the Bobo peoples as in the past. So it was in front of a large audience and important public figures of the city that the military review ceremony took place on Liberte Avenue (Railroad Station Square). This ceremony, which started at 0900 with the salute to the colors, went on with the troop review performed by the prefect of Hauts-Bassins Sie Bernard Sib and by Lieutenant Colonel Mamadou Djerma, commander of the 3d Commando Infantry Regiment. Then about 20 recipients received the military medal from the hands of Lieutenant Colonel Nena Traore, assistant commander-in-chief of the 3d RIC [Infantry Commando Regiment] and from the hands of Company Commander Adama Henri Kabore. A sizable parade which had only military and para-military participation ended that morning ceremony of 1 November. The evening was marked by varied sports and folkloric events.

JOURNALIST REVIEWS RECENT EVENTS

Dakar AFRICA in French Nov 80 pp 39, 42

[Article by Agathon: "Africa and the Fall Term"]

[Text] It is not a balance sheet, as if it were the end of the year. History flows in its dramatic everyday fashion, and this is only a way of taking stock in order, if possible, to understand the course of the Third World they say is adrift, engaged in wars--threatened with desertification, with worse misfortunes. At any rate, when the proposed equations bear such terms as City/Country, and among all three ages the problems of the intellectual and the illiterate, the well-off and the unemployed, the politician and the citizen, there are no simple arguments or easy solutions. The directing teams had before them, beside the Euro-American model, local Islamic animist traditions, the reminder of solid structures. All of this was apparently irreconcilable with the ("neocolonial") ruling interests. Some tried to resolve the contradiction by the seizure of the apparatus of military authority, supposedly organized, unified and orderly. But to lead the state is not to rule over a barracks. Where do we stand at this moment when the last quarter of 1980 heralds what may properly be called a "term."

Algeria. Of course Boumedienne is no longer there, and it is always difficult to fill the shoes of charismatic heroes. This is history's injustice toward their successors. What is emerging is first of all the difficulty in organizing the government so it can govern with flexibility and authority, and then the problem of the Berber cultural dissidence has exploded. It would not have to be granted any more importance than is given to the Breton demands in France, but in the end Algeria is not France, and any unresolved sociocultural problem can look like danger there. The gaps have been closed, but the last word has not been said; the road to unity is long and the program of accelerated industrialization, favored by oil, has also not benefited all regions.

Angola. The Angola of the MPLA did not put an end to the Savimbi miseries. The latter, equipped and armed by South Africa, although he does not control part of the territory, has at least the potential of impeding, with nuisance raids, about a quarter of the agricultural production, and constitutes a continual threat to the oil installations, which he is not attacking, no doubt so as not to displease his potential Western allies. Which goes to show that on the African chessboard no one can play by the rules. Colonization gave us fatherlands that were wrung out in many cases, and is still continuing to wring us out. And the other countries of Africa are not giving Angola the diplomatic support it needs, because of the Cuban myth.

The international conspiracy is enormous. South Africa uses Angola as the theater for its aggressive maneuvers, with SWAPO as the excuse. In South Africa, in Namibia there are associated interests of Euro-American financial cartels that want only a South African peace in Namibia. But Angola needs an independent Namibia on two accounts: to enable it to exploit its uranium (which is on the border) and to give its direction to the Cunene Dam, for which Namibia is a natural customer. Namibia is potentially one of the richest countries in Africa. Its current budget exceeds 200,000,000,000 CFA francs.

Benin. Contradictory news: galloping inflation, arrested inflation, recurrent inflation. Benin has undoubtedly been unable to escape the price explosion, but it has had nothing compared with what the African populations are suffering elsewhere. An increase of around 20 to 30 percent is mere sport to the prices in the other capitals. Moreover, to Kerekou's credit, the military regime has found a modus vivendi with the intellectuals and other school people, at the risk of swelling the civil service. But wages remain modest, speculation is arrested and the watchword is self-consumption within the limit and "even beyond the possible," those who are used to imported products are complaining.

Cameroon. A kind of fair weather imposed by a strong government on the explosive groups. It also happens that this government is intelligent and is aiming at more than its intellectual dissidents, at a certain good for the people, a certain authority for the people, so that its means (now including oil) may enable it to organize. Although the African heads of state are regarded as being inconsistent, no one has yet said this about Ahidjo, who at the moment is playing the democracy game in order to achieve the real thing.

Central African Republic. Named president without constitution in circumstances that are well known, David Dacko--inconsistent, unmethodical, thin-skinned, spiteful and, what is more, disputed by the other "historic" heads of the conspiracy that overthrew Bokassa, may be on the way to being thrown out by his protectors. He will not be lamented; given the extent of his nonexistence, his ministerial reshuffling, including the dismissal of Henri Maidou, will probably not save him.

Congo. Mariem N'Gouabi is dead, long live Mariem N'Gouabi! He was never more useless dead than alive , because no one ever wanted the living N'Gouabi in the institutions. That death really must have served someone or something. We have a partial answer. In one of those complicated returns of the dialectic between zero and the infinite, Mariem N'Gouabi died to preserve the Mariem N'Gouabi myth, a certain idea of revolution that he may have been on the way to selling cheaply, in the company of Mr Biayenda and Mr Massemba-Debat, who were also sacrificed to pure, harsh revolution. Unless it was to a few ambitions without any real plan. What is serious is that bets are still open as to what tree of freedom and progress is nourishing those three august corpses with its roots. No one can say that the regime is inconsistent, but everything is moving slowly and does not make us forget Lissouba and some others. Forward leaps are required, not just jogging along, for history to agree to forget the price paid for certain items of progress. The price everyone is paying every day in Brazza, which is the freedom to be, to go, to live as one wishes, to organize. The burial of unionism is in every way too high a price. Labor unions are the life and the voice of the grass roots.

The Horn of Africa. A current joke among "Yoteh" afficionados is to exclaim when one of the partners has advanced a decisive piece, "When you have this horn planted in your backside it's hard to sit down."

This "horn" of Africa, which concerns Ethiopia, Somalia, Djibouti, plus all the countries through which the Strait of Ormuz is an umbilical cord from Iran and the whole Indian Ocean, may be going to keep up from sleeping.

Because Syad Barre has an old dream, an obsession on which he has already wagered the destiny of Somalia and which he is ready to hand over as soon as he has the money and the weapons. He has the money, he has the weapons--from America, naturally, on the pretext that the oil route is threatened. Oh, those American strategists, crude, silly men, rude rednecks who lead the Carter choirboys around by the nose.

Who is threatening the oil route? In truth, no one is. Only the USSR and the United States are face to face. At the level of power they both have attained, both are very attentive to where they put their feet, and for the USSR there is no question of cutting off the West's supply. But in the U.S. the machine that produces arms and weapons when it is blocked from producing refrigerators and washing machines is operating under tension.

China is pushing for action, because it is absolutely imperative for China that the two great powers have a go at each other and China finally gets a chance to deploy its long-term strategy.

Peace, then? War? As long as the great powers do not see defeat written somewhere they will continue their pressure with the insane assurance of any power against circumstances and time. They may stop in time, but someone is going to pay heavily, and that will inevitably be the Somalian people.

Ivory Coast. Houphouet-Boigny is conducting his prosperity crusade softly, but with a burst of angry indignation when he feels betrayed. At such times he bangs on the table and overturns the game. He did it once in recent years, spectacularly; he did it again several weeks ago by brutally removing his electoral protection from those who had learned to count more on him than on their own virtues. He has just sharply rebuked those in control of the Western markets who cynically play on the drop in tropical products, the better to ruin and domesticate the third world. "Egotists!" he hurled at them, announcing that he would hold the cocoa front to the end.

Egypt. When a policy fails it is changed, even if its protagonists have to leave the scene, temporarily or for good. This is the law in a democracy. But are we in a democracy in the land of the Pharaohs? Sadat has failed, lamentably because of a gang leader who is beyond rehabilitation, Begin. And here he is, like a defeathered rooster persisting in vainly scratching the dirt to encourage his hens to peck away at an absent grain. If this were a democracy, the people would carry him quite gently to a retirement home for old gullible fools. It would be time for Egypt to re-enlist the Arab nation. But does the "Arab nation" exist? To see the fireworks that are being prepared on three or four intra-Arab borders, it doesn't look like it.

Ethiopia. In accordance with the famous well-known inviolability, Ethiopia has just seen its rights to Ogaden validated. Will Somalia be satisfied with that? And why would it obey when elsewhere Morocco is rejecting the inviolability, crossing swords with the Polisario in the Western Sahara? Which goes to show that the right in this century still boils down to a matter of seizing it and hanging onto it.

Gabon. Gabon's image, as perceived by the other African countries is that of a country whose borders are bristling. Suspicious customs officers and policemen go over passports and other documents with a fine-tooth comb, closing the gate on the slightest pretext. Actually, a defend-Gabon-at-any-price-against-foreign-predators mentality has developed, the predator always being the black brother.

Now, it is true that Gabon lacks men. One has only to glance at the streets: it lacks bootblacks; it lacks saleswomen with displays. No doubt it is not indispensable for our societies to serve their apprenticeship to the levels of mediocrity, if a society's means and its system of training have enabled it to enter in one fell swoop a higher level of services and consumption. Indeed! Except for 100 families and the technical assistants, no one really has the means to pay for supplies and services. In fact entry should be allowed for more farmers and small trades and small services should be allowed to flourish in the hands of foreign dioulas [translation unknown] and mandingues [translation unknown] who have learned from long experience. That is how the United States was made, by boldly absorbing anyone and everyone. That is how Brazil swiftly became a subempire. We are not proposing that American genocide of its first occupants would have been a good idea (in Gabon, moreover, there are almost none), nor do we suggest looking down on the natives the way Brazil looks down on its Indians and blacks, but is disciplined and harmonious integration possible? At the moment, in any case, there reigns at all levels suspicion of the "profiteering" brothers whom they have nevertheless been forced by circumstances to welcome.

Ghana. Rawlings is not dead, not dead at all. He has made for himself a noisy and hopeful political following, mostly young people, who aspire only to his return to power. But the captain of the air force no longer wears a uniform and so is no longer able to decree the law by force. What will happen? The electoral procedure? This is more than a possibility , if he has enough breath left to wait. In the present state of mind, it is out of the question for this "outsider" without a party to be refused the right to create a new party; if that happened, rioting would break out all by itself. In the meantime Jerry Rawlings, the innocent with a million children, is doing his training in politics. Does he have time to learn?

Gambia. The microstate. Who believes it is possible for Gambia to run itself, with a chief of state, a cabinet, a chamber of representatives, diplomats? The idea is barely more sensible for more extensive and richer countries. Africa's insane gamble--to bring to life 56 state apparatuses--is shown here in its most visible form. Fifty-six states formed, plus their oppositions, latent or explicit, clandestine or overt.

In Gambia, where they are dealing with a democracy, there is an opposition being conducted against the POP [expansion unknown], the party in power, by the Revolutionary Socialist Party, led by the brilliant Dr G.L. Georges.

There is also a parliamentary opposition party, but this "His Majesty's Opposition" is not very convincing on African land. It has too much the air of what it is, a kind of shadow behind the government.

While the Georges Party writes slogans on the walls, popular meetings of denunciation are held. In truth, inasmuch as Georges' party has not proposed merging Gambia with Senegal, it is hard to see what it has to offer, other than the present kind of gamble on smuggling and tourism. But Dr Georges has a large charger, the same one that is prancing from the borders of the Sahara to Mr Botha's borders: corruption.

And he is no longer Mr Georges, an attorney in a suit; he is, by the force of circumstances, Dr Georges against the dragon.

Guinea-Bissau. The war will not take place. Neither the oil war with Guinea-Conakry nor the wars predicted by the prophets of doom--the war of secession between Bissau and Cape Verde, the civil war between half-castes and blacks. The cultural and structural heritage of Cabral is still solidly holding the whole thing together.

Liberia. Sergeant Doe, who is in favor of marrying the suffering people to the government, has just received a piece of very bad news: Liberia's iron is finished. There are still a few traces here and there, but Nimba's 70-percent-content iron is exhausted. Thirty years of searching for it in the Liberian hills, it is all over. By way of forest, the good people are going to be left with a landscape of lunar hills, of "seas of desolation." And as if that were not enough, rubber is plummeting, like the neighbor Houphouet-Boigny's cocoa, like Senegal's peanuts, like all the tropical foodstuffs watched over by sunburned men. And since, according to the proverb, trouble always comes in threes, Liberia having no currency except the dollar, the devaluation of the American currency has hit it headlong, causing it to lose one third of its liquid assets in importing merchandise. The innocents get the scraps. Generous America has just granted Liberia, with many admonitions as to the wisdom of it, a loan of $11,500,000. Eleven million, that is as much as each ore tanker was carrying in its hold on its departure from the Bong Mine wharf. The West is unfeeling.

An English-speaking magazine has just published a photo of Sergeant Doe embracing Mme Tolbert, whom he made a widow. The European immediately rolls his eyes upwards. In the name of a certain logic. The cause is what is missing from their humanism, the bearers of a logic more profound, underground, vital, the unique truth, the truth that knits together the survivors of massacres. Because they are still being threatened and therefore are not free to let their hatred go. In the logic of the old tribal society, the murderer was embracing the widow in order to give her family a protector.

Morocco. Morocco is claiming victory, to put itself on the "right" side of the world, which is not the side the heart is on. For our part, we confess we have never paid any attention to the historic record of the Western Sahara. After all, if we had to go back to the Duke of Aquitaine, or more simply still to Napoleon, the entire map of Europe would have to be redone in the name of certain legitimacies. And why not give Alsace and Lorraine back to Germany? What seemed to us an affront to the entire world was to have negotiated with Spain, even while remaining a member of the OAU, a treaty that rendered null and void the unanimous resolution of the OAU members on the inherited borders. And then to have disguised under the pious masquerade of a country march the entry of tanks and cannons into the desert.

Naturally, it might have been foreseen that the POLISARIO would lose. The absurd--but sadly so for man--nature of the situation is that the POLISARIO is losing in the field at the very moment when it seemed to have a diplomatic victory within arm's reach. The good intentions are foiled by the facts and in the third world what remains to be done, since it is such a disparate mosaic of weightless cells, will establish a new defeat in the Western Sahara.

Senegal. Senegal sets an example of a country that is capable of changing within its own structures without imperiling the social whole. It has evolved from monopartism to multipartism without making big waves, it has taken in stride the passing from a regime of more-or-less closely watched freedom of expression to one of acceptance of verbal release, without subsequent gathering of clouds and tornados. The administration makes its mea culpa over certain economic options without any need, for all that, to sacrifice scapegoats on public altars. The principle of socialistic option is not being challenged, although in practice this must be, if not a sharp check, at least a regime of carefully-watched experimentation.

On its side the private sector, which the situation would seem to favor, is not without worries. It is well realized in that sector that there is no question of returning to "papa's" privatization, a kind of regime of companies with more-or-less monopolistic charters. What face will the future take on under these conditions? Is Africa ripe for free enterprise, that is to say for the game--and no more than that--of the laws of the marketplace? State-owned markets, for example, or even the distribution of quotas or currency, require that the cards be laid down, the hands kept beneath the table. Otherwise there could be no question of free exploitation under the pretext of free enterprise. The two watchwords remain: control and returns on the profits, the logical corollary being reinvestment, but this will be done quite naturally as the national operators increase.

AFRICA 'IN DISTRESS' OVER FOOD

London WEST AFRICA in English 1 Dec 80 pp 2404, 2432

[Text]

AFRICA'S food problems were emphasised last week when the Secretary-General of the Organisation of African Unity, Mr. Edem Kodjo, called at the headquarters in Rome of the Food and Agricultural Organisation of the United Nations. Africa is in distress and in need of emergency assistance, he said.

"At the end of this year, as we enter the third decade of our independence, times are so hard for the African continent, the socio-economic situation is so fragile, that its future remains an enigma," Mr. Kodjo said. The first two development decades have done little to improve the situation of the African people in the field of agriculture and food production, he said. The past 20 years have witnessed a gradual erosion of African agriculture resulting in a catastrophic food situation.

The FAO Director-General, Mr. Edouard Saouma, in his reply, assured Mr. Kodjo "that Africa had always been and would remain at the core of FAO's preoccupations." He went on: "As I did in September by convening a meeting of potential donors, I will attempt to mobilise even further the international community in favour of a massive assistance programme for this continent in the spirit of the recent resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations."

In its efforts directed towards Africa, the FAO Director-General said he knew that he could count on the OAU and added: "As political expression 'par excellence' of the African continent, it appears to us a natural partner in the fight against hunger, a fight just as political as it is technical and economic."

According to the OAU Secretary-General, "one of the principal causes of the drama afflicting the primary sector in Africa resulted from a wrong conception of the development policy, a development policy which had failed to integrate agricultural development into the overall strategy of the economic development of the African countries." It was fortunate that the Lagos Plan of Action, drafted with the assistance of FAO, "promotes an endogenic and Africa-oriented development by integrating all the African economics." It also had the advantage of "integrating the African farmer into the true development process."

The OAU Secretary-General paid tribute to "the constant efforts of FAO in America and to its multiple activities. This close co-operation was to crystalise itself by a co-operation agreement in all fields between OAU and FAO," with the establishment of the tripartite FAO/WHO/OAU Commission on Food and Nutrition in Africa. It was in this framewrok that the OAU wishes the establishment of another joint commission for an inter-African programme against drought, desertification and other natural calamities.

Food Warning

The Director-General of the UN Food and Agriculture Organisation told a meeting of FAO's council in Rome that next year's expected world food shortage would hit African countries particularly hard. "We are faced next year with a truly alarming position in Africa and another potential world food crisis." Mr. Saouma said: "The average African now has 10 per cent less to eat than 10 years ago. We can speak of a veritable African food crisis which will last for some time." An FAO report has forecast an increase in African food production next year of 2 per cent and a population increase of 3 per cent.

He said world population growth and an increasing refugee problem were partly to blame for the shortage.

"There are 80m. more mouths to feed this year," Dr. Saouma added. "There will be 2,000m. more by the end of the century and most of them will be in poor countries."

Mr. Saouma said: "There are now about 9m. refugees in the world, and in Somalia alone about 1.5m. refugees have been added to a population of only about 4m.

Grain Storage

Individual nations should create their own grain reserves to prevent food shortages and dramatic increases in world grain prices, according to a study by the Economic Policy Council, an independent American non-profit organisation.

The study recommended that developing nations in particular make a commitment to a grain reserves policy of establishing stocks and developing storage facilities. It proposed that organisations provide aid for developing nations to build grain stocks.

CAMEROON FACES BURDEN OF PROVIDING FOR CHADIAN REFUGEES

Dakar AFRICA in French Nov 80 pp 20-21

[Article by Henri Bandolo: "Cameroon and Its Chadians"]

[Text] On two different occasions within the space of less than a month, the Cameroonian Government was forced to address protests to the Chadian authorities, protests which, although they were courteous, were no less vigorous.

The protests stemmed from disturbing incidents considered to be a serious threat to the safety of the people in the little Cameroonian town of Kousseri in the extreme northern region of the country, separated from the Chadian capital only by a river, the Logone. Since March, 200,000 Chadians fleeing the inferno of Ndjamena have sought refuge in the town. While Kousseri now remains the closest and most easily accessible asylum for the many hapless victims of the fratricidal war in Chad, it is no longer necessarily the safest refuge. Because of their proximity to the field of battle, the people in this part of Cameroon are not only subjected to the constant rumble of gunfire from the fighting on the other side of the river, making their nights increasingly unbearable. They are no longer safe from stray bullets either.

On 22 September, shells fired from the Chadian capital fell on the Kousseri hospital, where the wounded arrive in waves. The incident caused four deaths and gave rise to the first protest by the Cameroonian Government addressed to the leaders of the different warring factions in Chad.

First Warning

Actually, bullets fired from Ndjamena and shells frequently find their way into Cameroon since the resumption of hostilities, sometimes causing quite serious wounds. However, Cameroonian authorities, anxious not to poison the situation, had always tried to attribute these incidents to the quite comprehensible nervousness of the Chadian participants, who are no longer responsible for just one such mistake. For the first time, human lives have been lost and the Cameroonian authorities, deeming that this was a dangerous turning point for the safety of people living on the border, issued their first warning to the different Chadian leaders. The shells that fell on the Kousseri hospital may in fact have been the result of a deliberate act, especially since the wounded being cared for belong to the different Chadian rival factions which could as a result have been led to an abusive interpretation of their right of pursuit, thereby bringing their quarrels onto Cameroonian soil.

What is even worse, the Air Force was involved in the battle for Ndjamena and an unidentified aircraft violated Cameroonian air space, giving rise to another protest by Cameroonian authorities. In deploring this new incident and while reiterating its appeals for national reconciliation in Chad, the Cameroonian Government informed President Goukouni Oueddei in substance that it intended to take measures to guarantee the security of its territory, its borders and its people. The more precise tone of this second warning was noted by observers aware of the great reserve of the Cameroonian chief of state, who is not in the habit of using threats in relations with his neighbors. Nor have occasions been lacking in recent years, when President Ahidjo had serious reasons to manifest his impatience militarily in the face of what might have appeared to be provocations. But warmongering is definitely not his greatest fault! However, from there to allowing Cameroon's soil and air space to be turned into a theater of operations for a war foreign to the Cameroonian people is like the Rubicon and the Cameroonian authorities are having none of it.

Growing Irritation

These protests, which are undoubtedly the first of their type which the Yaounde Government has addressed officially and publicly to another African country, express quite well the growing irritation overtaking the Cameroonians since they have had the difficult experience of this second war on their borders, the first having been the one in Nigeria. While in the previous case, the Cameroonian Government did -- while remaining outside the conflict itself -- give its moral support to the central government in Lagos in order to safeguard the national integrity of Nigeria against a breakup when threatened by the secession attempt of its eastern province, the conditions are much more complex in Chad.

Chad is also threatened with a split. The different feuding factions nevertheless continue to proclaim their attachment to the territorial integrity of the country and the idea of secession does not seem to have made any headway or gained any backers. It is more precisely the conquest of power that is at stake. There is here no particularly elevated subject for debate that would justify the Cameroonian Government's defense of any ideas other than those founded on national reconciliation and peace. Therefore, while associating itself with the efforts, Cameroon is careful to refrain from any acts or even opinions that might give rise to an interpretation or use in an affair in which the different protagonists seek only signs of support. The Cameroonians have therefore opted for noninterference, neutrality and solidarity with regard to all the Chadian people, who are living through the painful conflicts of civil war.

And yet, this neutrality of the Cameroonian Government has brought it more than praises, even if President Goukouni Oueddei, when in Yaounde, was anxious to express his gratitude to the Cameroonians for the humanitarian aid given to the victims of the war and their contribution to peace efforts. Recriminations are not lacking, beginning with those of the leaders of the different rival factions in Chad, for in order to mark their impartiality, the Cameroonian authorities treat the wounded from all sides involved in the conflict without discrimination and take in all those seeking asylum without distinctions as to their allegiances. Any faction wishing to have its men benefit from preferential treatment will naturally be irritated over this neutrality that helps everyone, making the chances of all adversaries equal. One may well think that it is not always to Hissein Habre's liking to learn that President Ahidjo received Goukouni Oueddei, who is probably not particularly pleased either that his rival should find similar treatment from the Cameroonian Government. However, Hissein Habre's stays in Yaounde are surrounded by an official discretion that is quite understandable, inasmuch as President Ahidjo's government joined in the Lagos accords making Goukouni Oueddei the president of the National Union Government of Chad. Consequently, it is the latter who receives the honors of protocol, albeit very reserved.

The Cameroonian Government's position is even more difficult and requires even greater subtlety when it is a matter of arranging passage through its territory for spokesmen from the different Chadian factions traveling abroad to plead their case -- to negotiate arms shipments, for example. The fact is that the closest and safest airfield for the Chadian leaders is in Cameroonian territory. It is the best way out. While Cameroonian authorities can prevent the weapons acquired from passing through their territory, how on the other hand can they oppose the forced passage of those who go to negotiate those weapons supplies?

Kousseri: Excess

But it is in the small spot of Kousseri that the Cameroonians are paying most dearly for their neutrality and humanity. Until March, Kousseri was a peaceful small town of 10,000 inhabitants. However, located right across from Ndjamena, it has seen its population inflated to excess. It was thought that calm would return to the Chadian capital rather rapidly, limiting the exodus of its people to the Cameroonian shore to reasonable numbers. The earliest arrivals were able to find loding with residents without posing too many problems for them, but as the fighting in Ndjamena increased in intensity, Kousseri began to swell, becoming one of the most heavily populated cities in Cameroon within the space of just a few months.

The Chadian refugees now number over 200,000. Some came with nothing, only managing to save their skins and bring their families, wives and children with them. Others brought a few pans -- but nothing in them. Every day they are followed by the many wounded, either soldiers or innocent victims.

Caught short but determined to help, the Cameroonian Government organized aid, housing refugees and the wounded in makeshift shelters and asking all the people to join in a great national solidarity effort. The funds gathered had to stretch for care, food and shelter, but soon proved to be woefully inadequate. Despite the strictness of Cameroonian authorities in the distribution of food and medicine, a situation fostering all kinds of trafficking was bound to develop inasmuch as human misfortune breeds black marketing and illicit prices and poisons the relations of an increasingly difficult co-existence. Obviously, the situation is still far from that seen in Lebanon, but while the Cameroonian people continue to demonstrate remarkable calm, the increase in incidents such as those causing the Yaounde Government to protest to Chadian authorities can only intensify tension in Cameroon, where the people are already bearing the burden of the human and material by-products of war.

And yet, international opinion knows little, if anything, about the considerable sacrifices made by Cameroon to provide its 200,000 Chadian refugees with the indispensable basics, especially since the help expected from other countries does not come. It is true that the Cameroonian authorities oppose using publicity, for it is a tradition in that country not to make too much of an ado over a good deed so as to protect the pride of the beneficiary. Furthermore, being very constant, Cameroon's aid to the Chadian refugees is not manifested by ostentatious acts which spotty, sporadic action seems to need. And yet, it constitutes the major portion of the aid being provided. Other countries and charitable organizations are participating in the assistance but their ranks are unfortunately sometimes infiltrated by "special envoys" with missions not always humanitarian. In other words, the Cameroonians have their hands full with the Chadians.

MORE AUSTERITY IN FRANC ZONE PREDICTED

London WEST AFRICA in English 1 Dec 80 pp 2423, 2424

[Text]

THE ECONOMIC and financial situation of the member states of the Union Monétaire Ouest Africaine (Senegal, Togo, Benin, Ivory Coast, Upper Volta, Niger), took a turn for the worse at the beginning of the year, according to the central issuing bank, La Banque Centrale des Etats de l'Afrique de l'Ouest. As the end of the year approaches, there is little sign of improvement with the exception of one or two sectors.

Deterioration in terms of trade and drought in certain member states have been largely responsible for the bad circumstances of the economies. The likelihood of further austerity among all the member states was confirmed at the end of September when the President of UMOA Ministerial Council told the Economic and Finance Ministers of the franc zone that budgets would be restricted next year and that in monetary policy stabilisation and the improvement of the reserves in financial institutions would be the priorities. It is a measure of the seriousness with which the ministers take the present crisis that even within the fairly restrictive conditions imposed by the franc zone on members' monetary policies ministers should be considering a further reduction in the money supply while trying to balance this with the need to finance development projects.

The combined effect of a sudden rise in oil prices with the drop in the price of principal agricultural exports of UMOA member states (coffee, cocoa, groundnuts and cotton) has been crippling. Cocoa prices dropped 30 per cent between June 1979 and June 1980. The decline in prices has also affected uranium, and thus reduced Niger's plans.

Actual production varied wildly according to the commodity. Cocoa and cotton rose respectively 12 and 11 per cent. Coffee, however, fell by 15 per cent and groundnut production plummeted by 46 per cent (Senegal, which used to average around 1m. tonnes annually has in the last three seasons produced 441,700 tonnes, 781,700 tonnes and 422,500 tonnes).

The BCEAO analysis of each product's performance is revealing. While cocoa benefited from favourable climatic conditions a rise in producer prices, notably in Ivory Coast, and the flowering of new plantings, coffee production was held back by the age of many trees and their susceptibility to the slightest climatic change. In spite of the overall improvement in cotton production, the Bank thinks that it would have been an even better performance were it not for the drought in the Sahelian regions. Senegalese production fell by 32 per cent, to 25,000 tonnes, while in Benin it rose from 18,700 tonnes to 26,000 tonnes.

The drop in groundnut production was the highest in 20 years. The drought notwithstanding, BCEAO attributes a great deal of importance to the disaffection of farmers who would prefer to cultivate something which will guarantee them a more substantial revenue. This is particularly true of Senegal where the groundnut basin is becoming overcultivated and returns for groundnuts are declining.

Timber exports have fallen throughout the region, and especially in Ivory Coast, mainly as a result of government awareness of the potentially disastrous consequences that the reduction of forests could have on the ecological system. The present attempts at afforestation have been disappointing and the rate will have to be increased.

The effects of the latest drought on livestock have yet to emerge clearly. It is certain, though, that it will prove a serious setback for the Sahel where the levels of livestock population were just beginning to reach those of 1972, when they were decimated by the previous big drought.

The one brighter spot is the mining sector. Both in Senegal and Togo phosphate production increased. In Ivory Coast the prospects of oil production in the very near future promise to make the country self-sufficient in oil within the decade at the latest.

Overall, industrial production has increased, with Ivory Coast showing some particularly encouraging figures. The indicators for industrial activity in the first quarter of 1980 rose by 24 per cent in comparison with the same time a year before. Once again, Senegal, reflecting the dependence of its industrial base on the groundnut crop, was seriously affected by the drop in groundnuts delivered to local processing plants. A source of considerable concern, given the importance of cotton production to so many of the economies, has been the difficulty in the textile industry. Protectionism in industrial economies, especially in Europe, and massive imports of textile (often illegally) provide stiff competition to local products and have compromised an otherwise hopeful sector. In Ivory Coast and in Togo, two important cotton processors have closed down.

It is a feature to most West African states this year, and not just the UMOA members, that inflation has risen again. BCEAO attributes the cause of readjustments in prices and to the scarcity of food on the markets. In January this year, Togo, Senegal and Benin raised their minimum wage.

The contraction of foreign aid, and in particular of public aid, has led to some important restructuring in budgetary finances. State participation in financing has risen from 29.8 per cent to 33.7 per cent in Ivory Coast, Niger and Upper Volta. The external contribution to budgetary receipts has fallen from to only 36 per cent. This has resulted in increased dependence on the BCEAO. An equally disturbing consequence has been the fact that UMOA states have now become debtors to monetary institutions. In April the debt stood at 30bn. CFA francs whereas a year before they had a credit balance of 90bn. CFA francs. All the states have suffered the effect of Senegal and Ivory Coast, the two principal contributors to BCEAO reserves, having to draw large sums simultaneously has placed unusual pressure on the bank, and has caused states to have direct recourse to Paris.

Another feature of UMOA states' debts has been the rise in importance of private creditors. Whereas in 1972, official capital loans took up 56.5 per cent of UMOA's external debt, by 1978 the proportion had dropped to 35.3 per cent of all debts contracted by the UMOA. This growing dependence on private foreign finance explains the increase in the debt service.

By the end of 1977 debts of 299.4bn. CFA francs had been contracted with private banks, at commercial rates. This represented 68.5 per cent of total debts to the private sector. This meant a debt service of 99.8bn. CFA francs in 1978 for the UMOA states; that is, 80.6 per cent of all debt charges assumed until then. In view of this pressure, in 1978 the government tried to reduce their dependence on foreign private banking. In the primary sector of the economies, the balance of payments were all unfavourable due to the rise in costs of services.

ECONOMIC, BUSINESS NEWS PUBLISHED

London WEST AFRICA in English 1 Dec 80 p 2432

[Text] Trade Hunt in West Africa

British Minister of Trade Mr. Cecil Parkinson, is visiting Cameroon and Gabon to try to improve Britain's trade performance in French-speaking West Africa.

He is spending a week in each country, having discussions with senior Government leaders and examining industrial projects. British businessmen with him will try to develop commercial contracts.

The UK share of the Francophone market is less than 5 per cent, while France has more than 40 per cent, reflecting the tight economic links it has maintained since colonial days.

Mr. Parkinson will be hoping to exploit an emerging feeling in French-speaking West Africa that these links are too tight and that imports from a greater diversity of sources would be welcome.

In Cameroon Mr. Parkinson may announce a modest aid package.

In Gabon, a major effort will be made to harden prospects of UK interests winning a £50m. share of the contracts for the Trans-Gabonese Railway (the 1981 Budget allows for £260m. to be spent on the project this year). British contractors are primarily interested in the second phase of the development, which would involve the supply of line and equipment.

Mr. Parkinson will be joined by the team chasing a contract. Its members come from Transmark, the British Rail subsidiary, Bre-Metro, Taylor Woodrow and Henry Boot Engineering. There will also be a representative of Midland Bank, suggesting that talks have moved already from the technical into the financial stage.

UK exports to Gabon in the first nine months of this year were worth just £5.1m., while those to Cameroon were worth £12.3m. The balance of trade is strongly in the UK's favour in both cases.

Cocoa Prices Still Weak

While the negotiations were going on prices drifted unhappily, when reports came that an agreement seemed possible they improved a little but the Ivory Coasts's rejection turned the trend round and early last week December contracts were down to the £880s again.

The news that an Agreement has indeed been reached, with resolution of the situation with the Ivory Coast postponed — possibly until next April — should help the market prices. Incidentally, the Ivory Coast is believed to have sold some 65,000 tonnes of cocoa so far this season. Ghana is estimated to have sold forward something like 110,000 tonnes, obtaining prices during the Geneva negotiations of well over £1,000 a tonne, such sums were not to being quoted in the market until the 1981/82 crop contracts. Nigeria has apparently raised its producer price N1,300 a tonne which is more than £100 above the ICA floor price, and even above the buffer stock lower intervention price of 110 cents a lb.

Electrical Trade

Fully tropicalised electricity generating sets, designed to withstand arduous site conditions, will be promoted in West Africa during next month's trade mission to Ghana and Nigeria organised by the Leicester and County Chamber of Commerce and Industry from January 20 to 31.

The range of Jonlaw generating equipment includes petrol, diesel and multi-fuel engined sets, powered by Lister, Perkins, Rolls-Royce and Petter units, giving outputs from 1.5 kVA to 750 kVA.

Trolley or trailer mounted and static models are included in the range, extending from small sets which can be wheeled to the operating site by one man to versions suitable for equipping power stations.

Jonlaw can also supply all associated controls and switchgear, and design and build sets to meet customers' specific requirements.

The company also produces lighting towers, traffic control lighting sets, 200 amp and 400 amp welding sets and a series of centrifugal pumps for civil engineering, irrigation and other applications.

● Valmic Engineers, who specialise in static and mobile electricity generating sets in tropicalised versions and mobile floodlighting towers, will be making their first visit to Nigeria and Ghana with the Leicester mission.

ZAMBIA-ZAIRE TRADE--Zaire is the largest buyer of Zambian goods in East and Central Africa, according to statistics from the Department of Foreign Trade. ZAMEXPORT NEWS, the department's newsletter, says in its latest issue that in 1977, the latest year on record, Zaire bought goods worth K4.5 million. The second buyer of Zambian goods was Kenya with goods worth K3.5 million. But Kenya is the largest exporter of goods to Zambia, having sold goods worth K7.3 million in the year under review. Exports to Tanzania were K2.6 million while imports were K1.7 million. According to the statistics, exports to Malawi show a decline over an eight-year period from 1970, while Zambian imports from that country are rising. Trade with Botswana shows the same trend. Zambia's trade with Uganda is negligible and one-sided. Zambia exported goods worth K40,000 to Uganda in 1977 while there were no imports from that country. NATIONAL TRADE "NION BCARD WARNS WORKERS AGAINST SUBVERSIVE TENDENCIES

Cotonou EHUZU in French 12 Nov 80 pp 1, 6

[Press release from the special meeting of the National Union Council of the UNSTB [National Federation of Workers Unions of Benin]: "The Beninese Working Class Must Remain Vigilant to Foil the Subversive Maneuvers of the Enemies of the Revolution"]

[Text] The National Union Council of the National Federation of Workers Unions of Benin (UNSTB) met in special session on Tuesday 11 November 1980 at the Cotonou Labor Exchange to discuss the following agenda:

(1) analysis of the national union situation,
(2) report on the grassroots congress,
(3) preparation for the celebration of 30 November 1980,
(4) miscellaneous items.

On the first point, the Council noted that the revolutionary struggle of the valiant and industrious people of Benin under the leadership of its vanguard, the Party of the People's Revolution of Benin [PRPB] led by our great comrade in the struggle President Mathieu Kerekou, is advancing despite the international context, which is marked by the effects of galloping inflation, the hegemony of the multinational corporations and the repeated attacks of international imperialism on one hand, and, on the other, the national context, which is marked by the development of direct or surreptitious assaults by opportunistic forces at all levels.

The UNSTB remains faithful to its historic statement of purpose of 17 April 1975 in its social practice under the Beninese revolution and, to the dismay of the opportunists infiltrating the party and its mass organizations, has contined to increase its moral and political credit with the valiant and industrious Beninese people. This explains the important and far-seeing decision of the 8th session of the 2nd Central Committee of the PRPB, which recognizes the UNSTB as a great and important mass organization in the service of the people and their revolution.

Hence the great mass of workers of Benin organized under the UNSTB have launched themselves with revolutionary optimism and enthusiasm into the diligent and conscientious performance of the tasks of the revolution assigned to us by our vanguard party, the PRPB, thus blocking the sordid gambit of opportunistic politicians who have vainly attempted to substitute Committees for the Defense of the Revolution for the unions and then to divide the Beninese working class by pitting unions and Committees for the Defense of the Revolution against each other.

The mischievous and surreptitious political calculations by opportunists of the right and left have been dealt a resounding defeat especially because the UNSTB, enlightened by the universal principles of Marxism-Leninism that guide our vanguard party, has headed off the provocation and preserved the union and solidarity of the Beninese working class, considering the CDR [Committees for the Defense of the Revolution] militants as workers also engaged in the revolutionary process taking place in this country since 26 October 1972.

The success of the first regular national congress of our vanguard party, the PRPB, has brought great encouragement and hope to the Beninese working class for the future development of the revolutionary process.

But that was reckoned without the eternal opportunists of the right and the left who, in their obstinate lust for personal power, began after the party congress to develop their secret opposition to sincere unity and militant and constructive self-criticism.

The Beninese working class was the first to recognize the pernicious and reactionary actions of the pseudo-revolutionary sectarians whose diabolical objective was to break up our single central union once they had failed to take over its leadership, flouting all principles of union democracy. Among these pernicious actions were:

--the outright confiscation of the leadership of some unions hastily refurbished for the needs of the "cause" after they had been let lie dormant for several years;

--the piratical creation of unions in education, the last of which recently appeared in elementary education.

Against all these actions intended to endanger the unity of the working class, the National Union Council of the UNSTB makes a vibrant and militant appeal to the whole working class of our country to redouble its vigilance for our vanguard party, the PRPB, and to mobilize as one man to bar the way to opportunists, schismatics, sectarians and the power-hungry, who have already done only too much harm to the Beninese people in its courageous struggle for true independence, democracy, and social progress.

At a time when all the structures of our single central union, the UNSTB, are outdoing one another in revolutionary ardor and enthusiasm in preparing our first regular congress, it is an imperative duty for each worker in the federations, the grassroots unions, the province and district union federations, and the business union committees to raise their class consciousness and sharpen their revolutionary combativeness to break at any moment the maneuvers, intrigues, and undertakings of the gravediggers of our democratic and people's revolution.

In taking up the second point, the council noted with satisfaction that pursuant to the decisions of the union council in its memo of March 1980 almost all the grassroots unions have held their congresses. The union federation congresses are presently in progress.

Also concerning preparations for the UNSTB congress, a plan for federation congresses has been approved and steps taken for its complete implementation.

In considering the point relative to preparations for the national celebration of 30 November, the Council appeals for the general mobilization of workers to participate massively in the various demonstrations and to insure the complete success of this celebration.

Ending its session, the Council adopted a declaration on the political and union situation in our country.

Ready for the revolution.

The struggle continues.

CHINESE DONATE EQUIPMENT TO COOPERATIVE FARM WORKERS

Cotonou EHUZU in French 10 Nov 80 p 3

[Article by P. Gnanvi: "A Large Shipment of Agricultural Equipment to the Koussin-Lele Cooperative Workers"]

[Text] The rice-growing cooperative of Koussin-Lele, which is situated in the rural district of Cove, in Zou province, received a large shipment of agricultural equipment last Thursday as a gift from the People's Republic of China. Present at the occasion were his excellency the ambassador from the People's Republic of China and political and administrative authorities of Zou province. The presentation ceremony was presided over by comrade Edouard Zodehougan, minister of Intermediate General, Technical, and Professional Education and acting minister of Rural Development and Cooperative Action. Several speeches were given at this solemn ceremony.

First off, the cooperative workers' representative, comrade Ganye Faustin said that the Koussin-Lele cooperative started its work with only a 20-member team on an area of 10 hectares as an experiment under the direction of Chinese technicians.

The cooperative's development, he said, has met with great success and now has 115 members growing rice, cotton, and peanuts. He also stated that the Koussin-Lele cooperative workers were firmly devoted to literacy, the better to run the cooperative and to free themselves totally and completely from obscurantism and the shameless exploitation of man by man. Finally, on behalf of his comrades, comrade Ganye warmly thanked the Chinese, who have continually helped them in performing their daily tasks.

After the cooperative's spokesman came comrade Zime Maco Boni, general secretary of Zou province, who said that this solemn presentation of a large shipment of agricultural equipment to the good farmers of Koussin-Lele cooperative is an act very much appreciated by all, one that meets the concerns of the political and administrative authorities of the province for the development of the cooperative movement in the countryside.

He also remarked that the formation of farmers' cooperatives is presently the primary concern of the political and administrative officials of Zou province. He also said that this kind of farmers' organization in the countryside, which is intended eventually to collectivize the ownership of the means of production, fits into the process of building the new socialist society.

His excellency, the Chinese ambassador to Benin, comrade Chang Chun Hua, recalled that in 1973, the Chinese agro-technical mission in Cove worked in close cooperation with the farmers to build this farm in the brush and that since it was built it has yielded very good harvests. Comrade Chang Chun Hua observed that the Koussin-Lele cooperative is a success by any standards. It is the crowning glory of efforts made by Chinese and Beninese technicians.

Comrade Chang Chun Hua spoke of the equipment being donated, saying that the Chinese government is making available to the Koussin-Lele farm a shipment of agricultural equipment comprised of tractors, water pumps, small farming tools, and spare parts, the total cost being 6 million francs CFA [African Financial Community]. He added, "It is, of course, a very modest gift, but it is nonetheless the expression of our wish to see the cooperative succeed in constantly increasing its production and in ever more rapidly improving the living standards of its members." He added that this farm, which is the flower of friendship cultivated and maintained by our two peoples, will bloom ever more brightly in the future.

After various speeches, comrade Zodehougan indicated that the ceremony was doubly important because it equips the Koussin-Lele experimental agricultural cooperative with a minimum of materiel and assures it greater productivity.

This is a chance for us, he explained, to place special emphasis once more on the quality of the cooperation that is taking place between the Chinese and Beninese peoples and on the ties of militant solidarity uniting our two countries in mutual respect and sovereignty.

The minister observed that the equipment received today by the Koussin-Lele cooperative workers is a new sign of the attention being paid all the Beninese people by the leaders of the PRC in aiding development in all areas and in consolidating our great Revolutionary Movement of National Liberation.

In the name of our vanguard party, the Party of the People's Revolution of Benin and on behalf of Beninese cooperative workers in general and those of Koussin-Lele in particular, comrade Zodehougan sincerely thanked the Chinese people, the Chinese Communist Party, and the Chinese government for the concern they have always shown the militant people of Benin in their implacable struggle against the forces of domination and exploitation of man by man.

The minister concluded by asking the Koussin-Lele cooperative workers to continue organizing the cooperative by accepting a collectivization consistent with their means of production.

CUBAN DELEGATION VISITS BENIN--As a gesture of friendship and cooperation between the Party of the People's Revolution of Benin and the Communist Party of Cuba [CPC] a delegation of the CPC led by comrade Carrido Roberto has been in Benin since last Tuesday. In a short press interview at the ministry of Foreign Affairs and Cooperation, the delegation chief noted that his visit to the People's Republic of Benin will enable our two parties (the CPC and the Party of the People's Revolution of Benin) to strengthen the bonds of friendship and cooperation that unite them and to exchange information. "We will benefit from our stay in the People's Republic of Benin," he continued, "to invite the Party of the People's Revolution of Benin to send a delegation to attend the 2nd congress of the CPC," added comrade Carrido Roberto. HABRE CUT OFF FROM HIS SUPPLY BASES

[Report: "The Chief of State Guerrillas Claim to Have Cut Hissein Habre Off From His Supply Bases"]

[Text] On Friday 14 November a source close to the Provisional National Union Government (GUNT) informed Agence France-Presse by telephone that N'djamena was virtually encircled by the alliance headed by Goukouni Oueddei, president of the GUNT and head of state of the Chad. The same source indicated that the Eastern route which allowed Hissein Habre, leader of the Armed Forces of the North (FAN), who controls a section of the capital, to be resupplied from the outside, was henceforth cut off.

Furthermore, it has been learned in Yaounde, from a source close to the "southern" troops commanded by Col Abdelkader Kamougue of the Armed Forces of the Chad (FAT) that 1,000 "southern" troops have taken positions not far from the Chagoua Bridge on the southern exit of N'djamena, from which they are shelling an area held by the FAN using heavy artillery supplied by Goukouni Oueddei. Also noted in the N'djamena fights is the reappearance of the FAT who had withdrawn far more to the south as a result of murderous confrontations with the FAN last June and July.

Passing through Paris, on Friday Lol Mohamed Choa, former chief of state of the Chad, called upon the chiefs of state of the Organization of African Unity, demanding the convocation of an extraordinary summit conference of the organization "to put an end to the invasion and the occupation of Chad by Libya."

Authorized sources in Paris have denied the existence of a Franco-Libyan agreement which, according to the weekly JEUNE AFRIQUE, may have led, 2 years ago, to a "line dividing spheres of influence (in Chad) approximately following the 14th parallel, stretching from Salal a Biltine passing by Ati." "By virtue of this secret agreement," JEUNE AFRIQUE goes on to say in its latest issue, "Qadhdhafi was given the green light to act as he wishes above that line. In turn, France is free to move in the southern part of the Chad (....). Strictly speaking, it is not a question of a new colonization of the Chad but of a Franco-Libyan condominium or, if one wishes, of a double protectorate of a federation the northern part of which would be under Libyan control and the southern part under French control."

In Rabat, where he is currently the guest of Mr Mansouri Benali, minister of administrative affairs, asked on the subject of a recent statement by Robert Galley, reasserting French neutrality, Michel Debre stated that the minister of cooperation could have no other position, considering that France had recently withdrawn its forces from that country. Yet, he added, "I was criticized for having wished to keep Chad independent from Libya. From 1969 to 1971 the purpose of our intervention was to maintain a safety area. Today we have withdrawn our troops and we can see the consequences."

In turn, hosting the African press at a dinner, Friday in Paris, Jacques Chirac, said on the subject of Chad: "I do not see what kind of initiative France could assume."

REFUGEES DISCUSS CONDITIONS IN SOUTH

Dakar LE SOLEIL in French 13 Nov 80 p 8

[Text] Yaounde--The populations in the southern part of Chad lack foodstuffs, the civil service's pay is months behind and many of the staff are leaving the country, according to the testimony of refugees from the southern part of Chad who recently arrived in Yaounde.

These refugees, staff members from the southern part of the country, told the AFP yesterday that the inhabitants are destitute, that famine threatens because the grain shortage this year is close to 85,000 tons and that Col Abdelkader Kamougue's Armed Forces of Chad (FAT) "are fleecing the villagers like city dwellers."

One refugee stated that he was without work, and that in spite of everything he had been "forced to pay" 1,000 francs for "the social action fund ticket"--the equivalent of three days' food for a whole family--by the gendarmes who are in control of the population. "The grumbling," he added, "is getting worse and worse."

The refugees from the south emphasize that their region is not in the combat zone, and that 90,000 tons of cotton was picked; but where did that money go, they are asking.

For its part, the newspaper LE BOUCLIER," which is published in Moundou (the capital of the south), said in its latest issue to arrive in Yaounde that "the financial and political leaders are spending money fast. However, a mini-budget of 5,000,000,000 CFA francs has been adopted so the south can run smoothly, independently of Ndjamena, until peace returns."

According to the newspaper the staff members are fleeing into neighboring countries: "Panic makes the intellectual want to run away from suffering."

Criticizing the head of the FAT without naming him, LE BOUCLIER says it believes that "the government in the south is asserting itself more like a military government and that point of view does not succeed in surmounting certain sociopolitical obstacles..

"The policy of neglect being practised in the region," it concludes, "is irritating the great majority of Chadians."

HISSEIN HABRE'S HEADQUARTERS BOMBED

Dakar LE SOLEIL in French 12 Nov 80 p 8

[Text] Ndjamena--The Sabangani quarter, where the head of the Northern Armed Forces (FAN), Hissein Habre, resides, was a special target yesterday of the heavy artillery of the partisans of Goukouni Ouedde, the president of the Transitional National Union Government (GUNT).

While the battles were going on intermittently in Ndjamena, nearly 100 shells, fired from Farcha (northwest of Ndjamena), as well as the neighborhood of the Chagua Bridge (south of the capital), where the Chadian armed forces of Lt Col Kamougue, the vice president of the GUNT, reached the Sabangani quarter, where the home of the head of the FAN, their political headquarters and their radio are located.

Even a small propeller plane intervened against the objectives at the end of the morning yesterday, twice sending up salvos of ten rockets. Early yesterday afternoon firings could be observed from Kousseri, a Cameroonian town on the opposite bank of the Chari River. The bombings had been moved north of the Chadian capital.

On Monday a giant helicopter dropped on the FAN zone of Ndjamena thousands of tracts in French, asserting that Hissein Habre "was at that very moment visiting his leaders in occupied Palestine." However, we were told by a reliable source on Monday evening that Hissein Habre was in Ndjamena.

With regard to the situation in the country's interior, the most contradictory news is circulating in Ndjamena. Radio Chad, which is controlled by the FAN, announced on Monday evening that the Libyan troops had been "routed Sunday at Oum-Chabouba and Kalail" (300 km north of Abeche).

According to the FAP [People's Armed Forces], the city of Abeche, Hissein Habre's main rear base near the Sudanese border, had been evacuated by its FAN fighters, while the FAP was in the immediate neighborhood.

Finally, the council of ministers of the GUNT, which had been meeting since Friday, finished up on Monday after "studying the present situation."

It is predicted in circles close to the GUNT presidency that big decisions should be taken, but the CHADIAN PRESS AGENCY, which reflects the government's point of view, has not yet mentioned the nature of those decisions.

PREMIER GIVES DETAILS ON BUDGET FOR FISCAL YEAR 1981

Brazzaville ETUMBA in French 24 Nov 80 pp 1, 7, 9

[Article: "The 1981 Budget Brings the Government and the People's National Assembly Face to Face"]

[Excerpts] The government, led by its prime minister, Colonel Louis Sylvain-Goma, presented the 1981 budget to the People's National Assembly at the city hall on 19 November at 1000 hours.

The proposed budget comes to 159,934,380,000 francs CFA [African Financial Community] in both receipts and expenditures. It allows 111,693,040,790 francs for expenses and 48,241,339,000 francs for investment.

As can be seen, the net expense budget shows an increase of 25,680,695,540 francs, or 29.85 percent over the revised 1980 budget, while the investment budget is up from 33,114,000,000 francs in 1980 to 48,241,339,000 francs, or an increase of 15,127,339,210 francs and a rate of increase of 45.68 percent.

On this occasion, the member of the BP [Political Bureau] of the Central Committee of the PCT [Congolese Labor Party] gave a speech, which we are publishing in its entirety.

"As you know, honorable deputies, the 3rd special congress of the PCT and then the Central Committee [CC] have set directions that will make it possible to throttle the crisis that has almost completely stifled our country. On the basis of these directions the 1980 Complementary Program was drawn up and is now being implemented; in its 5 sessions, the CC recently checked its progress and set the objectives of the 1981 start-up program that I have the honor of submitting to you for your perusal.

"Before outlining it to you, let me report to you first on the partial execution of the present year's budget and the 1980 Complementary Program."

Budget Surplus

"Since the sudden breakdown in our economic and financial situation, the party and government have been constantly concerned with the nation's economic recovery and public finances.

"To put public finances and the balance of payments back in balance, the government has implemented a stabilization program with the help of the International Monetary Fund [IMF].

"This program has been carried out under good conditions and has made it possible to restore the country's credit with its economic partners, and it has restored a budgetary discipline without which these successes probably could not have been achieved. Indeed, for the first time since 1974 and the second time in 10 years, the budget has shown a surplus.

"For the current year, this august Assembly has adopted an operating budget of 93.9 billion francs, 58.7 billion of which come from petroleum earnings.

"Present receipts total more than 52 billion, or 55.4 percent of the operating budget in a fiscal year that has 6 more months to run.

"This satisfactory state of income gives us hope once again.

"This fortunate trend has made it possible to revise the Complementary Program [COMP] upwards; it was strengthened at budgetary meetings during the year by the firm inclusion of some important projects, namely: asphalting the Etsouali-Obouya road and starting work on the Moukoukoulou-Pointe Noire electric line.

"The total cost of the COMP was set at 89,702,775,000 francs. The sources were:

state	33,114,000,000	francs CFA
self-financing	7,000,093,000	"
local banks	3,641,000,000	"
foreign sources	45,483,399,040	"

"On 30 September 1980, some 55 percent of the total was disbursed, for a total of 49,301,000,000 francs. The recipients were:

state	24,196,000,000	francs CFA	or 73	percent of its	allocation
self-financing	2,790,000,000	"	49	"	"
local banks	761,645,000	"	21	"	"
foreign	16,149,929,325	"	35.5	"	"

"What should we think of these records?

"On 30 September 1980, local banks contributed 21 percent of planned bank aid. This performance reflects the weakness of most of our state corporations in compiling good bank statements. Thus it was recommended that this gap be filled at the national conference of corporations, which provided each state unit with a recovery plan, thus facilitating the completion of bank dossiers. State enterprises were financed at 40 percent of the rate planned. This is, of course, not a spectacular performance. The government is trying to improve it.

"Contributions from abroad have been unblocked at 35.5 percent. However, this figure conceals very real possibilities for significant improvement in the level of foreign aid between now and the end of the year. Some problems had frozen the unblocking of credits from some friendly countries, but these problems have been substantially solved. Other foreign aid is following plans already made, some parts of which fall in the period between the end of September and the end of December. This is the case with the realignment of the CFCO [Congo-Ocean Railroad].

"Finally, funds coming from the state have been unblocked at a level of 73 percent. Out of more than 33 billion planned, almost 25 billion have been disbursed. This represents a remarkable level of financial performance never achieved in the past, especially in such a short span of time. We are thus encouraged in our conviction that we can count on ourselves above all."

Physical Implementation of the Complementary Program

"In the case of the physical implementation of the COMP, you yourselves, honorable deputies, recently visited some COMP projects, such as the Etsouali-Obouya road and some projects in Brazzaville and environs. These visits and those you traditionally make in your respective localities have enabled you to see for yourselves how the COMP is being carried out.

"The government has attempted to overcome structural difficulties as best it can. Most of its basic sector actions have been started up. Each of you has the results of the survey made on 30 September 1980.

"At the present time, many projects are being done at the rate and in the format prescribed. So it is with the construction of 384 SONACO-SOPROGI [expansion unknown] lodgings in Brazzaville, the construction of the Etsouali-Obouya road, and the construction of the Moukoukoulou-Pointe Noire electric line. As for this latter project, please note that while the intial COMP version provided only for a study, this line is now actually under construction. Other projects, such as the electrification of Brazzaville, the centennial bridge, the Kouilou region pine and eucalyptus plantations, and the completion of the synthetic fabrics plant are generally being carried out at planned rates.

"True, many difficulties have appeared in some projects that will generally not be significantly complete until next year. This is the case with such projects as the Sangha forest complex, the development of SOCOREM [expansion unknown] mining activity, building water systems in Gamboma, Boundji, Madingo-Kayes, etc.

"However, as the COMP is carried out, the shortages and weaknesses that may be discovered will be gradually corrected.

"Having repeated the facts about the 1980 budget and program, how does the 1981 budget look?

"Our budgetary performance over the last 2 years shows an undeniable recovery of economic activity.

"The expected increase in petroleum production, the rise in the price of crude, and the recovery of timber production will have a positive influence on our public finances."

Stressing Investment

"The 1981 budget, which has been drawn up in accordance with CC directives, as the 5th meeting confirmed, stresses investment more than was done in the past and is more concerned with increasing the buying power of the popular masses by:

--abolishing the National Solidarity Fund,
--unblocking advance payments for financing purposes,
--tax relief.

"Put in this general context, the 1981 budget has been set at 159,934,380,000 francs in receipts and expenditures, broken down as follows:

net operating budget: 111,693,040,790 or 69.16 percent of the total investment budget: 48,241,339,000 or 30.16 " "

Increase in the Operating Budget

"The net operating budget shows an increase of 25,680,695,540 francs or 29.85 percent over the revised 1980 budget, while the investment budget goes from 33,114,000,000 francs in 1980 to 48,241,339,000 francs, for an increase of 15,127,339,210 francs at a rate of increase of 45.68 percent.

"The operating budget's resources reflect the economic hypotheses and trends discussed above, with:

--a considerable increase in petroleum income, which accounts for 70.3 percent of the general state budget receipts, as opposed to 62.5 percent in 1980;

--an equally large increase in customs receipts: 37.3 percent;

--a moderate increase in direct and indirect domestic taxes of 9.53 percent, including alleviation of the IRPP [expansion unknown (possibly personal income tax)] and the payback of some direct and indirect taxes to the regions, taxes that have hitherto gone to the national government.

"The resources of the investment budget, which increase from 33,241,000,000 francs to 48,241,339,219 francs, are covered by local receipts at a level of 37,241,339,210 francs, part of which is a 6-billion franc loan from the Central Bank.

"This loan, which is very flexible, is an innovation in the sense that the government proposes to use as much as possible from now on our own monetary resources to finance development rather than use them exclusively to cover current treasury needs.

"The external contribution to the investment budget, which figures out to 11 billion francs or 22.8 percent of the total, involves two loans negotiated entirely with foreign partners.

"Operating expenses [OE] come to 111,693,040,790 francs, distributed as follows:

public debt	28,257,600,000	francs or	25.29	percent of 1981 OE	(42.6	pct in 1980)
materials	12,708,555,000	"	11.37	"	9.1	" common expenses	5,177,955,790	"	4.63	"	8.2	"
transfers	21,723,930,790	"	19.44	"	20.0	"

"The size of the public debt reflects the party and government's concern that foreign commitments be honored, especially after the various renegotiations of the debt carried out with various friendly countries. This procedure thus restores our country's credibility abroad."

Near Stability in Personnel Expenses

"You will note that personnel expenses, which are increasing in absolute terms, are practically stable in terms of the total budget. In fact, these expenditures amount to 41.02 percent of the 1981 operating budget as opposed to 42.6 percent in 1980.

"The growth of expenditures for materials is justified by the necessity of equipping the various government branches with materials that have often proved to be defective or even inadequate and which thus put several state agencies in the position of being unable to perform their duties properly.

"The decrease in common charges is the result of arbitration in favor of ministerial departments, which will henceforth manage by themselves and directly their share of the budget under this heading. These charges are, mainly, travel expenses within the country and abroad.

"Increased transfer payments are due to research, education, and our contribution to various international organizations that the Republic is a member of.

"As for the investment budget, the 3d special congress conceived of it as being the transition program to the future plan. It is, then, the pivotal program between the COMP that is closing out and the 1982-86 five-year plan. The CC has termed it the program that is to fulfill the preconditions indispensable to starting the future plan.

"The 1981 investment program thus intends to finance the state sector's recovery, to develop communication infrastructures in order to overcome the country's isolation, to begin setting up structures adequate to decentralization, to increase efforts in improving and equipping the health sector under the operation called 'Strong Boost to Health,' and, finally, to pursue actions that will last for several years.

"These areas alone take more than 82 percent of all government financing. State financing of the 1981 investment program is more than 48 billion francs, which is 15 billion more than in 1980.

"The distribution of the state's contribution, in order of priority, is as follows:

--operations in progress: 34 percent. These operations comprise more than 90 percent of the projects planned for 1980 that were to be completed in two or more years.

--recovery in the state sector: 14 percent. True, it has not been possible to fill out for each state agency the amount corresponding exactly to the annual portion planned for recovery. However, this has been done for some Rural Economy agencies, given this sector's priority in national development, and the priority of some strategic agencies like the ATC [Trans-Congolese Communications Agency], HYDRO-CONGO, and the Pointe-Noire refinery.

--disenclavement infrastructures: 20 percent;

--decentralization: 4.2 percent. The year 1981 will be devoted to developing all the basic studies in the framework of the 1982-86 plan that will make construction possible in the regions and the establishment of regional development societies. Also, credits are budgeted in 1981 to enlarge the regions' motor pool in off-road vehicles and to extend telecommunications links between regional capitals and the districts.

--Strong Boost to Health: 9.7 percent. In this case, the absolute value of the appropriation is 4.69 billion francs plus 1 billion for operating expenses. Thus, the Strong Boost to Health will receive state financing of 5.69 billion francs in 1981, as opposed to 967.6 million in 1980.

"The Strong Boost to Health covers three series of operations:

--supplying medecines, small equipment, and beds to all health dispensaries of the Republic;

--equpping and staffing large hospitals;

--equpping some centers selected for their particular geographical location.

"To carry out such an operation, a rigorous system of supervision that calls upon the vigilance of everyone is indispensable."

PRESIDENT MAKES WORK VISIT TO PARIS

Paris LE MONDE in French 14 Nov 80 p 5

[Article by Philippe Decraene: "The Author of the Coup D'Etat Against Macias"]

[Text] Working visit to Paris by President Obiang N'Guema M'Basogo.

Lt Col Obiang N'Guema M'Basogo, chief of state of Equitorial Guinea, was expected to pay an official working visit to Paris on Thursday, 13 November. He was scheduled to dine at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and be the luncheon guest of President Giscard d'Estaing on Friday. Friday evening [remaining part of paragraph not printed]

Ever since he seized power by force, on 3 August 1979--the day of the "Freedom Coup"--Lt Col Obiang N'Guema M'Basogo has tirelessly increased and strengthened his powers. As chairman of the supreme military council, as of 10 October 1979 he officially assumed the functions of "President of the Republic, chief of state and of the government, and commander in chief of the armed forces." He is also in charge of the Ministry of Defense and the State Secretariat for Information and Tourism.

A member of the Fang clan of the Essangui, like his uncle Macias Nguema Biyoyo, whom he overthrew and subsequently executed after a public trial in the course of which the prosecutor asked for the death penalty for 101 proven assassinations, Obiang N'Guema M'Basogo was born in June 1942 in Mongomo District, in a family of 10 children.

After completing his primary studies in Mongomo, he worked as a supervisor at the secondary school run by the la Salle brothers in Bata and studied for his baccalaureate in arts and crafts in night school. In 1963 he passed the entrance examinations for the Spanish Military Academy in Saragossa from which he graduated in 1965 with the rank of second lieutenant. Assigned to the territorial guard following his return to his country, he was sent to a small military post in the bush and subsequently reassigned to Bata and Malabo.

Following the accession of his uncle to the presidency of the republic and the proclamation of independence, he was given increased responsibilities. As a national guard lieutenant, in 1969 he was made commander of the armed forces of Bioko Province. He was promoted to captain in 1970 and became director general of planning and supplies of the Ministry of Public Education.

In March 1975 he was promoted to the rank of major. The following year he became secretary of defense of the Ministry of Armed Forces. At the time he decided to put an end to 11 years of bloody dictatorship he was vice minister of the people's armed forces.

A Roman Catholic in a state where the murderous folly of the ex-President Macias had turned itself on the church, described as a "progressive military" by the international press, Lt Col Obiang N'Guema M'Basogo was the beneficiary of a favorable prejudice on the part of his fellow citizens at the time of the coup d'etat. Since then most of those who opposed the old system have shown a certain reserve, blaming him for failure to reestablish normal constitutional life. Such is the case, for example, of the exiles rallied within the National Alliance for the Restoration of Democracy (ANDR) who have stubbornly demanded, for more than one year, the setting of a deadline for the holding of legislative elections.

NUMBER OF STUDENTS ABROAD SAID INCREASED SIGNIFICANTLY

Addis Ababa THE ETHIOPIAN HERALD in English 26 Nov 80 pp 1, 4

[Text] Addis Ababa (EH)--The number of Ethiopian students sent for higher studies abroad has significantly increased in the post-revolutionary period. The signing of cultural agreements between Revolutionary Ethiopia and fraternal socialist countries has, all the more, accelerated the training of Ethiopians abroad. During the current academic year, the number of students sent on scholarships and fellowships has been 1,406 representing an increase of 334 over that of the previous year.

These observations were made here yesterday by Comrades Asfaw Belachew and Mulugeta Gebre-Medhin, Chief Co-ordinator of External Affairs and Scholarship and Senior Expert in the Commission for Higher Education, respectively.

Comrade Asfaw said that since the February, 1974 Popular Revolution, some 4,630 Ethiopian students have been sent abroad. Through training of students abroad started long ago, the number of scholarship awards sharply increased in the aftermath of the February, 1974 Popular Revolution, Comrade Asfaw observed.

According to Chief Co-ordinator, scholarships and fellowships are obtained from international organizations or through bilateral agreements between governments. The Revolutionary Government invites candidates who deserve the scholarships.

Comrade Asfaw said that the different fields of study offered include engineering and technology, agriculture, social, health, natural sciences and fine arts.

The Chief Co-ordinator said that as it was vividly stated in the Proclamation to provide for the Administration of Higher Education Institutions, the Commission for Higher Education is, among other things, empowered to co-ordinate and administer external assistance in co-operation with the appropriate ministries and also co-ordinate relationships with foreign higher education institutions and send Ethiopians abroad for further training.

The Scholarships and Fellowships Co-ordinating Department within the Commission, according to Comrade Asfaw, facilitates the training of the students abroad. As part of its overall effort to promote higher education, the Department has, since its inception, undertaken a commendable task in co-ordinating scholarship and fellowships awards. Comrade Asfaw said that higher education contributes highly to the progress of their standard of living, assist in the struggle against feudalism, imperialism and bureaucratic capitalism, and develop science, technology, the arts and literature. The major concern of the Commission, according to the Chief Co-ordinator, is to meet the country's manpower requirements by way of a planned and co-ordinated reorganization of Higher Education Institutions. He said that the training of students abroad is part of the overall effort to promote higher education.

Comrade Mulugeta, Senior Expert, said, on his part, that the scholarship being awarded includes undergraduate, post-graduate studies and refresher courses. The Senior Expert said that presently the number of students abroad has reached 9,741, of whome some 4,376 are in socialist countries.

The number of students to be trained abroad for the coming academic year is expected to be 1,300, Comrade Mulugeta said. The scholarships and fellowships are obtained, according to the Senior Expert, through agreements between governments or from international organizations. He pointed out that it is possible to get scholarships and fellowships from organizations based outside of the country to similar organizations in Revolutionary Ethiopia.

Nomination for the forthcoming academic year commences in December this year. Notice will be given through the various mass media.

CEMENT PRODUCTION STATISTICS REPORTED

Addis Ababa THE ETHIOPIAN HERALD in English 3 Dec 80 p 8

[Text] DIRE DAWA (ENA) — The Dire Dawa Cement and Lime Factory will produce during the current Ethiopian year 34,000 tons of cement and lime, according to Comrade Engineer Mandefro Werku, the Head of the Factory.

Out of the total production stated for this year, 32,000 tons will be cement and the remaining lime. Comrade Engineer Mandefro said that production trends up to now indicate that the target will be realized.

The Head of the Factory stated that in the previous production year, the output desired had not been achieved owing to over use of the factory's works. Nevertheless, the plant had turned out 32,868 tons of heated soil and stones, 1,841 tons of heated limestone, 35,440 tons of cement and 1,163 tons of lime.

A review of the factory's performance in the past eight years shows that 1971 E.C. had witnessed the highest production with 39,185 tons of cement and 1,155 tons of lime, said Comrade Engineer Mandefro. Explaining the reasons for this exceptional performance, Comrade Engineer Mandefro said that the factory had functioned normally throughout the year and that the factory's workers had strived hard to step up production.

White stone used for the production of cement is obtained from Dewele locality, 190 kms from the factory site.

The Chief of the Laboratory Section, Comrade Wendimu Tsegaye, stressed the quality of cement made in the Dire Dawa Factory noting that it can resist a very high pressure.

It was further stated that the workers numbering 384 at present exercise their creative skills to meet shortage of spare parts. The Secretary-General of the Workers' Union, Comrade Shimelis Gebre-Mariam, said that a roller costing 15,000 Birr if imported was maintained by the workers at a cost of 7,000 Birr.

BOTTLE, GLASS FACTORY--The Glass and Bottle Factory in Gulelie expects to resume production within four months on the basis of feasibility studies completed a year ago. Disclosing this, Comrade Tadesse Siltanu, Technical Director of the Factory, told THE ETHIOPIAN HERALD that the feasibility studies carried out by the Ministry of Industry in collaboration with United Nations experts were aimed at reorganising the operation of the Factory to be more productive and efficient. The Factory had stopped production two years ago because the oil furance had completed worn out. [as published] It is now being replaced with an electrical furnace which will be less expensive. Comrade Tadesse said that new machines, including an Individual Section (S.I. machine), are being installed to enable the Factory to produce wide-mouthed bottles, pharmaceutical bottles and glasses. When production starts the Factory will be able to meet the growing demand for bottles of the beverage and agro-industrial sectors, he added. Sixty Ethiopian students are currently pursuing their education in this field abroad as a result of the agreement which provides for the training of Ethiopians in water development works. The Swedish Development Agency is known to have granted five million Birr towards the training of the 140 Ethiopian students abroad. SIDA is also helping Ethiopia train 35 other students in civil engineering at the Addis Ababa University in cooperation with the Ethiopian Water Works Construction Authority. ECONOMIC SURVEY SHOWS HOPE FOR RECOVERY

[Text]

The British Minister of Trade, Mr Cecil Parkinson, is leading a mission to Gabon, which in per capita terms is one of the richest countries in Africa. A recent survey by the International Monetary Fund showed that the country's prospects, after a period of being over-extended, are good.

BY DEVELOPING its rich natural resources, including petroleum, manganese, uranium, and extensive forests, Gabon has achieved rapid growth in the 20 years since its independence in 1960. Per capita income for Gabon's claimed population of about 1.2m. (a census has been conducted this past summer) is now estimated at $3,000, one of the highest levels in Africa.

The economy is still based mainly on oil and other mineral production. Gabon is a member of the Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC). In 1978, the oil sector accounted for 40 per cent of gross domestic product (GDP), 70 per cent of export receipts, and 55 per cent of government revenue.

A large number of companies are engaged in exploration but production is dominated by the French Elf-Aquitaine group through Elf-Gabon, which accounts for about two-thirds of the total — this amounts to something like half of Elf-Aquitaine's worldwide activities — and by Shell-Gabon. The Government has a 25 per cent equity participation in all producing companies.

Two refineries, with capacity for supplying the local market as well as for producing for export, are now operating in Gabon, though below capacity. During the early 1970s the production of crude oil increased rapidly rising in 1976 to 220,000 barrels a day, or 11.3m. tonnes a year. In 1979 production was 9.8m. tonnes and, barring new discoveries, production will decline gradually over the next decade to a negligible amount in the 1990s.

Manganese and uranium together accounted for a further 6 per cent of GDP and 15 per cent of export revenues in 1979. Manganese is mined by the Compagnie Minière de l'Ogoué (COMILOG), in which the Government has a 10 per cent equity participation. Production averages nearly 2m. tonnes a year. Uranium ore is mined by the Compagnie des Mines d'Uranium de Franceville (COMUF) in which the Government has a 25 per cent share. Korea is starting a $12m. uranium exploration project in Gabon with Cogema of France. Production averages about 1,000 tonnes a year.

Originally, economic growth in Gabon was fostered by exploiting its rich forest resources. Rapid expansion of the petroleum sector, however, coupled with the 1974-75 recession in the timber industry, reduced the relative importance of forestry so that it contributed less than 2 per cent of GDP in 1978, although it still accounted for 10 per cent of export receipts.

The manufacturing sector has become increasingly important in recent years, partly as a result of incentives provided by the Government. Accounting for 9 per cent of GDP in 1979, it consists mainly of foreign-owned enterprises engaged in producing chemicals, oil refining, processing timber and agricultural products, and some production for import substitution. The agricultural sector although involving about 80 per cent of the population accounts for only 4 per cent of GDP.

After the quadrupling of oil prices in 1973-74, which led to a sharp rise in foreign exchange receipts and budgetary revenues, the Government embarked on an ambitious development programme, with primary emphasis on construction of the Trans-Gabon railway — nearly £80m. is budgeted for this in 1981.

Between 1973 and 1976 the sixfold increase in government spending stimulated growth, particularly in the construction, commerce, and services sectors, much of this was connected with playing host of the 1977 Summit conference of the OAU.

As a result, the rate of growth of GDP in real terms averaged an estimated 28 per cent a year over the three-year period. However, as this growth was mainly in urban areas, it widened the disparity between living conditions in the cities and the countryside, thus accelerating migration to the cities and contributing to the stagnation of the agricultural sector. In view of its relatively small population, Gabon had to rely largely on immigrant workers to support the economic boom.

Sharply expansionary fiscal policies and rapid growth in the money supply intensified pressures on the supply of goods and services, and the rate of inflation increased from 12 per cent in 1974 to an average of 20 per cent in 1975–76.

Meanwhile budgetary deficits grew sharply, the balance of payments came under mounting pressure, and in 1977 a financial crisis emerged. Against this background, and given the unfavourable balance of payments outlook at the time, in May 1978 the Government undertook a one-year stabilisation programme supported by a stand-by arrangement with the IMF.

The authorities successfully implemented a far-reaching fiscal readjustment, entailing elimination of all extrabudgetary outlays. This was helped by the completion during 1977 of several key projects and also the elimination of certain nonrecurring expenditures such as outlays connected with the OAU Summit Conference.

Under the stabilisation programme, budgetary expenditures were kept below appropriations and in line with government revenues. Total government spending (excluding debt amortisation) was almost halved, leading to a dramatic turnaround in government finances: the budget shifted from an overall deficit equivalent to 22 per cent of GDP in 1977 to a surplus equivalent to 6 per cent of GDP in 1978. This cautious budgetary approach was continued in 1979, when budgetary expenditures increased by less than 8 per cent. However a decline in oil revenues limited revenue growth to only 5 per cent so that the overall surplus declined slightly to 5 per cent of GDP. The budgetary surpluses did, however, allow the Government to reduce significantly both foreign and domestic debt. Moreover, through cash settlements and rescheduling arrangements, all payments arrears were eliminated.

Tight restraints led to a substantial decline in domestic demand and a marked reduction in inflationary pressures as well as an improvement in Gabon's external payments position. The current account shifted from a deficit of SDR 10m. in 1977 to a surplus of SDR 35m. in 1978. In 1979 there was a further strengthening in the curren. account position largely because of a 35 per cent increase in receipts from oil exports as a result of the rise in oil prices.

The stabilisation programme was, however, accompanied by a sharp decline in economic activity in both 1977 and 1978. GDP in current prices is estimated to have fallen from 719,100m. CFA francs in 1976 to CFA francs 539,000m. in 1978 in current prices, led by a sharp decline in the construction and services sectors. The recession was felt mostly by expatriate workers, who returned home in large numbers. Economic activity stabilised in 1979, despite a production decline in the oil sector, and, as oil prices rose sharply, GDP in current prices is estimated to have increased to some CFA francs 635,000m. Meanwhile the rate of inflation continued to decline from a 13 per cent annual rate in 1977 to less than 8 per cent in 1979.

The Government has recently launched a medium-term programme of balanced growth, supported by an extended arrangement from the IMF until the end of 1982. As the present foreign and domestic financial outlook is favourable, the Fund support is a precaution rather than a necessity. The programme centers on an interim development plan to 1982, which aims to diversify the economy and make more efficient use of natural resources while maintaining the relative price stability of the past two years, improving income distribution, continuing to reduce external debt, and rebuilding the reserves.

Under the stabilisation programme, agriculture, which has a disappointing record — like so many other countries in West Africa — is to receive a considerable proportion of government spending. Projects in the agricultural sector can be divided roughly into three categories: (1) large export-oriented industrial plantations; (2) integrated regional projects based on smaller industrial plantations; and (3) general rural development through extension services and other measures.

Major projects in the first category include a palm oil project at Lambaréné which, at a total cost of CFA francs 27,000m. should eventually yield 50,000 tons of palm oil and 10,000 tons of palm kernels yearly. A natural rubber project, again to cost a total of CFA francs 27,000m. is expected to produce ultimately 22,000 tons of rubber a year. An integrated regional project for the production of cocoa at Woleu N'tem is estimated to cost CFA francs 4,000m. and to yield 4,000 metric tons by 1990, this should nearly double the crop.

Other export-oriented projects cover coffee, copra and groundnuts. In addition, several regional projects — such as rice growing at N'dende, cultivation of plantains at N'toum, and cattle and poultry projects at N'yanga and near Libreville — are aimed at reducing the high level of food imports.

The major part of government development spending will, however, be in the transport field to help to open up the interior of the country, with particular emphasis on the Trans-Gabon railway. This is to be extended to Booué, thus making large new forestry areas accessible for exploitation. A start is also to be made on a rail link to Franceville, in the southeast, where the manganese and uranium mines are situated. Road projects include a feeder network for the Trans-Gabon railway.

The development plan also places emphasis on improving the income distribution between the urban and agricultural sectors, as well as the living conditions in the farming areas, and expanded extension services. The Government wants agricultural incomes to rise in line with urban wages during the programme period. The overall wage policy is a steady increase of wage incomes in real terms at a relatively low inflation rate.

CAUSES OF GOLD PRODUCTION STAGNATION REVIEWED

London WEST AFRICA in English 1 Dec 80 pp 2416-2417

[Text]

THE GHANA GOVERNMENT is undertaking a major programme for the revival and expansion of the country's gold-mining industry. It is hoped to create the right atmosphere to attract large-scale investment from overseas and a meeting of investors is to be held on January 6 next year. A preliminary report by a government committee on gold production, which was chaired by the vice-president, together with an aide memoire from Lonrho on the Tarkwa Goldfields give an indication of the prospects for expansion and also indicate the causes of the present decline of the industry in Ghana.

Tarkwa Goldfields produced 39,214 ounces of gold in the 1979/80 financial year. Production has since declined to about 24,000 ounces a year. The Lonrho aide memoire says production could be doubled within a year and doubled again within four years to 96,000 ounces, which would earn revenue of $57.6m. In six years production could be up to 144,000 ounces, earning $86.4m., and there is enough known ore in the area of Tarkwa for the mine to expand in a second phase to 240,000 ounces a year, which would yield $144m. This is a prospect that could make a huge difference to Ghana's balance of payments difficulties and thus her shortages and inflation.

The government committee's report has some alarming figures on the recent decline in Ghana's gold production. Tarkwa Goldfields produced 57,469 fine ounces in the 1975/76 financial year and, as has been mentioned, this was down to 39,214 ounces in 1979/80. Ashanti Goldfields produced 372,469 fine ounces in 1975/76 and only 232,156 fine ounces in 1979/80. Over the same period Prestea Goldfields went from 83,922 fine ounces to 82,104; Dunkwa Goldfields from 12,415 to 4,159; Konogo from 5,513 to 60 (the mine is now almost entirely shut down).

The committee listed these 15 factors contributing to the decline:

1. There has been no new gold mining venture in the country since 1938. In 1938 there were as many as 35 gold mining companies operating in the Gold Coast; by the end of the Second World War the number had been reduced to about 11; now only four could be listed as operating mines.
2. Exploration of new ore bodies and proven ore reserves on many of the existing mines had been inadequate.
3. The low gold prices from 1934 until 1972 had been a severe constraint in the development of new gold mines.
4. The mineral policy of the country had been on a very ad hoc basis, particularly since Ghana attained independence, and this constituted a major deterrent to foreign investors.
5. As a result there had been a deterioration of management efficiency and a depletion of mining skills in the country. There were as many as 1,033 expatriates in the mining industry in 1938 as compared to 105 expatriates in 1980.
6. The negative growth in all sectors of the economy over the past ten years has had an adverse effect on the operations of gold mines. Scarcity of foreign exchange has left little or no room for improvement and expansion of the gold industry: there has been a lack of working capital, inadequate allocation and poor timing of import licences and letters of credit, dislocation of purchasing programme, etc.

7. Scarcity of essential commodities, galloping inflation and deterioration in workers' morale also caused a drop in productivity.

8. Shortages included such items as miners' boots, cap lamps, drill steel, blasting agents and chemicals. There are no local manufacturers to provide substitutes.

9. For the past five years the government has subjected the mining industry to the same rules and regulations as other sectors, as if mining companies import raw materials for trading purposes. The companies pay 10 per cent levy on letters of credit for the importation of mining stores.

10. There has been a high turnover of senior mining personnel for the past five years, both expatriates and Ghanaian. At the lower level there has been a mass exodus of junior staff and underground workers to other sectors of the economy, in particular, agriculture.

11. The gold mining industry has experienced poor labour/management relations for the past five years.

12. The recent dramatic increase in the gold price and the deterioration in the purchasing power of the cedi have enhanced gold theft and smuggling activities which have reached alarming proportions. It is alleged that the black market price of gold is about ₵5,000 an ounce, as compared to the official average price of ₵1,650 an ounce on the international market. Illegal gold panning operations have been on the increase all over the country.

13. It is necessary to have a stable gold mining code as part of a long-term mining policy. Mining being a high risk venture, investors require the government to formulate stable mineral law regulations which will not be amended, repealed or frustrated by ad hoc budgetary measures. Ideally, mining leases become attractive when the sector is assured of long-term mineral policies, which have a time horizon of about 20 to 50 years.

14. The country has experienced instability for the past 20 years and this has contributed in no small way to the lack of investment in the Ghanaian economy generally (and the gold industry in particular).

15. The level of taxation is a disincentive to development or new mining ventures. For the past five years the gold mining industry has been subjected to the following tax schedules: royalty at 6½ per cent of the gross value of minerals won; minimum mineral duty ranging from 5 to 10 per cent; company tax ranging from 50 to 55 per cent; minimum turnover tax of 2½ per cent; import duty of 35 per cent; import levy (or currently import licence tax) of 10 per cent; foreign exchange tax ranging from 33 to 75 per cent; gold export levy at ₵3 per ounce of gold after 100,000 ounces.

In proposing steps to be taken by the government for establishing a viable gold industry, the committee suggests a reform of the whole tax structure and also the permitting of expatriates to remit 50 per cent of their net income. Mining companies should be allowed to import directly food items and other essential commodities for the work force.

The Lonrho report on the Tarkwa Goldfields which follows up a 1976 report, said in part:

"The present report is based on a fact-finding mission to Tarkwa to examine the relevance of the expansion project in current circumstances.

"The 1976 report recommended the expansion of output at Tarkwa Goldfields to a level of 780,000 tons yielding 143,100 ounces of gold per annum in the seventh year. This level of output was considered an essential first phase. A second phase of expansion would follow in which annual output could again be doubled.

"It has for long been our considered opinion that the Tarkwa Basin provides the best potential in Ghana for massive long-term expansion of the gold mining industry. This conclusion was first stated in our report of 1969, and confirmed in each of the subsequent studies in 1971, 1972, 1974 and 1976. The present investigation has again confirmed this view.

"The Tarkwa Goldfields mine is centrally situated in relation to the known oreshoots and provides the best and quickest means of developing the potential of this extensive gold-bearing area.

"The Tarkwa mine was designed for, and operated at, production levels of 740,000 tons per year yielding 170,000 ounces of gold. The infrastructure of the mine with renovations, shaft sinking and underground development could again be operated at these levels. This should be viewed against the current level of output of about 240,000 tons per year, yield 37,000 ounces of gold.

"There is a critical situation regarding certain equipment at the mine. The failure of any of this or lack of spare parts or mining supplies could cause a rapid decrease or complete halt to gold production and thus in foreign exchange earnings.

In view of the extreme run-down condition of the mine equipment a period of renovation and consolidation of up to two years will be essential before any substantial expansion programme can be undertaken. During this period the necessary mining equipment, supplies and spare parts essential for the rehabilitation of the mine will have to be ordered and experienced management and supervisory staff will have to be recruited to carry out the programme.

"Our re-examination confirms that it is technically feasible and financially viable to increase gold output at Tarkwa from the present level of 3,000 ounces per month to 12,000 ounces per month in a nine-year programme. Since the 1976 Report working costs have increased five-fold, but the price of gold has increased ten-fold from ₵143.75 per ounce to ₵1,488 per ounce.

"The foreign exchange earnings would double by year five; treble in year seven and increase to four times in year nine. However, if the price of gold increases even further, as some experts predict, then the returns will be even higher."

AGRICULTURAL COOPERATION WITH S.A.--Maseru--Lesotho and South Africa had decided on agricultural cooperation and development, the Prime Minister, Chief Leabua Jonathan, said this week. The decision was taken at his meeting with the South African Prime Minister, Mr P. W. Botha, on the Peka Bridge last August. He said Mr Botha had already issued instructions to South African farming cooperatives to assist Lesotho farmers. Each farming district should cooperate with South African cooperatives nearest them. As examples, he said farmers in the Mohaleshoek district should work with cooperatives in the Free State towns of Zastron and Wepener, while those nearest Maseru would be assisted by cooperatives in Ladybrand.--SAPA [Text] [Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 13 Dec 80 p 8]

NEW COINS--The Lesotho government is marking the 110th anniversary of the death of the founder of the Basotho nation Chief Moshoeshoe 1, by issuing a currency for their country. The currency consists of gold and silver coins. The coins carry a portrait of the Lesotho king, King Moshoeshoe II, on the obverse while eight different designs on the reserve typify various features of Lesotho's life. The coinage is from one sente to 10 maloti. The set consists of eight coins of the following denominations: 1 sente, 2 lisente, 5 lisente, 10 lisente, 1 loti and 10 maloti. On the reverse side of each coin is the portrait of Moshoeshoe I. On the abverse is featured a symbolic design featuring major aspects of the Basotho way of life. The diamond draws attention to the country's new and flourishing diamond mining industry. The famous Basotho hat reflects the great strides that have been made in the development of tourism. The maize cob indicates the importance of agriculture in the nation's life. The crocodile is the ancient symbol of the royal family of Lesotho. The two gold coins have individual velvet cases gold stamped with the Lesotho coat of arms. [Text] [Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 9 Dec 80 p 15]

PRC MADE 'EVEN BIGGER MESS' THAN TOLBERT

London WEST AFRICA in English 1 Dec 80 pp 2406-2407

[Text]

SEVEN MONTHS after the Liberian Revolution when Master Sergeant Samuel K. Doe promised on national television that "we will all enjoy like the corrupt Tolbert Government enjoyed," Liberia has come up with a more realistic policy of a tightening of belts and a new political move towards one-man leadership. In a move unknown to the rest of the 19-man People's Redemption Council (PRC), Master Sergeant Doe admitted in his November 17 economic policy speech that the lines of authority needed clear definition, and that the PRC would thereafter speak "with one voice".

"All letters coming from the Council (PRC) on matters affecting the operation of Government, business, commerce, investment and labour will carry my signature approving same in my capacity as Chairman," he said. He then went on to restrict the role of PRC members in policy functions to zero. Members of the Council had previously been assigned to head various committees on government policy, with some serving as co-ordinators in autonomous government agencies. Deferring all such PRC participation in the running of the country's daily affairs, Master Sergeant Doe expressed the "fervent hope that confidence will be quickly restored to the Liberian economy".

These long-overdue moves have however come a little belatedly, for the most significant change in the country since the revolution seems to be that of a rapid decline of the economy. Coupled with this is the lack of social confidence in the military's intentions to declare a timetable for civilian rule as well as the question of several hundred civilians still under detention and the nine military officers whose trials for treason have just ended.

Reiterating his promise to be honest with the Liberian people, Master Sergeant Doe readily admits some of the problems which have contributed to the economic decline, notably, the military interference "of members of the People's Redemption Council in the affairs of business houses, public corporations, concessions, and generally, in labour matters." What is not mentioned, however, are factors such as the increase in government wages and military salaries (costing an additional $32m. annually) as well as having to bear the costs of facilities planned or already given to the military.

For the last economic quarter, July to September this year, the PRC government spent $73m. and earned $46m., leaving a deficit of $27m. There are also expenditures such as the subsidising of middle-income housing for military men, free facilities provided to some members of the new establishment and cabinet, the provision of salaries, housing and cars to all members of the national football team and the heavy subsidising of basic commodities such as rice. Rice, the main staple, still costs the $20 per bag as attested to by former Commerce Minister John Sherman, and today costs the government more than it did before Mr. Sherman was executed. Also aggravating the deficit has been the official oversight in observing the Budget Ordinance which placed a restraint on public spending. Foreign trips alone are said to have reached $2m. since July instead of the $800,000 budgeted for, while the recent trip to the United Nations led by Foreign Minister Baccus Matthews cost the government over $90,000 for the two-week period.

Another cause of the economic slump has been the $25m. siphoned out of the country partly by the estimated 7,000 Liberians fleeing to the United States and other places, partly by the Lebanese merchants anxious to protect their savings. And with the annoying military interference in business and labour matters, businessmen have been as reluctant to make full-scale investments as the commercial banks have been to advance credit facilities. A few of the larger business houses have shut up shop, while the Bong Mining Company and the National Iron Ore Company, two of the largest earners of foreign exchange, have indicated their desire to close down their iron ore mines.

However, to offset the high government expenditures an increase in taxation has brought more money into the Treasury, although Liberians are going to find it difficult to cope with the compulsory buying of national savings bonds recently announced. During October, government money supply was so short that some salaries were cut, and the new contribution, although a clever idea, reminds Liberians of the compulsory donation of a month's salary to the True Whig Party during the Tubman Administration and the forcible contribution to the "Rally Time" kitty of President Tolbert's reign.

The other, more immediate side of the threatening economic depression is the swift rise in prices of basic commodities and growing shortages. Liberians are accusing shop-owners of hoarding and inflating prices. One letter to the New Liberian of September 26 reads:

"In fact, even the prices of locally-produced commodities have been increased. A loaf of bread, for example, now costs 15 cents instead of the previous price of 10 cents. Master Sergeant Doe is no longer down here with us, but he had certainly been with us before April 12, and therefore knows what all this means."

Today part of the difficulty of finding items like bath soap and washing powder on the market stem from the declining production of local factories, while the frequent scarcity of rice can be blamed on the fact that large amounts of the consignments are distributed from the Barclay Training Centre military barracks.

Master Sergeant Doe's assertion of his leadership might turn out to be a fortunate move. Decisions made in Liberia for the past few months have been military ones, with the civilian revolutionaries playing almost as compliant a role as did the ineffective members of the Tolbert cabinet. However, with the PRC Council now relegated to the background, conditions could well improve. Setting a good example, Master Sergeant Doe now drives around Monrovia in a Honda car instead of the Mercedes Benzes driven by some members of the PRC and the Cabinet. Similarly, military men have been repeatedly warned about moving into vacant houses and commandeering property belonging to private citizens, although preventive measures have had little effect to date.

One of the questions which continues to concern Liberians is that of the few hundred political prisoners still detained in prisons around the country. One recently-released detainee confirms that there are over 100 political prisoners still in the Barclay Training Centre Post Stockade, excluding those recently freed. Hopes for a speedy amnesty for most prisoners were high when the 22 men were released on November 8, especially when Master Sergeant Doe informed the freed officials that "the revolution stood for fair play and respect for human dignity", adding that "Liberia is a country of one people working towards one goal". These hopes were soon dashed, however, when it became generally known that the release was a direct result of an IMF ultimatum. The National Bank, unable to meet salary payments for October, closed its doors on November 5 after depleting funds borrowed from the commercial banks, and the government was informed that the $8.7m. in IMF funds would not be forthcoming unless prisoners were freed.

Prison conditions

Meanwhile the conditions of political prisoners held in Monrovia and at the maximum security prisons in Grand Gedeh County and Belleyellah remain a concern.

Recent reports tell of the seizure and burning of clothes and blankets used by prisoners in the Post Stockade by PRC Speaker, Brigadier-General Nicholas Podier, who claimed that the prisoners were living a life of luxury. But Brigadier-General Podier refutes the charges in the Sunday People of November 9. It reports:

"Reacting to rumours about poor conditions of the prisoners, he (Brigadier Podier) said prisoners at the Post Stockade were not receiving adverse treatment. Enemies of the revolution were spreading rumours and distorting facts with the sole purpose of creating tension among the people. He said government recognised the prisoners' rights and nothing would be done to abuse those rights. Prisoners would be released following their trials when government was sure that they posed no threat to the Liberian people."

On the question of a return to civilian rule, the PRC Government's position still depends on the eradication of the conditions which caused the coup. Some of the attempts to achieve such improvements are the construction of barracks to house soldiers living in appalling conditions at the Barclay Training Centre. Other efforts include the starting of self-help programmes, the abolition of the hut tax imposed on poorer citizens in the rural areas during previous administrations, the mandatory payment of outstanding taxes and amenity bills, the restructuring of the educational system, and most important, Master Sergeant Doe's recent policy statement designed to arrest the new advent of nepotism and the trend of employing unqualified people in government and private industries on PRC directives.

The government of President Tolbert undoubtedly left the Liberian economy in ruins, but the seven-month-old PRC government has made an even bigger mess. The possibilities of quick recovery are uncertain, and future growth depends on a number of factors. Firstly, the exemption of PRC members and military men from administrative affairs would have to be strictly enforced, with the government itself rigidly following the guidelines set for restricted spending of national funds. Secondly, confidence in investment would definitely need to be rebuilt. Tied up with this confidence is the release of most of the political detainees, as well as a strong courting of the commercial banks to offer additional credit facilities to businessmen. In the long run, however, the growth and recovery of our country seems to depend on the soldiers returning to the military barracks at the earliest date.

RATSIRAKA RECEIVES EAST EUROPE DIPLOMATS, PROPOSES STABEX

Tananarive MADAGASCAR-MATIN in French 15 Nov 80 pp 1, 2

[Text] Three new ambassadors accredited to the RDM [Democratic Republic of Madagascar] presented their credentials yesterday morning to President Didier Ratsiraka. The formalities customary in this type of ceremony were observed in the case of each ambassador: the playing of the respective national anthems in the courtyard of the State Palace of Ambohitsorohitra, where a detachment of the People's Armed Forces did the honors; and a meeting of the new ambassadors with the chief of state following the formal presentation of their credentials.

At 0930 hours His Excellency Gabor Suto, ambassador of the People's Republic of Hungary, prepared to fulfill his obligations as a newly accredited diplomat. He had previously presented to the chief of state the "heartiest congratulations from the comrade president of Hungary, and the Hungarian people, to President Didier Ratsiraka and the Malagasy people, together with Hungary's best wishes for continuation of the fruitful and multiform cooperation that exists between our two peoples."

President Didier Ratsiraka is all the more pleased to welcome the Hungarian diplomat inasmuch as Hungary and Madagascar are "two countries that have common objectives and ideals." President Didier Ratsiraka cited as an example the cooperation that already exists: "We buy cars from you," he said, "and you buy coffee from us." In this connection President Didier Ratsiraka suggested a revision of the system of trade between Madagascar and the socialist countries. "A study should be made," he said, "of ways to stabilize the prices for the raw materials sold to the socialist countries." It is the president's opinion that an average price--valid for a period of several years--should be adopted, so that if world prices increase our socialist partners would buy from us at the fixed price, as they would likewise do even if they would "lose a little" thereby. "In any event," President Didier Ratsiraka hastened to emphasize, "our foreign exchange receipts are subject to fixed rates."

The president did not hesitate to declare that the two countries still have "a great deal to do" to "expand and improve their cooperation."

In addition to the "Ikarus" automobiles which have introduced Hungary to the RDM, that country has undertaken a project to exploit the bauxite of Manantenina. This project was in fact discussed at the outset of the chief of state's conversation with the Hungarian ambassador. We cannot say more, because to do so would infringe on the private character of the presidential audience with the Hungarian diplomat, whose residence is in Maputo.

At 1025 hours it is the turn of His Excellency Mohamed El Aashry, the new ambassador from Egypt, to be received by President Didier Ratsiraka. The Egyptian diplomat was quick to express the sincere best wishes which President Anwar El Sadat has enunciated "for the prosperity of Madagascar and for the statesman who has been elevated by his fellow citizens to the highest office in the land." His Excellency Mohamed El Aashry then pledged to President Didier Ratsiraka that he would strive to develop and improve cooperation between the two countries. To this end, however, he is counting on the "powerful and friendly cooperation" of the Malagasy authorities.

Once again President Didier Ratsiraka was intent on removing any ambiguities concerning relations between Cairo and Antananarivo. The best possible example to demonstrate the fact that these relations remain basically sound is the circumstance that the president (as he himself emphasized yesterday) regularly receives letters of congratulation from his Egyptian counterpart, most recently on the occasion of our president's birthday--letters to which the president has responded in kind.

President Didier Ratsiraka could not have spoken out with greater clarity than he did yesterday. "We have nothing against Egypt," he said, "nor against President Sadat. We make allowance for circumstances, however. There is Egypt's domestic policy, in which we do not interfere. As for its foreign policy with respect to the PLO, we are committed historically to defense of the cause of the PLO and the just struggles for liberation."

President Ratsiraka went on to state that this difference should not prevent the two countries from cooperating. "Egypt," he said, "like Madagascar, is an African country, and both belong to the Movement of the Nonaligned Countries." Then he reassured the Egyptian diplomat: "Be assured of our support; we shall make the task easy for you, insofar as we are able."

At 1100 hours the first Czechoslovak ambassador was accredited to the RDM, with residence at Dar es Salaam. His Excellency Stefan Uher in turn presented his credentials to the chief of state. The Czechoslovak diplomat indicated that he was "very grateful" to the Malagasy Government for accepting his credentials, all the more so in that he is his country's very first ambassador to Madagascar.

President Didier Ratsiraka then pointed out that relations between Czechoslovakia and Madagascar date back to 1976. In other words, the appointment of this diplomat to the post of ambassador therefore aims at initiating a "loyal and lasting" cooperation between the two countries. Citing the fact that trade agreements were signed this year in Prague, the president expressed the wish that the two countries not limit themselves to these agreements and stated that other areas for cooperation are possible. Two examples among many: Czechoslovakia is renowned in the optical field and in the field of hydroelectric dam construction. In the opinion of President Didier Ratsiraka these two sectors are already two potential areas of cooperation.

No information concerning these talks that President Didier Ratsiraka had in succession with each of these three diplomats has come to the public's attention, and none will until these talks are translated (soon, we hope) into action and the general public is thereby apprised of this new manifestation of our "all round" foreign policy.

NUJOMA DISCUSSES SWAPO IN INTERVIEW

Windhoek WINDHOEK OBSERVER in English 29 Nov 80 p 10

[Text]

It is SWAPO's 20th anniversary, and two correspondents, Jane Coles and Nick Fadugba of the monthly London publication "Africa" held an extensive interview with Mr. Sam Nujoma, the movement's President.

At the interview, Mr. Nujoma produced photographic and other material, which he claimed was authentic. One of the pictures shows a downed Impala, the type of interceptor used in South West Africa's war zone.

As can be gleaned from the interview, Mr. Nujoma stretched propaganda too far when asked about 'semi-liberated' areas, being regions where SWAPO's guerrillas are known to be present.

Here follows the text of the interview:

• AFRICA: This year is the 20th anniversary of the formation of SWAPO. What would you consider to be its most important achievements and the most important lessons you have learned?

NUJOMA: During all those years of hard struggle and suffering, we have mobilized the masses of the Namibian people politically. Today, the Namibian people are politically mature. They know what they want and how to get it. They have realised their responsibility towards the liberation of their country. The people have reached a stage where they have no point of return except to accept the reality of the situation, whether they are faced with tanks while they are bare-handed, or with jet-fighters, as in our case, where the struggle has reached a very critical stage, a stage where women with children on their backs are demanding guns to go and fight.

What have I learnt? I have learnt to rely on my people. I have every trust and confidence, that Namibia's independence is imminent. It will soon come because the Namibian people are determined to fight and liberate themselves. I have further learnt the importance of co-operation and working together with the rest of the African countries and liberation movements, as well as the rest of the international community. I have learnt that human beings are important irrespective of their colour or race, or status in society.

Q: How do you see the immediate future for Namibia within the context of southern Africa and the recent liberation of Zimbabwe?

A: There has been considerable progress in as far as the struggle for liberation of the entire African continent is concerned, including southern Africa. The achievement of independence of Angola and Mozambique enhanced and strengthened the position of the liberation movements. Now that our comrades of the Patriotic Front earlier this year scored the final victory over the British colonial settlers and their puppets of Muzorewa, this again further strengthened and created more confidence in the people themselves. If our comrades can fight and liberate themselves in Zimbabwe, why not in Namibia? Either we fight it out in battle, and in a protracted armed struggle, we will definitely defeat the enemy, or independence may be achieved through a negotiated settlement as envisaged in the United Nations decolonization plan under Security Council Resolution 435.

Q How then do you view the latest developments in attempts to implement the United Nations plan for fair and free elections in Namibia?

A We had hoped that by this time the United Nations decolonization plan would have been implemented, but to our disappointment and dismay, it has not been, because of obstacles put forward by racist South Africa and because of South Africa's intransigence and defiance of the United Nations Security Council decisions.

Q The United Nations is currently discussing Namibia again. What do you look for from this meeting?

A SWAPO is pressing for an immediate debate of the Security Council to consider appropriate measures to be taken against South Africa under Chapter 7 of the Charter of the United Nations. That means complete comprehensive economic sanctions, arms and oil embargo, and the total isolation of the Pretoria racist regime. We are convinced that is the only way the minority White settler regime in South Africa will be compelled to accept a genuine negotiated settlement and implementation of Security Coundil Resolution 435, in Namibia. Otherwise, South Africa will continue to build up its military strength in Namibia, as well as go ahead with the imposition of a neo-colonial puppet regime.

Q Given South African intransigence, will SWAPO perhaps decide to take its own initiative to advance its cause rather than continuing to look for ways and means of implementing the United Nations plan?

A SWAPO's position as a liberation movement has never depended on the support of the international community alone. The political mass mobilization that is being carried out by the Namibian people, is being carried out by the Namibian people in opposition to the continued illegal occupation of their country by South Africa, and the armed liberation struggle which is being carried out by the People's Liberation Army of Namibia, the military wing of SWAPO, is the first and most effective form of struggle in the absence of a genuine negotiated settlement.

The Western powers have succeeded in manoeuvring behind the scenes, have exercised their vetos, in the past, to support the racist regime of South Africa and its illegal occupation of Namibia, and through their multi-national corporations which jointly with racist South Africa exploit Namibia's wealth, have weakened the position of the United Nations. In this respect the United Nations is rendered ineffective by its own members. The people of Namibia are therefore left with no alternative but to rely on themselves by intensifying the armed struggle. But at the same time we will carry out this armed struggle simultaneously with political and diplomatic actions, because there is a need for us to isolate South Africa.

Q There have been increasing reports of SWAPO sabotage attacks within Namibia on strategic installations such as railway lines and the Ruacana power power line, etc. How far into the country does PLAN SWAPO's armed wing operate?

A These are not isolated incidents: they are complete military operations carried out by the People's Liberation Army of Namibia (PLAN). The power line from Ruacana hydro-electric station has been completely put out of action. The enemy attempted to repair it, and it was again put out of action. Now the enemy is no longer in a position even to protect technicians who normally repair this power line, and that slows down the production of the mines. So these are the successes.

The railway line has also been put out of action, the enemy repaired it, but it continued to be put out of action. We have also been destroying, attacking and capturing arms and ammunition, radio equipment and other war materials, including South African prisoners of war who are today in our hands. Because of the success of the war and the stage the struggle has reached, we have driven the minority White settlers out of the farms and into the cities, and we are following them there, until South Africa surrenders power to the African majority in Namibia.

Q There are reports of semi-liberated areas in northern Namibia that are under SWAPO's effective control. How extensive are these areas?

A We have made considerable successes. We have north-western, northern and north-eastern regions under our control. Enemy troops -- with ground forces backed up by air cover such as jet-fighters and helicopters -- can enter a semi-liberated area because South Africa's war machinery is sophisticated, but they are not able to stay there. They may control big centres like Ondangua and Oshakati in the north and Katima Mulilo, and so on, but the rest of the rural area up to the district of Outjo, Otjiwarongo, Tsumeb, Grootfontein, we control.

Q South Africa claims to have killed over a thousand SWAPO guerrillas this year and that it has put PLAN out of action. What is the truth of this?

A It is very interesting to note this claim by South Africa. Since 1978, when South African racist troops attacked the Namibian refugee camp in southern Angola at Kassinga, it has claimed it has destroyed SWAPO's backbone. Now, if someone's backbone is broken, then it is finished with that person, but SWAPO is still growing stronger and stronger. Earlier this year South Africa carried out massive operations with two divisions of its troops armed with tanks, combat vehicles, helicopters, jet-fighters of various kinds, long range artillery, and claimed that it destroyed SWAPO's backbone.

Now again it is claiming that it has killed thousands of SWAPO's guerrilla forces. SWAPO is supposed to have been finished by now, but every day they claim that SWAPO has destroyed this, attacked that, so many South African soldiers have died. I remember once they said SWAPO has only about 300 freedom fighters in Namibia. Now a thousand have been killed. Where do they all come from? It is a lot of contradiction. But I want to assure the readers of "AFRICA" that SWAPO is growing stronger. We used to have only platoons in our army, now we have battalions.

Q. We have covered [AFRICA No. 109] the recent expulsion of SWAPO's former Acting Vice-President, Mishake Muyongo, from the party. Could you comment further on this?

A. As I have said, SWAPO has become a mature liberation movement since its foundation 20 years ago. We have had setbacks and successes in the struggle. We have had infiltrators in our movement from the enemy. We have succeeded in uprooting these enemy agents within our movement, we have expelled counter-revolutionary and puppet elements within our rank and file. The Central Committee of SWAPO, the policy-making body, resolved to expel former Acting Vice-President Albert Muyongo, and other elements who are supporting the evil policies of homelands and bantustans, which aim at the division of our country on an ethnic basis as in the Transkei and Bophutatswana in South Africa. We do not want the Matanzimas and Mangopes in Namibia, let alone in SWAPO which is a revolutionary movement.

So the party reserves the right to discipline its members, including the President of SWAPO. I have to make sure that all that I do is in accordance with the constitution, policies and programme of SWAPO. Otherwise, the party will definitely take action against me.

Q. On what conditions would SWAPO sit down across the table with South Africa, and would such Lancaster House type talks include a discussion of a constitution for Namibia?

A. I do not think really we will have exactly the same type of Lancaster House talks like that between the Patriotic Front, the British, and the racist colonial Smith and puppets in London, because Namibia's status is different. Namibia is the direct responsibility of the United Nations, and SWAPO and the Namibian people recognise the United Nations as the legal authority over Namibia. Therefore in this respect, the correct and legal administrative authority is the United Nations. It has to chair the conference that you are envisaging. That is a SWAPO pre-condition. There is already a decolonization plan, drawn up by the United Nations Secretary-General and adopted by the United Nations Security Council Resolution 435. We have got to go to the elections under that plan, no more, no less.

Q. Finally, Mr. President, how do you view the timescale for the achievement of Namibia's independence?

A. Well, one must admit that the South African racist army is stronger than the rest of individual member states of the Organisation of African Unity. It is well armed with NATO was machinery. The Americans have even supplied certain rockets -- 155mm -- to South Africa, which contain elements of nuclear weapons. So South Africa is even in possession of nuclear weapons. Moreover, the NATO countries are giving South Africa the expertise to manufacture arms in South Africa itself. So one can see that our struggle will be protracted, but the most important fact which ought to be remembered is that it is not the arms which are the decisive fctor in a war. It is the people's determination and willingness to sacrifice and free themselves. We are determined, we have the will to fight and liberate ourselves. So therefore we are confident of fighting and defeating the enemy.

SWAPO, SOUTH AFRICA ARE TO MEET ONE-ON-ONE

Windhoek WINDHOEK OBSERVER in English 29 Nov 80 p 23

[Text]

POLITICAL CORRESPONDENT WINDHOEK:

Slanted reports, but particularly misleading headlines, have conveyed the suggestion in the past few days of a so-called All-Party Conference between the "internal" parties, SWAPO, South Africa and the United Nations. The impression has been conveyed of a conference to arrive at one or other political solution for the country.

This, of course, is utter nonsense. Read today the verbatim text between the South African Government and Dr Kurt Waldheim, which was handed to the Security Council. The agreed text is from Paragraphs 18 to 24, and there is a preamble to it.

What is going to take place if ever that conference does become a reality? Is a pre-implementation meeting, in other words, the very first step to putting into motion Security Council Resolution 435 for the holding of internationally-supervised elections in South West Africa?

To be even more explicit: SWAPO and South Africa are meeting face to face. Those first feelers started already in August, as can be seen in a reproduction of our front page.

It is a fact, and one emphasized by Mr. Dirk Mudge at a news conference on Wednesday night, that no party other than SWAPO can go separately and independently, but only as a member of the entourage of the Administrator-General, Mr. Danie Hough. Yet, the country was given the impression, by slanted press reports, of an all-party conference to work out modalities for a future constitution for South West Africa -- some reports even suggesting a conference to decide a constitution.

Mr. Mudge tried to conceal a feeling of uneasiness caused by the fact that his Alliance, the DTA, would be labelled a stooge of South Africa, by going to that pre-implementation conference as a member of Mr. Hough's entourage. One actually had to pity Mr. Mudge, for there is no doubt that he too is serious about an end to the protracted matter of getting somewhere in this country.

Mr. Mudge answered questions after issuing a written statement. In the statement he said that his Alliance was not prepared, at this stage, to say definitely that it would participate in that conference. Mr. Mudge said that full particulars were not known, but that if his Alliance's interpretation of the conditions and circumstances of that conference were correct, the Alliance would be prepared to participate.

He said his Alliance could not regard itself as a puppet of the South African Government. Nor had his Alliance had any objection to the fact that the Administrator-General would lead the delegation. His Alliance was aware that the United Nations were negotiating on behalf of SWAPO and were paying SWAPO's costs. He said that his Alliance could say with justification that SWAPO was attending the conference as a puppet of the United Nations.

Mr. Mudge added that his Alliance was approaching the matter from the supposition that it would be the principal aim of the discussions to eliminate the distrust currently in existence in regard to the United Nations and the Western powers, and more particularly in regard to impartiality in an election. His Alliance was insisting, Mr. Mudge said, that the Western powers and Frontline States should attend the conference. His Alliance accepted that the conference would not only deal with the implementation of Resolution 435, but that other practical proposals could be made at the meeting.

The DTA also accepted, Mr. Mudge said, that it would not find itself in a position of being in the company of minute political parties enjoying no status or support. He suggested that the delegation should be composed of those elected in the December 1978 election.

Answering questions at the news conference, Mr. Mudge said that, as he saw it, the primary purpose of that conference would be to solve the credibility crisis. His Alliance would not participate in an internationally-supervised election if there was no impartiality.

When it was put to him that a written undertaking had been made that all parties would be on a par once implementation of Resolution 435 had started, he remarked: "That is too late to place them on a par after implementation has started. In my opinion, the psychological effect will be too great -- I think if the forces arrive here with a SWAPO label on them, then in my opinion the effect would be too great".

In New York Mr. Theo-Ben Gurirab, SWAPO's United Nations representative, said he would not like to speculate now that there was hope for a pre-implementation conference. What he wanted to say, though, was that as far as his movement was concerned, there would only be talks with South Africa and no one else. Mr. Gurirab said it was totally immaterial who was with the South African delegation.

Here now follows the introductory paragraph to the key paragraphs 18 to 24, which is the verbatim text of the agreement between South Africa and Dr. Kurt Waldheim:

At the end of the mission, Mr. Martti Athisaari travelled to inform the current Chairman of the Organisation of African Unity and the Presidents or Prime Ministers of the Frontline States and Nigeria concerning the discussions in Pretoria and to brief the President of SWAPO. Consultations also continued with the Government of South Africa which, on November 21, stated that it gave its assent to the conclusion which is set out in Paragraphs 18 to 24 below:

Whilst assent is also given by the other Parties consulted for the cause of action they proposed, concern was expressed that if the timeframe for starting implementation were made, even indirectly, to the issue of trust and confidence, there could be the risk of a further and unacceptable delay. In this connection, I have set out the position by my representative in Pretoria in Paragraph 11 above. I am deeply aware of the concern of the international community over the all-too-long postponement to a solution to the question of Namibia.

I believe, however, that we may have reached a decisive stage in the long and difficult effort to resolve this question. I hope, therefore, that all concerned will now be prepared to move forward boldly and in good faith along the lines now suggested in order to ensure a sequence of events leading to the start of implementation of Resolution 435 [1978] in March, 1981, and independence by the end of 1981.

In the consultations which I have undertaken since the return of the mission with the governments of the five Western members of the contact group, they have pledged their support for the cause of action proposed, and in particular for the timeframe set out below. They have also emphasized that they will continue to use their good offices to this end.

CONCLUSION:

PARAGRAPH 18:

It is of vital importance that the independence of Namibia should be achieved in 1981, in accordance with Security Council Resolution 435 [1978]. In order to achieve this aim, a date for the ceasefire and a start of implementation should be set in the early part of 1981.

PARAGRAPH 19:

One of the main obstacles to progress in the negotiations hitherto have been acute mutual distrust and lack of confidence. The mission was informed by the South African Government that this problem in itself affects the setting of a date for implementation. It was also informed that, if this obstacle can be overcome, the end of 1981 would be a realistic target date for the independence of Namibia.

PARAGRAPH 20:

A means of facilitating agreement and of creating the necessary climate of confidence and understanding would be a pre-implementation multi-party meeting in which the parties concerned in the emphasis election would be included. There is general agreement that this meeting should be held under the auspices of the Secretary-General of the United Nations.

PARAGRAPH 21

There have recently been a number of initiatives and approaches from various quarters for such a meeting based on the United Nations plan, in conformity with Security Council Resolution 435 [1978] and other practical proposals. Such a meeting could facilitate the implementation of that Resolution by discussing relevant aspects of implementation with the purpose of securing the co-operation of all concerned. In this connection it will be recalled that, under the settlement proposal, the text of drawing up and adopting the constitution is a function of the Constituent Assembly.

PARAGRAPH 22:

It would be understood that a proposed meeting would be held in the context of an agreed time-frame with a view to the parties themselves assisting in resolving difficulties created by distrust and lack of confidence, South Africa having reaffirmed its continuing role as the interlocutor under Resolution 435 [1978].

PARAGRAPH 23:

In the expectation that the problem of confidence can be overcome by the holding of such a meeting, and subject to satisfactory arrangements concerning the composition of UNTAG, I would, on the basis of the discussions recently held in Pretoria and after the necessary consultations, propose March, 1981 for the commencement of implementation of Resolution 435 [1978].

PARAGRAPH 24:

Accordingly, the intention would be to call a pre-implementation meeting from January 7 to 14, 1981, under the auspices and chairmanship of the United Nations. The basis of the meeting would conform to the formula agreed upon during bi-lateral discussions held earlier this year on the question of "direct talks". Accordingly, South Africa and SWAPO have been contacted concerning the composition of the respective delegations that will participate in the meeting. I have also contacted the Frontline States and Nigeria, the Organisation of African Unity and the contact group of the Five Western States about the sending of observers.

SWAPO IS READY FOR CEASEFIRE, CLAIMS UN REPRESENTATIVE

Windhoek WINDHOEK OBSERVER in English 29 Nov 80 p 10

[Text]

OWN CORRESPONDENT
NEW YORK:

If the proposed pre-implementation conference does not come off, or in the event of its failure, there will be a total onslaught against Pretoria, said Mr. Theo-Ben Gurirab here yesterday morning [03h20 South African time].

SWAPO's United Nations representative spoke to the press at an informal party hosted by him for his many political friends at the United Nations.

The usually cautious Mr. Gurirab, who in recent weeks showed mental fatigue because of having worked almost around the clock, struck an extremely happy note.

"SWAPO is now ready to sign a ceasefire. From what we learn here, the South Africans remain adamant, and they refuse an assurance, a commitment of a ceasefire.

"If this attitude of theirs continues, and if the pre-implementation meeting does not take place, then there will be action by the African Group and all our other friends at the United Nations to urge the convening of a Security Council meeting with a view to invoking mandatory sanctions against South Africa.

"We have informed the Secretary-General that we are ready to sign a ceasefire. If there is further failure, we have this commitment by our many friends of more forthcoming aid, more than we are already getting, with a view to intensifying the struggle on all fronts. The war will be intensified. There will be a total onslaught. There are countries that will give us all-round assistance to achieve this", said Mr. Gurirab.

BRIEFS

MINING PLANS--The Minister of Mines and Power, Alhaji Ibrahim Hassan, last Thursday said that the country had been divided into zones for the effective exploitation of its mineral resources. He said that the zoning would enhance the immediate exploitation of viable mineral resources so that the country would be less dependent on oil. Alhaji Ibrahim, who was speaking at the commissioning of the 345,000 Naira electricity project at Ugep, in Cross River State, said that if the mineral resources of the state fall within the viable zone, his ministry would not hesitate to exploit them. The minerals include uranium and limestone. [Excerpt] [Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 24 Nov 80 p 7]

CHALLAWA DAM--Construction work on the 35 million Naira Challawa Gorge Dan in Kano State is expected to be completed within 30 months, the project manager of the dam, Malam Ado Yakasai, has disclosed. [as published] Contract for the construction of the dam, was awarded to the Kano State Water Resources and Engineering Construction Agency (WRECA), by the Federal Government in April, this year. Malam Ado disclosed that the dam would be the largest in the country, adding that it was primarily designed for irrigation purposes but would also supply drinking water to the surrounding villages in the area. The project manager made these disclosures while welcoming the new director-general of the British Council, Mr. Burgh. The director-general was accompanied to the site of the dam, by the Kano State Head of the Civil Service, Alhaji Saidu Gwarzo. According to the project manager, the dam would cover an area of about 100 square kilometres with a maximum height of 39 metres and crest width of ten metres. Welcoming the director-general, the district head of Karaye, Alhaji Garba Karaye, said that Karaye was found in the eleventh century and that farming was the main occupation of the people of the area. PEANUT PRODUCTION BOOST--The Federal Government has granted 4.3 million Naira to the Nigerian Ground Board (NGB) to boost groundnut production in the country. Speaking to the News Agency of Nigeria (NAN) in Kano, the General Manager of the Board, Alhaji U. B. Danfulani, said the amount fell short of the 11 million Naira needed to purchase groundnut seeds for planting in the 1981 growing season. He attributed the shortfalls in groundnut production over the years to the unprecendented attacks of the aphids and rosette viruses in 1975 as well as the drought in the country in 1973. [as published] He stated that these natural obstacles to groundnut production were compounded by comparatively better pricing for such food crops as rice, corn and millet, which farmers now preferred to produce. He regretted that purchase of the commodities by his board had fallen drastically from 2,195 tonnes in the 1975-76 buying season to only eight tonnes in 1978/80.

Alhaji U. B. Danfulani mentioned smuggling as one of the most intractable problems facing his board. He said that the law which gave farmers the freedom to sell their products at places and to people of their choice was being exploited by some middlemen who smuggled groundnut to neighbouring countries to obtain foreign exchange with which foreign goods were smuggled back into the country. POLICE PROMOTIONS--A total of 371 policemen and women in Borno State police Command have been promoted to various ranks between January and November this year. A release issued by the Police Public Relations Officer ASP F. La'aril said those promoted included 216 constables who were promoted to corporals, 131 corporals were promoted to sergeant majors while 18 sergeants were promoted to the inspectorate cadre. The release said more encouragement through promotion was in the pipeline for hard-working and disciplined men of the police in the state. The statement, therefore, urged indigenes of Borno State willing to serve in the force to come and enlist. It further said recruitment exercise takes place every month. The release also pointed out that 32 vacancies existed for the enlistment of women in the state command and therefore urged interested women to join the force. AUTOMOBILE EXPORTS--Nigeria is now to export cars to neighbouring African countries, the Managing Director of Volswagen of Nigeria Limited, Mr. H. E. Spillman has indicated in Lagos. [as published] Already, negotiations are at an advanced stage with Ghana and Sierra Leone on the modalities of introducing Nigerian-assembled cars into those countries, he said. Mr. Spillman who was speaking at the formal launching of a new brand of 'Passat' car, the Passat TS, said the only obstacle that stood in the way of finalising arrangements for export of Nigeria-assembled cars was the foreign exchange problem which, he said would soon be resolved. GLASS FACTORY FOR KANO--A 56 million Naira glass factory is to be established in Dambatta, headquarters of the Dambatta Local Government area of Kano State next year. Disclosing this in an interview, the state's Commissioner for Trade, Industry and Cooperatives, Alhaji Muhammadu Adamu, said that work on the project is expected to take off in March, next year, after the completion of technical studies now going on. The state's Ministry of Lands and Survey, he went on, had completed the topographic studies for the proposed glass project, adding that the Ministry of Trade, Industry and Co-operatives would serve as "surety" for the project. The commissioner also disclosed that the state government would hold 30 per cent shares of the total investment in the industry. [James Akande] [Text] [Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 1 Dec 80 p 24]

DAM CONSTRUCTION--Ogun-Oshun River Basin Authority has signed a 36-million Naira contract agreement for the construction of the civil works of the Ikere Gorge Dam at some 40 kilometres northeast of Iseyin, Oyo State. With a capacity of about 690 million cubic metres of water, the dam, when completed, is expected to provide municipal and industrial water supply for Iseyin township and its environs as well as metropolitan Lagos. It will also help to irrigate some areas in the mid-sector of Ogun basin and provide hydro-power for use in the immediate environment. At the signing ceremony in Abeokuta, capital of Ogun State last Friday, the chairman of the authority, Prince Adeleke Adedoyin, disclosed that the project would play a significant role in the success of the Federal Government's green revolution programme. [Text] [Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 2 Dec 80 p 16]

EFFORTS AGAINST NPN CLAIMED--Governor Shehu Mohammed Kangiwa of Sokoto State has alleged that there are cetain unnamed people with "leftist attitude" working for the down fall of the National Party of Nigeria (NPN) in the guise of being state members of the party. [as published] He made the pronouncement while addressing the state congress of the party in Gusau last weekend. Although journalists were asked to leave the Sardauna Memorial Stadium where the meeting took place, after the various addresses, copies of the speeches said to have been delivered were later distributed to them. He stressed that NPN as a party was moving ahead and no individual should make the mistake of thinking there would be progress without his or her consent. The governor noted that a careful study would reveal that only a few local government branches of the party did not have leadership squables, instead of the leaders to unite and work for the good of the society. SENGHOR DISCUSSES DOMESTIC ECONOMIC SITUATION, PROSPECTS

Niamey SAHEL HEBDO in French 3 Nov 80 pp 24-25

["Exclusive interview of Senghor after closing of CEAO Summit, conducted by Assane Saadou: "I Support African Cooperation"]

[Text] [Question] Mr President, the North-South dialogue has not as yet yielded satisfactory results for our countries. What is your view of the situation and what are your suggestions on the factual establishment of a new world economic order?

Leopold S. Senghor: I believe that one must begin by looking at the facts which motivated the opening of a North-South dialogue. For 15 years, from 1945 to 1960, I denounced in the French parliament the colonialist pact. I denounced the deterioration of trade terms. This deterioration has been computed by the World Bank for the period between 1952 and 1972. It averaged 2.5 percent annually according to World Bank computations. However, following the 1974 crisis, the Third World specialists have estimated the deterioration as ranging between 10 and 20 percent.

Naturally, it is this deterioration that must be fought. I acknowledge the effort made by the developed countries. They had pledged to allocate 0.7 percent of their gross national product to aid to development. Last year their contribution totaled 0.34-0.35 percent (the contribution of the West was equal to that of the communist countries in the East).

[Question] What are the remedies?

[Answer] I believe that the developed countries should honor their commitments and raise their contribution to 0.7 percent of their GNP. However, this would be insufficient and that is the reason for which at the extraordinary session on disarmament of the United Nations I brought up the idea of levying a five percent tax on the defense or war budgets of all developed and developing countries. These are the suggestions I will submit to the congress of the Socialist International which will be held in Madrid from 12 to 16 November. I shall introduce a report on behalf of the South. What is the target? The target, therefore, is to increase the aid given by developed countries to the developing countries in order to stabilize raw material prices, including petroleum (I can speak freely on the subject since we have petroleum in Senegal which we will begin to extract in 1983). I believe that the OPEC is headed toward the solution that petroleum prices must be indexed to the prices of goods and services of the developed countries.

[Question] Mr President, what point has been reached with the organization of the trilogue? Could the trilogue succeed where the dialogue failed?

[Answer] Ever since our independence, in Senegal, we have called for a dialogue between Europe and Africa or, more precisely, for a Euro-African association. It was then that the dialogue between Europe and the Arab countries was initiated. At the 1977 Cairo Arab-African summit Conference I launched the idea of a European-Arab-African association. The purpose of the trilogue is the same.

Let us point out that we are progressing slowly. We discussed the problem at the extraordinary summit meeting of the OAU held last April in Lagos. We also discussed it at the beginning of July at the regular summit meeting of the OAU in Freetown.

Naturally, we are pursuing our dialogue with the French government. I shall mention this again to President Giscard d'Estaing in November.

[Question] Mr President, considering the current situation, what is the state of the Senegalese economy and what are its prospects?

[Answer] The Senegalese economy is experiencing difficulties like all economies throughout the world. Its difficulties are enhanced by the fact that we are a Sudano-Sahelian country. In 20 years of Senegalese independence we have had 10 years of drought. The situation was aggravated by the fact that we had a severe drought in 1977 which was repeated in 1979. On each occasion we had a balance of trade deficit of some 50 billion. That is why we are currently borrowing some 100 billion francs from France and from international institutions.

The Senegalese economy is having difficulties but it is not alone. I am sure that you read in the latest issue of the periodical JEUNE AFRIQUE that the Ivory Coast is experiencing difficulties and was planning to borrow several hundred billion. Clearly, the Ivory Coast is richer than Senegal.

We are borrowing but, since last year, we have also inaugurated an austerity policy.

The prime minister submitted to the national assembly a short-term recovery plan. Subsequently, at the beginning of this year, he submitted a medium-term recovery plan for the 1980-1985 period. Above all, along with these recovery plans, we are proceeding with industrial development. In fact, we have discovered a source of energy (petroleum was discovered over 10 years ago but it is of the heavy, bitumenous kind). We shall begin petroleum extraction in 1983. By 1986 we shall begin, therefore, to exploit important iron ore deposits in eastern Senegal. We have discovered other mineral resources as well. I believe that we shall have several difficult years and that we shall come to the surface by 1986-1987 providing that we follow our policy of austerity. Let me remind you that we have closed down one-half of our embassies and removed one-half of our official cars, among other measures.

[Question] Mr President, to what extent could groups such as the CEAO [West African Economic Community] and the CEDEAO [West African State Economic community] speed up African Unity?

[Answer] I have always supported African cooperation in concentric circles. In 1963, at the constituent congress of the OAU, opposing those who, like N'Krumah were in favor of the immediate organization of an African economic community, a joint government, and a joint army, I supported a methodical and more progressive development and the organization of regional communities.

Last year West Africa was the first area to set up a community. Previously, however, we had already established subregional communities (OMUS) [expansion unknown, presumably OMVS], OMVG, CILSS [Inter-state Committee to Fight the Drought in the Sahel]). I believe that it is through specific, methodical and progressive activities that African unity will be achieved on the basis of an economic plan alone, for on the political level, in Senegal we are democrats. We believe that each state must develop its own model in accordance with its own history, geography and economic and cultural realities.

[Answer] I do not foresee a political role for the CEAO for the simple reason, stating this yet once again, that each country must implement its ideological option and each state must set its own model.

That is why I can say that since 1945 through their votes the Senegalese have always shown their attachment to democratic socialism. Currently we have a multiple party system in Senegal. We have four parties representing the current ideologies. We have a conservative party, a radical liberal party, a democratic socialist party, and a Marxist-Leninist party. I think, therefore, that the CEAO should be an economic community transcending ideological differences.

TWO FRENCH FINANCING AGREEMENTS SIGNED

Dakar LE SOLEIL in French 11 Nov 80 p 3

[Text] Two agreements were signed yesterday morning in the office of the minister of the Economy and Finance. One agreement concerns the opening up of credit totaling 550,000,000 CFA francs, by means of which the Central Fund for Economic Cooperation [CCCE] is participating in the financing of the ORTS [Senegalese Office of Television Broadcasting] emergency plan; this agreement was signed by Ousmane Seck and Mr Charpentier, the director of the CCCE in Senegal. The other agreement, which concerns a loan of 10,000,000,000 CFA francs by means of which the CCCE is making available to Senegal the resources needed to finance a huge investment program, was signed by the minister of the Economy and Finance, Aristide Alcantara, the director of the BNDS [Senegal National Development Bank] and Mr Charpentier.

With the opening up of 550,000,000 in credit, the financial aid from the CCCE takes place in the context of the Senegalese government's decision to assure the ORTS of an investment program that will enable it to pursue its activities under good conditions for at least 5 years, until the ORTS development program begins operation.

The aid, which was granted with an interest rate of 4.5 percent and a repayment period of 15 years with 2 years' deferment, will round out the subsidies to be put in place by the Aid and Cooperation Fund [FAC] of the French Republic and the Senegalese equipment budget for financing the ORTS emergency plan.

The loan of 10 billion CFA francs will make it possible to put into operation a significant number of development projects of high economic impact for Senegal; these projects concern in particular the following priority sectors: development of the river basins, urban hydraulics, village hydraulics, plant production, animal production, tourism, human promotion, housing and urbanism, information and financial participation in the projects.

For this reason, at the end of the signing ceremony Ousmane Seck hastened to remind those present that last July our country had recourse to exceptional aid from France to face a difficult economic and financial situation which "is a reflection in our country of the worldwide economic crisis, aggravated here by the dramatic consequences of the disastrous series of rainfall shortages and poor harvests."

France in fact responded to Senegal's appeal with a series of loans of various forms totaling 2.5 billion. The first section, 11.5 billion was put in place immediately after the agreement obtained in Paris.

According to Ousmane Seck, the last section of the French exceptional aid will be important on more than one account, since it will contribute to mobilizing important financing. It will directly serve productive projects and will thus be a powerful factor in economic recovery. "Our middle-term plan for economic recovery will find in this credit a first-rate appeal," the minister concluded.

In his reply Mr Charpentier assured the minister that his organization will continue to act in such a way that Senegal can emerge from its situation and can develop. He also said that the CCCE would like to intervene in the productive sectors and aid Senegal in the years to come, so it can face the difficult situation it is currently enduring. Mr Charpentier in conclusion assured the minister that France will everything to help surmount these difficulties.

STATE ASSISTANCE TO RURAL AREAS NOTED

Dakar LE SOLEIL in French 8-9 Nov 80 p 3

[Text] A Food Aid Commission document sums up the 1979-1980 agricultural season and emphasizes the Senegalese Government's efforts to come to the aid of the deprived populations. The program was carried out under good conditions despite the harmful effect of the late-autumn rains on the quality of the preceding harvests.

Last year's winter season was characterized by a good distribution of precipitation. This did not fail to have an influence on the crops. In some regions of Senegal the millet harvests were almost nonexistent, whereas in the southern part of the country rice production was affected by the situation.

Using the data supplied by the regional and central technical services as a basis, the Food Aid Commission, since late November 1979, has evaluated the level of the grain shortage and recommended emergency measures of which the International Community was informed. In that context, an FAO-WFP [World Food Program] evaluation mission that was in Senegal last February confirmed the unfavorable elements that marked the 1979-1980 winter season. Besides the grain shortage (118,000 tons), the mission recognized the poor rainfall distribution, poor hydrology (with a late start for the rising of the Senegal River), as well as the appearance of depredators.

On the basis of this finding, the Food Aid Commission and the evaluation mission outlined practical measures to resorb the shortage.

For its part the government, which has known since September 1979 that the regions of Fleuve, Louga and the northern part of Eastern Senegal were threatened with famine, ordered free distribution of 9,000 tons of souna [translation unknown] millet. The acquisition of this millet and its transportation cost the state 550,000,000 of our francs. With the goal of assisting all the disaster-stricken populations, the government provided for a second millet distribution program whose purchase cost was in the neighborhood of a billion and a half. Toward the same objective, it asked for international emergency aid before the most recent winter season. The EEC responded to that appeal by disbursing nearly 300,000,000 of our francs. Despite all of these efforts, the distribution program experienced difficulties of proper execution, chiefly because of the indispensable standardization of packaging. Begun on 2 May 1980, it could not be completed until last 31 July.

Gradual Disengagement

Faced with the delay in international aid, the government launched a third distribution program of 5,000 tons of souna millet, which necessitated 330,000,000 CFA francs to aid 1,000,000 Senegalese, on the basis of 5 kilograms per person. This was in August.

In all, the government's total financial effort for the deprived populations amounts to 3,254,190,000 CFA francs for purchase and transportation of 42,000 tons of local millet, as well as for its participation in the transporting of donations from abroad.

This state effort is growing, for since the creation in 1974 of the Disaster Aid Commission we have observed the increase in the budgetary envelope reserved for the victims of natural calamities. Moreover, since 1978 we have noted a gradual disengagement of the International Community, for which the state must take up the slack. In fact, donors are more and more interested in operations that tend to improve the food autonomy of the developing countries rather than responding to impromptu solicitations. Along that line, the Senegalese government envisages forming a food stock pile this year, beginning with local grain if possible. Failing that, it will resort to imported sorghum. The FRG, the US and France are participating in setting up the stock pile.

Over the long term it goes without saying that the government's objective is to eliminate foreign aid by means of a gradual food self-sufficiency. This requires a consistent agricultural policy basically founded on the exploitation of hydraulic resources.

REFORM OF PEANUT MARKETING TERMED 'REVOLUTION'

Dakar AFRICA in French Nov 80 pp 31-32

[Article by Joel Decupper: "Abdou Diouf's Revolution"]

[Text] It is a veritable revolution that is taking place in Senegal and yet, very few Senegalese are aware of it. The event barely merited two articles in the national daily, articles in which the importance of the reform in peanut marketing -- their subject -- does not seem to be adequately stressed.

It is true that among the many points they have in common with the French, the Senegalese prefer to show more interest in their debacles than their successes. ONCAD [National Office of Cooperation and Assistance for Development] is a striking example. Its failure attracted everyone's attention, to the extent that LE SOLEIL devoted several pages to it and one minister even tried to show in his columns -- in the very midst of the misfortune -- that the organization was not a failure, or at least not totally.

Consequently, any Senegalese can explain in detail the reasons for ONCAD's failure. No point will be forgotten: neither the poor organization nor the delays in supplies, the opening of bargaining, financing and payment, not the absence of control or the fraud, trafficking or manipulation of which the peasants were the victims.

Just as the French would do, the Senegalese will forget the progress of the rural world since independence, the development of rural housing and its equipment. However, unlike the former colonizers, he will be careful not to spell out responsibilities. While the French would quite naturally point out the man who was the most closely linked to ONCAD for the longest period of time, the Senegalese will be content to blame the government, even the chief of state, as if it were directly in charge of the management of the organization.

Naturally, our man wallows in absolute pessimism. Peanuts are finished. One will have to go to food crops and pray that oil will be discovered.

Era of Realism?

Fortunately for Senegal, the prime minister, the man with the dossiers, has set up a team of experts whose private life, for the first time, has not been set aside. With a realism to which, we must admit, Senegal has not accustomed us, the team has set up a new marketing system that is totally remarkable in its simplicity and efficiency. One thinks of the butter cutter: It had but to be imagined! Whatever the case, for the first time since Senegal has existed -- or rather, since peanuts have been grown there -- peanuts are enjoying efficiency. What is even better, for the first time, with the system established, the farmers will no longer be robbed. On the contrary, they will receive a fair price for their work. Let the people be the judge!

Henceforth, it is the oilworks that will buy the nuts directly from the cooperatives. There are some 1,700 of the latter, organized in four zones, each attached to an oilworks. Those in Cape-Verde and the Thies and Louga regions will come under Lesieur; those in Diourbel under SEIB [expansion unknown]; those in Sine-Saloum and Eastern Senegal under SODEC [expansion unknown]; and those in Casamance under SEIC [expansion unknown]. As one can see, the distribution is convenient and it is geographically rational.

Each oilworks will take in the cooperatives in its geographical area. All the data from the cooperatives will be handled by computers, whether it be a question of their characteristics, activities, results and development or their production and quality. In this way, the oilworks will be able to closely follow the collection of peanuts and their marketing.

As the commercial firms once did, on the basis of information gathered at production places by officials from the oilworks, at the beginning of December, before the beginning of trading, a cash advance equal to 20 percent of the estimated amount of production will be paid to each cooperative to enable it to buy the peanuts from the farmers for cash. Payment will be 49 francs on the basis of a price of 50 francs per kilogram set for the next trading, the remaining franc being retained by the oilworks as an antifraud measure. The indebted cooperatives will be paid 46 francs per kilogram, with 3 francs being paid to the BNDS [Senegal National Development Bank] to pay off the debt, which was the object of a 5-year moratorium.

Farmers Pay Regularly

At the level of each oilworks, a Peanut Directorate will be set up with a corps of inspectors with 1 inspector for 10 to 20 cooperatives, depending on their geographical situation. Every cooperative will be visited at least once a week by these inspectors, who will inform their directorate of the purchase situation and the evaluation of grain, with this information then fed into the computer. Based on this data, the oilworks will be able to inject money before the preceding financing is used up. Financing will be weekly so that the cooperatives will always be able to pay the farmers cash for their peanuts. It should be emphasized that this process will eliminate the hated IOU's previously given to the farmers, the schemes used against them and the many protests. In addition to a simplification of accounting, there will result a net reduction in the drain of peanuts to Gambia.

The oilworks will take over the former grouping units, which will be managed by their own employees. The peanuts will either be shipped directly to the plants, the grouping units or private shellers, who will do piecework for the oilworks. These different shipments will be computer planned by the oilworks and made known to the cooperatives for their information.

It should be noted that the shipment of peanuts from the cooperatives will be left up to the latter. Oilworks will provide such transport only if asked but nevertheless, will pay for shipping according to the scale set by authorities. Shipping information will be fed into the computer and every week, the oilworks will know the exact situation of shipments and the amount owing to every hauler, who will be paid within 8 days maximum.

Consequently, haulers will no longer be imposed on the cooperatives even if the latter have their own means of transport or should desire to use those in their region, as was previously the case. Furthermore, haulers will no longer have to wait to be paid, as was once so often true that some have not yet received what is due them from the last trading!

Farmers Responsible

With regard to control of impurities, ONCAD performed the task at the level of the driers and plants. Beyond a certain level of impurities, the producers were penalized. The deductions made resulted in many protests. A new system is being worked out that should make it possible to protect the interests of both producers and industries and above all, give credit to cooperatives whose impurity rates are low so as to improve the quality of their production.

An important innovation is that cooperatives as such will henceforth be paid 1,000 francs per ton of peanuts delivered. Payment will be made every month. By way of example, a cooperative that produces 1,000 tons of peanuts will receive 1 million francs. In this way, the cooperatives will have the means to finance their own operations and to pay their representatives (counter weighers) at the peanut receiving centers: driers, shelling units and plants.

In additions, inasmuch as ONCAD's tasks are divided among SONAR [expansion unknown], the cooperatives and oilworks, the remuneration received by that organization will be divided among the three structures also. The cooperatives will therefore receive their share of the remuneration. This will enable them to pay the weighers, who will be their own employees. Weighers from outside the cooperatives had been forced on them by ONCAD, which had difficulty controlling them, as shown by shocking scandals. Henceforth, they will come directly under the board of directors of the cooperative, which will easily be able to watch over them. Likewise, the cooperatives will pay the chairmen of their boards. They will then be more able to watch their action.

True Socialization

Finally, the final innovation is that the bonus for oil content which the oilworks paid ONCAD, due to the fact that the oil content of Senegalese peanuts is higher than that used in the setting of international prices, will henceforth go to the cooperatives. This bonus, whose amount may go as high as 1 billion CFA francs, depending on the crop, should enable them to purchase part of the capital of the oilworks. There will result a real socialization of the main national industrial tool because the rural world will be involved in production and the processing of the product of their work as well.

It is likely that this reform, whose main lines we have stressed, will be adapted as it is applied. The fact that it is effective will naturally lead to this. To the inevitable detractors who accuse us of excessive optimism, we would reply that we do not doubt its success because the oilworks will not have difficulty assuming their new responsibilities thanks to the organizational qualities characteristic of the private sector which they have always demonstrated. They will succeed all the more easily because they will be assured of the active participation of the farmers through their cooperatives because they will finally be directly responsible for the management of their production and assured of receiving all the fruits of their labor.

No More Farmers Robbed

In fact, undoubtedly for the first time since peanuts became Senegal's main source of wealth, the farmers will no longer be robbed. Those who took advantage of them did it in their own behalf: the traders before independence and the employees of ONCAD later, for lack of controls. No employee of the oilworks will try to rob the peasants on behalf of his employer and one can be confident that thanks to the methods of inspection used in private enterprises, the oilworks will reduce misappropriations to occasional incidents rapidly eliminated

It is obvious that the success of this veritable revolution would become problematical if the nationalization of the oilworks were to bring about a questioning of the "private" nature of their management. Making them official enterprises would rapidly lead to a "blown up ONCAD" that would yield even more disastrous results.

Excluding this unpleasant possibility, the fact remains that the effects of this revolution will not be fully felt during the coming harvest but only with the one beginning at the end of 1981. At a time when international difficulties -- inflation, higher oil prices, deterioration of the terms of trade -- and domestic problems -- climatic contingencies, limitations of the recovery plan -- incline one to despair, the hope stimulated by the reform of marketing of the main national product should be precious encouragement. Consequently, it is to be regretted that the prime minister, because he is the artisan of this revolution and undoubtedly out of modesty or perhaps to guard against propaganda, has not seen fit to better inform his fellow countrymen about it.

MALAN ATTACKS CRITICS OF PRIME MINISTER

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 13 Dec 80 p 5

[Article by Johan Kloppers]

[Text]

OUDTSHOORN. -- The Minister of Defence, General Magnus Malan yesterday lashed out at the enemies of the Prime Minister, saying they had the chance to strengthen and develop the country but did not avail themselves of the opportunity.

Addressing a passing-out parade at Oudtshoorn, General Malan said what was happening in the political arena was in direct conflict with the guidelines the government was attempting to establish for peaceful continued existence.

Attempts to denigrate Mr P W Botha and place him under suspicion were not in the country's interests and would "plunge us all into a suicidal situation", General Malan said.

Speaking at a passing-out parade at the Infantry School, General Malan said the country's enemies were using every possible means to achieve their objective, reports Sapa.

They were trying to destroy South Africa's economy and internal politics by arousing suspicion and uncertainty and promoting division, by acts of sabotage and by stirring up unrest.

"It is, without a doubt, a revoluntionary conflict planned and fomented by communists. Their pawns, our immediate enemy in this conflict, are manipulated by international communism."

General Malan said it was imperative to form a solid base within the country to oppose the escalating onslaught against South Africa.

A strong government was of cardinal importance — a government in which the nation believed and could trust as a binding factor going beyond language, cultural and even colour boundaries.

Referring to people who had missed the opportunity to "strengthen the country", General Malan said: "These same people did not avail themselves of their opportunities in the past, but they nevertheless now see their way clear, at one very time when we can least afford it, to sow political dissension among our own ranks by trying to denigrate our leader, the Prime Minister himself, and by trying to place him under suspicion.

"I wish to make it very plain to you today that these attempts will in no way be in the interests of the country but will, on the contrary, plunge us all into a suicidal situation."

General Malan said that as a member of the Cabinet who, by virtue of his appointment, had an understanding of the struggle facing South Africa, "I cannot allow this reprehensible behaviour to go unnoticed".

He deemed it necessary, he added, to confirm again "my unconditional loyalty to the Prime Minister for his purposefulness and leadership".

General Malan paid tribute to the nearly 2 000 junior leaders who were passing out yesterday and said the Infantry School had established exceptional achievements during the past year.

These included the highest evaluation results achieved by a unit during counter-insurgency evaluation in the operational area (85 percent) and an exceptionally high score for musketry (204/250).

A statue depicting an infantryman in action was unveiled. The statue is the work of Corporal Mark Stephens, a national serviceman from Pretoria who has won the Oudtshoorn municipal bursary to study art at a technikon or university. The statue was donated by Oudtshoorn to the infantry school.

VORSTER EXPRESSES SUPPORT FOR BOTHA INITIATIVES

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 11 Dec 80 p 5

[Text]

STELLENBOSCH. — The former State President, Mr B J Vorster, said yesterday he endorsed initiatives by the Prime Minister, Mr P W Botha, to secure co-operation among the population groups of southern Africa.

At the same time Mr Vorster warned that success should not be expected to be achieved overnight. "The tempo of Africa is slow."

Mr Vorster, who is also Chancellor of Stellenbosch University, was addressing 1 000 people on the final day of the university's graduation ceremony.

He said that in 1973 he had already spelt out the concept of a constellation of states in southern Africa which would be politically independent but would co-operate closely in the economic sphere.

Attention

Mr Vorster said that 1981 would be the year of southern Africa.

"International attention is focused on southern Africa as never before."

He associated himself with a call by the university's rector, Professor Mike de Vries, that people should concentrate even more on studying.

South Africa needed not only more people but also more knowledge. The country would play its part in 1981.

"It has taken several years to convince the world that the Whites in South Africa are not colonialists but have a right to be in Africa."

The right of White South Africa was being accepted by the outside world and also by many Black African leaders although they would not always readily acknowledge it.

White rights

Mr Vorster said the rights of Whites in Africa should not be regarded as being conditional, that they were in Africa on parole and that they would only be tolerated for good behaviour.

"I associate myself with calls by the Prime Minister with regard to co-operation in southern Africa."

Quoting from a speech he made in 1975 when he was still Prime Minister, Mr Vorster said that South Africa had a task to create not only good relations among its people, but a pattern was developing which would serve as an example for Africa and the rest of the world.

A constellation of states would develop which would not prescribe to each other politically but would work closely together economically to the advantage of the larger southern Africa as a whole.

Results

"We will do right and well to support these initiatives with everything at our disposal," he said. "But we should not expect results tomorrow or the day after."

Mr Vorster said international recognition of South Africa's Black National States would eventually be achieved.

"I believe there will first be de facto change and then de jure change."

But Black African leaders should understand that their demands for a one-man-one-vote government in South Africa would be rejected. They would also have to get rid of the hate and distrust which sometimes came through strongly.

It would be in the interests of Africa and economic realities would demand that Africa co-operated in such a constellation of states.

Reality

They had nothing to fear that South Africa would dominate them in such a framework of co-operation.

"I believe the day will come that a constellation of states will become a reality."

Mr Vorster expressed the hope that 1981 would set Africa free of its fears and prejudices. — Sapa.

FRENCH REPORTS SAY PAC ATTACKED SASOL PLANT

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 12 Dec 80 p 9

[Article by Tim Clarke]

[Text] DURBAN. — Leading French newspapers carried reports this week claiming that the Pan-African Congress and not the African National Congress was responsible for the attack on the Sasol plant earlier this year.

Two of the newspapers quoted French intelligence sources and said the PAC was now directing it's anti-South African operations from Libya, fully backed by Collonel Gadaffi the ruler of the African country.

One newspaper said the PAC had established at least three bases in Libya in the last four years which have the support of the Gadaffi regime. The paper quoted French intelligence sources as saying that the successful attack Sasol had been engineered at one of the PAC camps in Libya.

Another report in one of the French dailies said that Col Gadaffi, a devout Moslem, had refused to support the ANC because of it's Soviet connections. The report said that Col Gadaffi had flatly refused to allow the ANC to set up bases in Libya, but fully supported the PAC, which has played second fiddle in international support in the onslaught against South Africa.

A third report in a French newspaper said that the PAC delegation had been assured of the support of the Libyan government, Col Gadaffi and PAC leaders. It quoted as it's source French intelligence and French diplomats in Africa.

Until these revelations, the ANC has claimed responsibility for the attack on Sasol.

The chief of the Security Branch of South Africa, Brigadier Johan Coetzee, was not available for comment yesterday and other senior officers said they did not want to comment on newspaper reports.

GOVERNMENT TO DEVELOP SOUTH SOTHO AREA

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 9 Dec 80 p 10

[Text] PLANS for the development of the Bloemfontein, Onverwacht, Vaalkraal area of the Free State were outlined in a statement yesterday by the Minister of Internal Affairs, Mr Chris Heunis, issued by the Office of the Prime Minister.

The Cabinet had decided it was necessary to bring about a balanced relationship between centres of employment and residential areas to ensure co-ordinated development and meet the growing demand for employment opportunities, the statement said.

The Onverwacht-Vaalkraal areas, where more than 50 000 South Sotho's already live, could not be considered solely from an urbanisation point of view. It also had to be seen in the light of national development.

The sub-region should evolve to provide a balanced urban environment for the South Sotho's in the Onverwacht-Vaalkraal area as well as for the Tswana people in the vicinity of Thabanchu.

To promote development in the Onverwacht-Vaalkraal area, further residential development for Blacks at Bloemfontein would have to be restricted as far as possible.

However, the permanent residential rights of Blacks qualifying under certain sections of the Blacks (Urban Areas) Consolidation Act would be respected.

"Obviously," the statement said, "the standard of the Black urban area of Bloemfontein should be improved in order to enhance the quality of life for the inhabitants."

The Government was determined to alleviate unemployment in the sub-region and acknowledged the important role Bloemfontein, with its developed infrastructure, had to play.

The principle of clustered economic development was accepted as being the best possible solution to create meaningful employment opportunities in the area. — Sapa.

ARMY TAKEOVER IN UPPER VOLTA DISCUSSED

London WEST AFRICA in English 1 Dec 80 p 2405

[Text]

TALK in Ouagadougou recently had centred more on when a possible coup would take place and who would be responsible rather than on whether such an event might occur. Now President Lamizana is the victim of exasperation in military quarters at the turn political events have taken in the last few months. Circumstances are reminiscent of all the previous crises in Upper Volta which have prompted military intervention or the reassertion of military authority ever since President Lamizana, then Chief of Staff of the Voltaic Army, threw out Maurice Yameogo in a coup in January, 1966.

On November 25 President Lamizana was removed from office, and is now under house arrest, along with the rest of the government, following a bloodless military coup led by the commander of the regiment based in Ouagadougou, Colonel Saye Zerbo.

The new 48-year-old leader announced that the constitution had been suspended, the National Assembly dissolved and that the country was now under the control of a military committee of national recovery. The committee will remain in power until a Government of National Recovery is formed. Ouagadougou Airport was closed and telephone links abroad were temporarily suspended. Information is, therefore, patchy. It is confirmed, according to one agency report, that the present chief of staff, General Jean Zagre, the former chief of staff, General Baba Sy, and the president of the National Assembly, M. Gerard Kango Ouedraogo, are under house arrest. Members of the government are being held at a military camp near the capital.

There are no indications of other members of the assembly being apprehended.

Colonel Saye Zerbo is a former parachutist in the French colonial army, which he left in 1961 with the rank of sub-lieutenant after participating in the campaigns in Indochina and Algeria. He then took a special military training course in France. In 1973 he became the first officer from Upper Volta to graduate from the Ecole Superieure de Guerre. In 1974 he was made foreign minister in the military government and resigned in 1976. Colonel Zerbo comes from the same region as the ousted President Lamizana and is a Samo. He received some of his higher education at the Institute for Economic and Social Development in Abidjan.

That a coup was on the cards in Upper Volta has been reflected in reports published in these columns in the last few weeks. Since the beginning of the year the government, under M. Joseph Conombo, the prime minister, has been under severe pressure from trade unions to increase salaries and to meet other demands. The fuse which led to the latest military action in Upper Volta was ignited at the beginning of the school year when primary school teachers went on strike claiming that two of their members had been victimised for participating in union activities earlier in the year. There were also allegations that favouritism had taken place in the selection of teachers winning scholarships to study in France. Within weeks the other main teachers' unions — SUVESS, the secondary schools union and SYNEPEL-HV repres-ering private schools — joined in a solidarity strike with the Syndicat Nationale des Enseignants Africains d'Haute Volta. On November 4 and 5 there was a two-day general strike organised by the four main trade unions.

On November 13 police broke up a march by the trade unions organised to support the teachers' unions which had been banned the day before by the President. He alleged then that agent provocateurs were involved in inciting the demonstrators. Other allegations suggested that the government had stooped to bribery and even violence to win over opponents. (West Africa, November 17.)

There was much more to the coup, however. The fact that Upper Volta is not yet economically viable — in fact it is further away than ever before from even a respectable modicum of self-sufficiency — is not so much the cause of the framework within which popular reaction to political and economic decisions take place. Austerity budgets augmented by liberal doses of foreign financial assistance are responded to by the unions with demands for increases in salary to meet the requirements of a rising cost of living. In the last 18 months inflation has been particularly severe in Upper Volta because of the general trend of the world economy.

Perhaps the most serious criticism levelled against the previous government is that it gave no impression of being anywhere near settling the problems that the country faced. Instead it became apparent that money was being used to buy out opposition members and that the government was prepared to sanction violence, in a very limited form, against demonstrators. President Lamizana, who has commanded the respect of much of the armed forces, became closely associated with the Union Democratique Voltaique, the party in power. He entered the presidential elections in 1978, which he won against an opponent, Macaire Ouedraogo, the candidate for the Union Nationale pour la Defence de la Democratie. He did not resign his army post, and the country's one daily, OBSERVATEUR, noted then in its headline that Lamizana had descended into the arena. That act alone precluded any further claim to being an independent arbiter in Voltaic politics.

But while the army has just acted against a government which had become unpopular and which was unable to achieve much, it would be wrong to presume that this is an indication of complete intolerance of civilian politicians — who in the eyes of the Voltaic military and most independent observers have a remarkable capacity for involvement with their own labyrinthine politics to the exclusion of even the day-to-day affairs of state.

On November 11, the government warded off a vote of censure, tabled by the combined opposition of the UNDD and the Front Progressiste Voltaique — the Professor Ki-Zerbo/Joseph Ouedraogo tandem — by 33 votes to 24. The government was accused of no longer respecting the constitution, of mismanagement of public finances and of being the cause of the current degradation of the political economic and social climate in Upper Volta. The government replied during the debate — echoing the President's insinuations — that the opposition was responsible for formenting much of the social disorder. The constitution prevented the opposition from tabling another motion of censure for another year.

Just as the military coup of President Lamizana's in 1966 saw the entry of a number of civilians — either radicals or ardent opponents of Yameogo's — in the wake of the coup, it is just as likely that a similar tendency will become evident this time. In 1966 some of the leading politicians were consulted before the coup and it is equally possible that this time some were consulted or advised discreetly. The opposition in Upper Volta has become increasingly vigorous in the language of denunciation of the government. While the trade unions could have continued striking and possibly provoking an unpleasant response from the authorities, the failure of the vote of censure was the last constitutional step the parliamentary opposition could have taken.

Colonel Saye Zerbo has already indicated that he wishes to form a government of national unity, or recovery, in his parlance. Such a government will include civilians, some drawn from the more prominent opponents of the former government. Colonel Zerbo has already trodden softly with regard to the trade unions. The latter, aware of their power, will remain wary while the new leadership of the country becomes clearer.

GOVERNMENT ACHIEVES REFUGEE AID GOALS

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 11 Dec 80 p 11

[Text] The Government's target of $110 million in aid from the international community for the resettlement of refugees and the reconstruction of primary schools and water projects has been fully accomplished, according to the United Nations High Commissioner's director of external affairs, Mr Ole Volfing.

But while estimates of the country's immediate post war cash requirements had been "amazingly" correct, Government estimates of Zimbabwe's food requirements--currently valued at between $40 and $50 million--were "well above" original estimates.

Consequently, priorities may be shifted from the cash component to the food component, Mr Volfing said. The first phase of Zimbabwe's resettlement programme--due for completion at the end of March--would coincide with two other events. These would be Zimbabwe's first annual harvest and a pledging conference planned by the Government.

Donors were being invited by the Government to attend the conference during the last week of March when contributions would be sought for the country's medium and long-term programmes benefiting not only refugees and displaced persons, but also the country at large.

Mr Volfing emphasised that those carrying arms had not been counted among Zimbabwe's largely resettled refugees--"although their wives and children might have benefited."

Turning to the international scene, he noted that the world's largest single refugee situation in terms of numbers were the 1.3 million Afghans presently in Pakistan. The second largest refugee community was 900,000 Ethiopians in Somali.

As had been the case with Zimbabwe, the Ethiopian statistics were compounded by "the African tradition of hospitality" which led to unregistered refugees living with friends and relatives in cross-border villages.

Mr Volfing stressed that UNHCR was not a relief agency as such. Relief was merely an "unavoidable necessity" in immediate situations whereas UNHCR was searching for more permanent solutions to the world's refugee problems.

Asking to comment on the recent influx of Cuban dissidents into the United States, Mr Volfing confirmed that UNHCR did not regard them as refugees and the United States had not requested any assistance from UNHCR.

He added that many of the self-styled Cuban refugees were in fact "economic migrants" who were unwilling to adapt to Cuba's socialist system.

Mr Volfing, who had been on a short visit to Zimbabwe during which he had met Ministers and officials from a number of Ministries and Government departments, returned to UNHCR's headquarters in Geneva last night.

He has been UNHCR's director of external affairs since 1967. Before that he had been active with the Danish Refugee Council. He is a Danish citizen.

OUTGOING MAYOR OF GWELO DEPLORES POLITICS

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 9 Dec 80 p 11

[Text]

Midlands Representative

GWELO.

EXPRESSING his unhappiness at the introduction into local government of party politics, Councillor Roy Futter, the outgoing Mayor of Gwelo, said in his valedictory last night that he hoped party politics would not dominate the deliberations of the council.

"I trust that the council will act in the best interests of the city of Gwelo and is inhabitants, even if this means that on occasions it is necessary to oppose the Government on a particular issue," he said.

"We are all councillors working as a team in the best interests of the city and all its people. There is no question of the council being divided into the 'party' and the 'opposition'."

Mr Futter said the new council (which comprises 10 black and six whites) had inherited a financially sound and well-run organisation.

Perhaps there was room for changes in view of political aspirations, and perhaps there was argument that the council which was truly representative of the people should be seen to be making changes.

He warned the new council not to be impetuous. Local government was a complex subject and it took time to understand and appreciate these complexities.

"The finances of a local authority are limited, and it is essential for expenditure to be financed by income," he said.

Mr Futter referred to the recent fire brigade strike in Gwelo when the council was faced with "unpleasant attitudes and most unreasonable demands" Eventually, the council got the backing of the Ministers of Labour and of Local Government in settling the dispute.

The same situation could repeat itself and though he urged the council to deal fairly with its employees, strike action should not be tolerated. It would be necessary for the council to establish clearly that the municipality must be run by the council as the employer.

Councillor Patrick Kombayi was installed as Gwelo's new Mayor and Councillor Mabasa Chipandambira was installed as the Deputy Mayor.

POLITICAL ACTIVISTS ACCUSED OF DISCREDITING CHURCH

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 9 Dec 80 p 3

[Text]

POLITICAL activists are doing their best to discredit the Christian Church, it was claimed here yesterday.

Canon R. Ewbank, of the Anglican Church, said although the Government was neutral on the role of the Church in Zimbabwe's future, political activists on a lower level were doing their best to undermine it.

Political meetings were being held on Sunday mornings so that people on their way to church would be distracted.

Young Africans in the churches were accusing Christianity of being a foreigner's religion and asking why Jesus Christ is portrayed as a white man and why the devil was black.

"These types of questions have always been posed and asked of the Church throughout the ages. At this moment I believe they are being asked by political activists who are trying to discredit and undermine the Church," he said.

COMMENTARY OF TEKERE ACQUITTAL PUBLISHED

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 9 Dec 80 p 10

[Editorial: "Rule of Law"]

[Text]

THE sensational trial of Mr Edgar Tekere and his bodyguards ended with an equally sensational verdict.

The men were acquitted and that was the finding of the court. The rule of law took its course and it must be accepted.

The unusual aspect of the verdict lay in the difference of opinion between the judge on the one hand and the assessors on the other.

There were a number of counts to be dealt with. But in the main one—that of murder—the court found that Mr Tekere and one of his bodyguards had committed the crime but were entitled to be acquitted because they were acting in good faith for the purposes of suppressing terrorism.

The judge disagreed with this view and had his opinion prevailed they would have been found guilty of murder.

But the law provides that the majority opinion must hold and the two assessors agreed with the defence plea that the accused were acting in good faith.

The verdict will provoke strong feelings among individuals and sections of the community. It has already drawn from Mr Tekere himself remarks which were extremely critical of the judge. This is most regrettable.

We believe people should await the full judgment before making their own assessments which of course they are quite entitled to. But criticism must be tempered with restraint if we are not to dilute the strength we have in the belief in the rule of law.

HUMAN RIGHTS RECORD PRAISED

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 11 Dec 80 p 10

[Editorial: "Human Rights"]

[Text] ZIMBABWE is one of the few countries in Africa to earn a favourable mention from Amnesty International for its improved record on human rights.

The people of this country are, of course, well aware of the progress that has been made in this direction by the Government.

But the Amnesty report should serve as a reminder to the outside world that much has been achieved, and is being achieved, to remove the bitter legacies of the war.

No one will pretend that the situation here is perfect. But we have come a long way in a short time. The important thing now is to consolidate and develop the freedoms we now have.

It may be that there are few, if any, countries which can boast of unblemished records on human rights.

Indeed, much of the Amnesty report relating to other African countries makes grim and depressing reading, with widespread executions, killings, ill-treatment of detainees and other forms of brutality.

But that should not give rise to any complacency here. Rather it should serve to emphasise the need for increased vigilance and responsibility to protect the progress we have made.

In this respect Amnesty International must be looked on as a valuable international ally. Its attentions at times may be embarrassing and unwelcome, even in relatively advanced and developed countries. But none can doubt its objectivity.

Long may it continue to prick the conscience of the world.

CRIMINALS WARNED AS NATION JOINS INTERPOL

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 10 Dec 80 p 13

[Text]

AS a member of Interpol, the international police organisation, Zimbabwe would be able to deal more effectively against international criminals in the country, the Deputy Minister of Home Affairs, Senator Tarisai Ziyambi, said yesterday.

Senator Ziyambi was speaking at a Press conference on his return from the 49th general assembly of Interpol at which Zimbabwe became a member.

He said three other African countries, Djibouti, Botswana and Equatorial Guinea, were also made members.

Descriptions of international criminals who have been known to operate in newly independent countries would be passed to Zimbabwe through Interpol, said the Deputy Minister.

"If they come here, they will find that we have a reception party waiting at the airport," he said.

Senator Ziyambi said the drug threat was another topic discussed at the assembly.

"Zimbabwe is far better off than most countries in this," he said.

"We have hardly seen the increase of drugs as a problem."

While drugs were a menace in themselves, he said, they also led to secondary crime by addicts seeking money for their habits.

Crimes of violence were increasing all over the world and Zimbabwe had been invited to form part of a special committee to discuss and analyse this phenomenon.

After leaving the 140 nation "crime forum" which was held in Manila in the Philippines, Senator Ziyambi went on to Britain and America.

His mission there, he said, was to study police training techniques, as it was vital that re-orientation courses in the Zimbabwe Republic Police be carried out as "a matter of some urgency".

The police must change, he said, as they were trained to "meet the needs of a war situation, and some retraining was needed to adjust to the present peace situation".

ADVANCEMENT

Turning to the subject of black advancement in the force he said: "There must be African advancement — real undiluted advancement."

If necessary, senior black officers could be trained outside the country, he said.

He added that there were some "very fine" black policemen in Zimbabwe, who must be put into positions of authority.

Asked about a number of Patriotic Front officials who have been detained in Matabeleland recently, Senator Ziyambi said it was "purely a security matter", and was therefore outside his Ministry.

"But let it be clearly understood that we are passing through a difficult period," he said, and warned that troublemakers could not expect sympathy.

ROLE OF AFRICAN TPADITIONAL MEDICINE IN MODERN ERA DESCRIBED

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 11 Dec 80 p 17

[Article by Willie Zingani and Barry Kumanda of the African Press Service]

[Text]

HE was a French national who had come to Malawi as a missionary at the beginning of the century. Over the years he had come to be revered by the people of Mtakataka Roman Catholic Mission in Dedza district.

Whenever someone complained to him about a headache, malaria or even infertility, the old missionary would take a small hoe, get on his bicycle and ride off into the bush in search of special roots, leaves and barks.

No one knew how the old man came to possess the secrets of African traditional medicine. But there he was, year after year, healing the local people with the methods of what critics derisively call "witch-doctors" but which are better known in Africa today as traditional doctors or healers.

Now 20 years after his death, a university educator in Malawi is campaigning for a new relationship between Western-trained and traditionally-trained doctors.

SHARING

Dr Bruce Hargreaves of Chancellor College advocates that the two groups share their knowledge to improve the quality of medical care.

The World Health Organisation has held two high-level seminars in Africa this year to promote co-ordination of traditional and Western medicine.

In Accra in August, health ministers gathered from nine African countries to work out a system to enable traditional practitioners to have access to official health services and to introduce traditional medicaments into common medical practice.

Late October, in Nairobi, a similar WHO session called for research and training institutes in traditional medicines, codes of conduct for traditional healers and the incorporation of proven traditional healing practices into medical school curriculum.

"I want people to understand my point of view," says a young Malawian herbalist. "I am not saying people shouldn't go to hospitals for treatment."

The problem, he outlines, is to educate those who look down upon African traditional medicine simply because they have gone to school and been told that it is nonsense, superstition or against science and Christianity.

"African traditional doctors should work hand-in-hand with (Western-trained) medical people," says traditional doctor Jonathan Malaya, "and help one another identify the right medicine for the people."

Dr Hargreaves, head of the Chancellor College Herbarium, is keen to learn practical medical skills from the local people. He regularly examines leaves, barks, and tubers used by traditional "medicine men" to cure epilepsy, diarrhoea, headaches, high blood pressure, and birth complications.

He readily admits that many hospital medicines come from herbs and other natural sources originally discovered by traditional healers. With this in mind, he is researching and writing a reference book on medicinal herbs to assist herbalists in their work and to aid in the discovery of new medicines.

In West Africa, Ghanaian herbalist Peter Osei discovered a locally grown root which has been found to be effective in treating diabetes. After years of exhaustive research, the University of Science and Technology in Central Ghana said in a recent report that "the blood sugar-lowering effect of the root has been proved beyond doubt."

ROOTS

Using traditional methods of research and healing, Osei has also discovered and used locally-grown roots and tubers for the cure of piles, asthma and infertility.

Numerous health workers around the world, like Dr Hargreaves, are coming to realise that they cannot discount the thousands of years of experimentation by traditional doctors in curing illnesses. These discoveries, particularly because of the pre-literate cultures in which they have occurred, are not readily understood in Western terms.

Dr Malaya points out that there are numerous cases where people have been successfully cured by traditional doctors after modern medical treatment has failed.

"But if a sick person first goes for traditional herbs and roots and they fail, then goes to the hospital, they say he wasted his time and should have gone straight to the hospital," he said.

"My son had very bad bronchitis from when he was a baby," related a European nurse, resident in Kenya for more than 10 years. "It got so bad at times that he could barely breathe and he'd often stutter while talking from shortness of breath."

To relieve his congestion the child would be placed in depressurised chambers or flown in planes at high altitudes. But relief was always temporary.

"We even took him to Europe and doctors there recommended we leave him near the North Sea where the climate was better but we could not accept that."

So she turned to a traditional doctor, a woman more than 100 years old, whom she had grown to know and trust over the years. "I told her she must promise not to cut him, because you know often they will cut and mix the blood for healing but there is often infection and death as a result."

The old woman took the boy into the bush for two days. When they returned, said the nurse, "he was not only cured but that boy has not coughed a day in his life since".

The general agreement and approach among African traditional doctors in the use of their drugs is striking, says Dr Hargreaves, which suggests a continental dissemination of medical knowledge long ago. However, he cautions that real dangers remain in the use of traditional medicine because of the lack of controlled dosages.

LIMITED

Dr Malaya readily admits that there are other limitations to his art. Regarding surgery, he candidly asks, "who among us (traditional doctors) can cheat the world that he can operate on a person? We just don't have the know-how.

"Whenever I treat a person and see him coming back again and again with the same complaint, I advise him to go for a check-up at the hospital."

Yet the most controversial area of traditional healing concerns psychological, emotional and spiritual healing — the areas — ironically, where Western medicine is considered to be the least effective. One African psychiatrist cited the case of a woman who suffered from occipital headaches, heart palpitations and severe anxiety.

Through her training as a teacher she had been exposed to Western ideas, so she sought a doctor for treatment. Despite repeated attempts, they were unable to establish the rapport and trust required for successful treatment. She eventually consulted a traditional healer who cured her successfully using dancing and singing therapy.

Traditional therapy is based on the view that where human forces cause an illness, counter-human forces must be applied to treat it.

Furthermore, it embraces a special approach to the relationship between well-being and the power of the mind . . . Some call it "magic", others, the power of suggestion.

Along Jonathan Malaya's counter are roots inscribed with the words Mwami (Luck), Chisomo (Grace) and Konda Ine (Love Me). They are to be placed in one's pocket, home or office and the belief is that the possessor will be blessed with the qualities of the roots. But do they work?

"Oh yes! They work!" The doctor is quick to point out. "Many people have come back to explain the effects. But we must help these roots bring good results.

"If a woman buys Konda Ine to restore love in her family after a conflict, she mustn't think that the root will work on its own. Konda Ine will only work if the woman shows a spirit of love and reconciliation.

"You know, in everything, the most important is faith," said the young African doctor surveying his medicines. "Believe in a thing strongly . . . and it will work."

CALL FOR SINGLE COMMERCIAL BODY CHEERED

Chambers Praise Mvenge

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 9 Dec 80 p 5

[Text]

Herald Reporter

THE interim committee of three black business organisations which are trying to merge, yesterday came out in full support of a call by Deputy Minister of Commerce and Industry, Mr Moses Mvenge, for the formation of a single commercial association in Zimbabwe.

The Minister spoke to businessmen at a meeting in Fort Victoria on Sunday about the need for having one association representing all Zimbabwean businessmen.

The existence of such a body would make it easier for the Ministry to help businessmen in their efforts to develop the economy.

At present this was not possible as the Ministry did not know which association was truly representative of businessmen in the country, he said.

Dr Isaac Samuriwo, a leading Salisbury businessman, said yesterday Mr Mvenge's call was "a great encouragement" to the African Traders' Association, the Zimbabwe Chamber of Commerce and the Zimbabwe Businessmen's Association, which are trying to amalgamate.

Dr Samuriwo is chairman of a 15-member interim committee set up last month by the three organisations to work on a draft constitution for the merger.

"We appreciate very much what the Minister says because we are all eager to have one association," he said. "We feel encouraged by his words."

Dr Samuriwo said it was important that ECC, ZIBA and ATC should merge and his committee was working towards this.

A suggestion has been made that any single black business association set up should move on and discuss a merger with the Associated Chambers of Commerce of Zimbabwe.

Lack of Organization Hit

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 9 Dec 80 p 10

[Editorial: "Get Together"]

[Text]

THE Deputy Minister of Commerce and Industry, Mr Mvenge, showed some irritation and impatience when he urged businessmen at the weekend to get together and form one body to represent them all.

He said the Ministry does not recognise any of the several organisations that claim to speak for all, and that until the position is sorted out, individual businessmen will suffer.

In recent months a lot of talking has been going on between various business organisations, and as late as November 25 it was reported that work has begun on a draft constitution to unite three of them. It is to be hoped that these are the only three that matter.

It would be in their interests to keep the Ministry closely informed about whatever progress they make.

After that, there must still be talks aimed at uniting the combined body with the Associated Chambers of Commerce. And once the final, all-enveloping organisation is formed, it might find it expedient to have a section dealing with small and rural businesses which have their own special problems.

There is considerable sympathy for those who are finding the going hard. Funds are being raised and training courses planned. This help should grow with Ministry recognition.

It is therefore up to everyone concerned to get cracking and get organised without further delay.

TEENAGE EMPLOYMENT PROSPECTS BLEAK

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 14 Dec 80 p 6

[Text] THOUSANDS of Zimbabwean teenagers leaving schools and colleges are finding job prospects bleak. Every day they are told by employment agencies: "Sorry, we don't have vacancies at the moment . . . try later."

A Ministry of Education spokesman estimated that about 30 000 Grade 7 and secondary school pupils left school for good last week.

The pressure for jobs had been increased by the end of national service, which had previously absorbed large numbers of school-leavers, he said.

A Salisbury employment agency reported some success finding vacancies by telephoning firms direct and asking them to consider taking on school-leavers.

The agency had no problems finding jobs for young girls with typing, shorthand or bookkeeping experience, but had had little success finding employment for some girls with good university degrees.

Girls with no qualifications stood little or no chance of finding well-paid work and job opportunities for male school-leavers were no better.

"There are plenty of openings for tradesmen, but all we can offer school-leavers are jobs as junior clerks in banks and building societies," one Salisbury agent said last week.

"A young African with a degree in economic and business studies came in last week and I couldn't find him a job," she said.

SECRETARIAL

One young girl with a sociology degree was now taking a secretarial course because she had been unable to find a job without a knowledge of shorthand and typing.

"Ideally girls leaving school should consider doing a secretarial or bookkeeping course before job-hunting," the agent said.

Young men will find it even more difficult to become a tradesman as few vacancies for apprentices exist.

The Registrar of Apprenticeship, Mr J. Walker, said last week: "We don't know of any vacancies for apprentices at the moment. We are in constant touch with industry and most vacancies have already been filled."

Another employment agency said: "Many firms want mature and experienced people to fill vacancies and just aren't interested in employing school-leavers."

VERBAL BATTLE OVER UNIONS REPORTED

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 9 Dec 80 p 2

[Text]

Herald Reporter

THE chairman of the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions, Mr Alfred Makwarimba, yesterday denied that his organisation was being favoured by the Government.

He was reacting to an accusation yesterday by the United Trade Unions of Zimbabwe that the ZCTU was favoured by the Government and was interfering in the affairs of recognised trade unions.

"We are not being favoured by the Government. The only thing is that the UTUZ served no purpose, especially in regard to workers' problems."

He said his organisation had been charged with the responsibility to unite all trade unions in the country before holding a congress which is to be held in February next year.

"In this connection we are making tremendous progress. We are determined to see one powerful trade union in this country that will serve the interests of the workers."

He said the ZCTU was a co-ordinating body which would like to see unity among trade unions before a national congress to elect a trade union leadership.

"We are not finding any difficulty in uniting trade unions, so we are not perturbed by the actions of the UTUZ, who represent nobody. People are running away from them.

"We reject unreservedly that we are interfering with the registered unions. Some of these registered trade unions are not serving the interests of their members. They are weak in their leadership and their members are dissatisfied with them."

He also said the ZCTU was not politically inspired,, as the UTUZ claimed.

"We are a trade union organisation and not politicians and these mischievious people know that. We are not officials of political organisations, like some of them. The UTUZ only wants to wreck the trade union movement in this country.

"But we will see to it that they don't succeed in their evil intentions. They are puppets of employers."

KANGAI BACKS WORKER UNITY UNDER ZCTU

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 9 Dec 80 pp 1, 2

[Text] The Minister of Labour and Social Services, Mr Kumbirai Kangai, yesterday warned of "crushing" the trade unions which were against the Government policy of establishing a single national trade union centre.

In an interview, Mr Kangai said the Government was determined to see one centre of all trade unions in Zimbabwe and anybody, who opposed this would be dealt with accordingly.

"Any trade unions who act against the Government policy of having one national centre will be crushed. And workers who support a line contrary to that of the Government are wasting their time," he said.

He said it was the Government policy that Zimbabwe had a national centre and "consequently, the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions is the product of that policy."

Mr Kangai said the establishment of such a centre was in conformity with the international standards which "we want to see happen in this country as soon as possible."

"We have already set out our main objectives in the labour field in order to conform to the international standards where a Government should have one trade union centre," he said.

He said the colonial era saw the mushrooming of several trade unions in the country--"some of them not worth the name anyway."

Mr Kangai said that because the Government was a democratic one he invited the trade unions to a meeting where he suggested that they form a single powerful trade union movement in the country.

He said all the trade unionists who attended the meeting agreed to the idea and elected a co-ordinating committee of the ZCTU.

"We charged the committee with the responsibility of working for the establishment of one centre. When I read some of the recent statements by the UTUZ which was represented at the meeting, I really get surprised.

"These people don't know what should be said about the Government. They don't know the responsibility of the Government.

He said that he hoped that UTUZ would quickly come to their senses and know that there was need to work for the interests of the workers--not personal aggrandisement.

Mr Kangai said the Government was not going to deal with people who are after their personal gain. "We are dealing with a matter that concerns the entire nation and not individuals.

"The nation wants one national centre and that is what is going to happen.

He added: "We have charged the ZCTU with responsibility and I believe that they are doing their best at the moment."

Mr Kangai said the Government would take any necessary steps in the interest of workers and the nation against individuals who were against unity. "We will certainly take other steps apart from those already taken in the interest of workers and the nation."

He said there had never been a united trade union in this country and what the Government was doing was the first step to unify all the unions who have been divided over the years because of the system.

"We have no problem with those who want to work for national unity in the trade union movement. But those who don't want will have no place to operate as trade unionists in this country. They have no room."

He said that after the establishment of a national centre of trade unions there would be no union operating outside the umbrella of "that centre".

"This has to be clear to all these trade unions," he declared.

He denied that he was appointing his own people to the co-ordinating committee as alleged by the UTUZ in a statement to the Herald yesterday.

"I have not appointed anybody to the co-ordinating committee. Even if I had appointed people, it would be my prerogative as Minister to do so but I didn't do it."

DENIED

He said he was at the moment solely dealing with the ZCTU and "not other small groups" because the ZCTU represented all centres in the country.

Mr Kangai denied that ZCTU was politically inspired, mut said it was a trade union group which has been charged with the task of producing one centre.

He said so far they were making progress in this regard. "Some of those who are attacking the ZCTU have been tools of the enemy, who are not advancing the cause of the workers.

"I am monitoring the behaviour of each one making this noise," he said.

RHODESIAN FRONT ON TEKERE JUDGMENT ROW

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 10 Dec 80 p 2

[Text]

Herald Reporter

THE national executive of the Rhodesian Front yesterday issued a statement deploring what it called the "callousness and complete lack of contrition" shown by Mr Edgar Tekere after his trial.

The chairman of the Rhodesian Front, Mr Geoff Kluckow, said that the national executive passed no comment on the judgment of the High Court.

"However, the fact is that a man was killed. The men who admitted killing him have been set free. Naturally, as citizens, we are deeply upset and concerned."

The national executive expressed its sincere sympathy to the family and friends of the dead man, Mr Gerald Adams.

Commenting on the statement last night, the Leader of the Senate, Senator Joseph Culverwell lashed out at the "hypocrisy" of the Rhodesian Front.

In his statement, Senator Culverwell said: "It is hypocritical for the men who set up the present judicial system to now condemn that same system. The RF interfered blatantly with the legal process and committed heinous crimes while in office.

"Reconciliation does not mean that RF attitudes should continue to regard black Zimbabweans as incompetent and somehow unequal and not meeting the dignity of an equal and free human being.

"Reconciliation does not mean that while the liberation movement was generous in agreeing to white seats in the House of Assembly and in the Senate, they should be monopolised by the RF.

"It is long past the hour for white Zimbabweans to throw out yesterday's men and put into the Assembly and the Senate a new generation of white leaders to represent them."

PAY PROTEST MARCH BY ZANLA MEN REPORTED

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 10 Dec 80 p 1

[Text]

Herald Reporter

ABOUT 300 former ZANLA guerillas from the ZANU (PF)-owned Goromonzi Farm One near Mrewa, yesterday marched into Salisbury in protest against lack of pay.

The men, wearing an assortment of civilian clothes and camouflage with canvas travelling bags strapped on their backs, were accompanied by several women, some carrying babies. They said they left their base at 7 a.m., and were marching to the ZANLA High Command headquarters at KG VI Barracks to inquire why they had not been paid since they were resettled on the farm.

Said one: "I have been at the farm since April and have not been paid anything. But when we left Mozambique, we were told that we would be paid monthly."

Later in the day the marchers were intercepted by the police outside a shopping centre in Enterprise Road, grouped on a vacant lot and then addressed by ZANLA officers from 2 Brigade.

A spokesman for the Joint High Command last night said they were "urgently" looking into the matter, but could make no comment.

Later last night police said the guerillas had left Salisbury by truck to return to their base.

The police also thanked the motoring public for their patience and apologised for having redirected traffic in the Newlands area. "But this was necessary while the negotiations were taking place with the demonstrators," a police spokesman said.

SITHOLE REJECTS TAG OF UNION 'REBELS'

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 10 Dec 80 p 2

[Text]

Herald Correspondent

BULAWAYO.

ONE of the leaders of a trade union grouping in Zimbabwe last night attacked a Government Minister's "rebel" tag on their organisation, representing about 60 000 members.

The United Trade Unions of Zimbabwe (UTUZ) co-chairman, Mr Phineas Sithole, said they wanted an urgent meeting with the Minister of Labour and Social Services, Mr Kumbirai Kangai, following his warning of "crushing" unions out of step with the Government on establishing a single national trade union centre.

Mr Kangai said the Government was "determined to see one centre for all trade unions in Zimbabwe and anybody who opposed this would be dealt with accordingly". His comments were directed towards recent UTUZ statements on an umbrella body for union activity.

They arose out of a meeting with Zimbabwe's five main union groupings — representing about 60 000 members — and the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions (ZCTU), a steering committee set up by the Government this year to produce a formula for union unity.

UTUZ is understood to have been formed more than two years ago to bring five national union bodies, the African Trade Union Congress, The Zimbabwe Federation of Labour, the Zimbabwe African Federation of Unions, the Trade Union Congress of Zimbabwe and the National African TUC, together under one roof in Salisbury.

Mr Sithole said there were no unions in Zimbabwe opposed to the concept of unity. Mr Kangai's criticism was therefore "misdirected, misplaced and unjustified". The UTUZ is calling for a meeting with him in the next three days.

He denied they were "rebels" and hoped to make the Minister understand this. He said, if possible, they would get an interview with the Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, to explain their position.

"The UTUZ is exercising its right of freedom of speech in criticising the shortcoming of the ZCTU and its failure to carry out instructions to create one national centre within a period of less than three months," he said.

RIFT IN TRADE UNION MOVEMENT GROWS

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 10 Dec 80 p 12

[Editorial: "More Pressing"]

[Text] THE rift in the trade union movement appears to be growing with unhealthy consequences for stability within the labour ranks across the country.

Two weeks ago when we commented on the dispute between rival organisations we suggested that a top-level review might help to correct matters.

Since then the accusations of political interference and personal power ambitions have continued to be made with no sign of a healing of the breach.

The Minister of Labour and Social Services, Mr Kangai, has said the Government is determined to see the formation of a single trade union centre under whose umbrella all unions would have to operate.

He has said that unions which oppose this will be crushed and has appealed to members of the UTUZ to come to their senses.

As far as we can determine the aim of a single trade union centre is shared by the UTUZ but it objects to the method by which the co-ordinating committee of the proposed centre which would be known as the ZCTU is going about its business.

A national congress is due to be held in February — only two months away — at which the umbrella body is to come into being.

But unless urgent steps are taken to get the trade union leaders working together before then, the congress could signal a breakdown. That must be avoided and the need for a review now becomes more pressing.

'SACKED' UNION CHIEF SITHOLE BACK AT TOP

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 14 Dec 80 p 3

[Text]

Sunday Mail Reporter

VETERAN trade unionist Mr Phineas Sithole was unanimously re-elected general secretary of the United Textile Workers' Union at the UTWU's annual Congress in Gatooma yesterday, throwing into doubt the claim made two weeks ago by a rival union faction that he had been sacked

Speaking from Gatooma, Mr Sithole said the congress had been attended by 72 delegates representing 10 of the union's 11 branches throughout the country.

The union representation at the congress demonstrated that the meeting held in Hartley two weeks ago, at which he had reportedly been removed from his post, had not been a UTWU meeting, he said.

"That meeting was a ZCTU (Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions) meeting and had nothing to do with the United Textile Workers' Union. The activities of the ZCTU are not the concern of the United Textile Workers' Union."

While the UTWU congress was taking place in Gatooma the organising secretary of the ZCTU, Mr Webster Gwekwerere, announced in Salisbury that the UTWU leadership that had claimed to have replaced Mr Sithole had agreed to merge the union with a rival splinter group, the Zimbabwe Textile and Carpet Workers' Union.

Mr Gwekwerere said the merger had been agreed upon by representatives of the UTWU and its splinter union meeting in the ZCTU's Salisbury office.

The leaders of the newly merged union, which was to retain the UTWU name, were to be Mr Elphegio Soko and Mr John Mutemi as general secretary and president, respectively.

It was Mr Soko and Mr Mutemi who announced they had ousted Mr Sithole from the union leadership two weeks ago.

Mr Soko had been UTWU vice-president for Mashonaland and Mr Mutemi vice-president for Matabeleland, but they were voted out of office by the congress, Mr Sithole said.

Mr Obert Mwariwangu and Mr Christopher Hlongwane had reportedly been elected in their places in Mashonaland and Matabeleland, respectively.

The UTWU congress also recommended to the Government that wages in the textile industry be increased every three months beginning January 1, until a minimum wage of $150 was reached, he said.

The minimum wage was now $86,66.

Mr Gwekwerere also announced the merger of two other unions, the long-established Hotel and Catering Workers' Union of Zimbabwe and a splinter group, the Zimbabwe Associated Hotel and Catering Workers Union.

The new union would be called the Zimbabwe Hotel and Catering Industry Workers Union. Both it and the newly-merged UTWU would call meetings to elect new national executive councils before February 7, he said.

BUILDING INDUSTRY UNIONS MERGE

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 10 Dec 80 p 3

Herald Reporter

TWO rival trade unions in the building industry merged at the weekend after several weeks of talks with officials of the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions.

A ZCTU spokesman yesterday said his organisation was pleased with the outcome of their talks with the representatives of the Zimbabwe Building and Allied Industrial Workers' Union and the Building Workers' Trade Union.

He said the new organisation is the Zimbabwe Buildin Workers' Trade Union.

ACHIEVEMENT

"As far as the ZCTU is concerned this is a great achievement," said the spokesman.

"We are sure most splinter unions will follow this example."

He added that ZCTU was playing an impartial role in uniting splinter groups.

"All we want is to ensure everlasting unity among trade unions in this country and we are calling on workers of this country, irrespective of race, to belong to a union," he said.

The general secretary of the new body, Mr Edward Njekesa, said the two groups decided to unite because "we saw there was no longer any need for two unions in the building industry".

He said he hoped the new organisation would be more powerful and would work for the interests of all workers in the industry.

"We have been divided on racial lines in this industry for a long time. There was no need for this. We must work together, both black and white."

MAXIMUM USE OF COAL PLAN UNDERWAY

Salisbury BUSINESS HERALD in English 11 Dec 80 p 4

[Article by Tim Chigodo]

THE Government was formulating a policy aimed at making maximum use of coal for the speedy industrialisation of the country, the Secretary for Mines and Energy Resources, Mr Christopher Ushewokunze said this week.

Under the policy, the Government would encourage extraction of products from coal including ammonia, methanol, oil and synthetic fibres in addition to coke used for metallurgical purposes and production of thermal electricity.

"It is possible that world oil resources could be depleted towards the end of the century and coal could become a major source of oil," he said.

There were about 23 coalfields in the northwest and southeast of the country and only one, Wankie, was being exploited to satisfy the local demand for coal and coke with small export capacity.

Mr Ushewokunze said the Government wanted coal to form basic industry in future.

"If Zimbabwe is to be industrialised, it has to be done now. We must derive maximum benefit from our coal resources."

Mr Ushewokunze said Zimbabwe must enter into fabrication and manufacture of metal products because it had all the mineral resources to do so.

Local big companies could produce internationally competitive metal goods.

"This is the only way Zimbabwe can be industrialised, and is very much in line with the Government's policy to require beneficiation of minerals and metals," he added.

He said in future the Government would like to engage in joint ventures where new projects were started involving "strategic" minerals regarded important to national economy.

Mr Ushewokunze stressed that the move should not be construed to mean nationalisation.

"Government policy at the moment is to let the private companies continue to operate, provided they respond positively to Government policy on labour, social services, production, re-investment of profits, promotion and training of Zimbabweans at all levels."

The Government was encouraging foreign companies to go into joint ventures with local organisations.

A Korean delegation had recently paid a visit to Zimbabwe to try and co-operate with the Government in the development of the mining industry.

On the future of the mining industry, Mr Ushewokunze said it was bright and the production was expected to scoop $400 million this year compared with $314,8 million last year.

Gold alone would bring in about $180 million in production value.

There had been considerable increase in the applications for exclusive prospecting orders for prospecting minerals including uranium.

Mr Ushewokunze said there had also been an upsurge in total employment on the mines from 58 000 to over 62 000.

"As long as the international prices remain high and stable, there is a bright future," he added.

There was shortage of skilled personnel in the mining industry in various fields including artisans, metallurgists, engineers and geologists because of the departure of white expatriates and inadequate training facilities for blacks.

NOMINATIONS STAND--Bulawayo--The Minister of Local Government and Housing, Mr Eddison Zvobgo, has ruled that District Council nominations in Gwanda and Beitbridge, will stand, and elections, where necessary, will be held on the date originally scheduled, January 31. A ZANU (PF) official in Gwanda told our correspondent he had asked the Minister to postpone the elections because (he claimed) there was intimidation of ZANU (PF) supporters in the two districts. The Patriotic Front has now won all except five seats in the 10 Matabeleland District Council areas in which nominations have closed. There are a total of 12 District Councils in Matabeleland. Nominations have not yet closed for two Matabeleland North councils: Binga and Bubi. Closing date for Hlangabeza (Bubi) District Council is December 17. For Binga District Council it is December 23. Of the five seats still to be contested, one is in Gwanda, one in Beitbridge, and three are in Wankie. In Wankie, in the 15-seat Wange (1980) District Council, the Patriotic Front were unopposed in 12 seats. An election for the remaining three seats will be held on December 15. EMIGRATION STATISTICS--Zimbabwe's non-black population (European, Asian and Coloured) has dropped by more than 40,000 in the last four years. According to estimates from the Central Statistical Office, more than 10,000 people a year from this group left the country during the period. Europeans were the vast majority of emigrants, while both the Asian and Coloured communities showed marked increases in population. In 1976 the non-black population stood at 303,500, of which 272,000 were Europeans, 10,100 Asians and 21,400 Coloureds. As of June this year, however, the non-black population stood at just under 260,000--223,000 Europeans, 10,900 Asians, and 25,900 Coloureds. The black population increased by more than 900,000 during the same period. The black population stood at 6,190,000 in 1976. It now stands at 7,100,000. FOOD RELIEF CUT--The number of Zimbabweans receiving free food from the Government was slashed by more than 150,000 when the nationwide refugee relief feeding programme resumed at the beginning of this month, Mr Brian Beecroft, director of the Department of Social Services, said last week. Deliveries were now being made to about 450,000 people a month at a cost of $1.8 million for food and about $650,000 for transport, he said. This is within the projections and budget set by the Government when it took over the relief work from private agencies earlier this year and began to expand it to ensure that rural residents with food stocks depleted by the effects of war and drought could make it to next year's harvest. PEOPLE'S TEACHERS--Gwelo--The revolution in Zimbabwe had created a need for a "people's teacher," the Minister of local Government and Housing, Mr Eddison Zvobgo, said yesterday. Such a teacher would live with the people and forge ahead with them to the development of the country, the Minister told graduating students at the Gwelo Teachers' College yesterday. Gone were the days when the teacher could stand in front of the class and pontificate. Zimbabwe's children in their thousands had left their schools to go to war to overthrow a corrupt educational system--and they acquired a type of education there. There had been a revolution and a teacher who was trying to reverse that course would find himself derided and without respect. "We need peace in this country and we want teachers who will encourage students to participate in mass development programmes. We need teachers of imagination--revolutionary teachers. "Our great need in this country is for houses for the people and to improve the level of life of our people. We expect and look to teachers to improve the quality of life." Referring to last week's incident in Salisbury when he took several Cabinet Ministers on a street-cleaning exercise, Mr Zvobgo said: "I challenge the teachers today to do that kind of thing and to set that kind of example." BELGIUM TRADE--Belgium may import maize, coffee, tea and flowers from Zimbabwe, among other things, as a result of a visit here by a representative of the Belgian-African Chamber of Commerce, Mr Roger Concalves. Mr Concalves, who returns to Belgium today after more than a month's tour, said he would get a better picture of possible imports when he returned here next April to

to attend the Zimbabwe Trade Fair. But, he said, judging by the discussions he had held with businessmen and farmers, he was quite sure Belgium could sell hops and malt for Zimbabwe's breweries, and caustic soda for its soap industries. "We can even sell iron sheets to Zimbabwe and buy pig-iron from the country." But any successful trade between Zimbabwe and Belgium would also depend on the handling of goods at the ports of Beira and Maputo. Mr Concalves said that although he "did not make much business" during his visit, he was now well aware of the economic set-up in Zimbabwe. "The country is very interesting," he said. "It is economically very well equipped and I think it is No. 1 in black Africa." [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 9 Dec 80 p 5]

HEALTH MINISTER RAPS PRESS--The Minister of Health, Dr Herbert Ushewokunze, yesterday lashed out at "rumour-mongers and political mischief-makers" after a Press report on speculation that he was about to resign and take up a medical appointment. He said: "This is certainly not the time I would abandon my people and the medical justice I seek for them. I would never think of it. At no time would an idea like that ever get into my mind. "To the contrary, I want to say I have been further inspired by the knowledge that the gospel I have been preaching--that of social justice in medicine--has received the full backing of the World Health Organization. "Therefore, having got this far, it would be quite unreasonable of me to abandon my people, who apparently appreciate the medical justice I have sought for them." Of the Press report, Dr Ushewokunze said: "It was exactly what it said it was--speculation; just another wild rumour." The Minister said the rumour might have been triggered off by someone who wanted him out of the way. "But I am not resigning," he said. "I am thoroughly enjoying my work and looking forward to a quiet weekend." [Text] [Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 14 Dec 80 p 1]

CURFEW DELAYS POLLS--Bulawayo--The Mayor of Bulawayo, Councillor Mike Constandinos, said in an interview yesterday that Bulawayo's new black majority council will not be elected until the curfew in the city's western areas is lifted. The Mayor said this was confirmed by the Minister of Local Government and Housing, Mr Eddison Zvobgo, during an informal "chat" at Bulawayo airport on Thursday while awaiting the arrival of President Nyerere. "Only when the curfew is raised will the ball be in our court," the Minister told Mr Constandinos. In the meantime, 14 councillors of the former city council can carry on, the Town Clerk, Mr Ian Edmeades, said. He and the Mayor were very appreciative of the willingness of councillors, who were not elected on November 22 to carry on in office until the complete new 23-seat council is elected, Mr Edmeades said. There would be no problem about a quorum. Their authority to continue in office was gazetted when the election for 15 black councillors was postponed indefinitely, he said. A Ministry of Information spokesman said the curfew was a police security measure. It was imposed after violence in Entumbane last month. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 9 Dec 80 p 2]

RISCO HIRES UK STEELWORKERS--Twenty skilled steelworkers have been recruited from Britain by Risco. Seven have already arrived at the Redcliff plant and the rest are expected to follow over the next couple of weeks. The men are hired under the same conditions as other Risco workers. They are not on contract and will not be allowed to send any of their wages back to Britain. The company had to get special permission from the Government to bring the workers in. They had to prove there were no Zimbabweans capable of filling the posts. Two of the Britons are believed to have been out of work when they were recruited. Britain's old-fashioned, under-financed steel industry has been devastated by the worldwide drop in demand. One plant after another has closed, throwing thousands on the dole and often destroying whole communities. A Risco spokesman stressed that Zimbabweans would still come first. The company had four engineering students on bursaries, 22 men studying for diplomas and 200 apprentices. [Text] [Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 14 Dec 80 p 3]

ST MARY'S ELECTION--About 10,000 residents of St Mary's, Salisbury, are eligible to go to the polls on Saturday to elect four representatives of the area's board council, a spokesman said yesterday. The election in St Mary's, a former township within Chitungwiza, is different from the local government poll for the municipal areas as it involves only the election of members who will serve on the area board there and not on the Chitungwiza Urban Council. The local government election for Chitungwiza was postponed recently by the Minister of Local Government and Housing, Mr Eddison Zvobgo, because of the ZIPRA/ZANLA fighting at Entumbane, Bulawayo. In a statement yesterday the spokesman said 13 candidates, including a woman, Mrs Theresa Gonga, in Ward D, would contest the four seats. The polling station for the election is the town manager's office in St Mary's. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 11 Dec 80 p 1]

AZ BUYS JETS--The first three Boeing 707s bought by Air Zimbabwe from Lufthansa is expected to arrive on February 18, Mr Mervyn Eyett, the airline's manager, said yesterday. The second Boeing 707 from Lufthansa will arrive in May and the third in June, he said. "The deal is buttoned up. The money has been paid." The three additional Boeings cost $6.6 million, raised by an international bank loan. With the arrival of the third ex-Lufthansa aircraft, Air Zimbabwe would set about inaugurating a service "to some point in Europe," he said. Air Zimbabwe is already flying three services a week between Salisbury and Gatwick, using its initial 707, its flagship. "It is our intention to have a fourth service, to a European point. We want to provide a service to Zimbabweans to go to Europe, and it is also our intention to see how many people we can bring from Europe to this country," Mr Eyett said. The new jets are 707s of the 320-B class, designed for passenger-carrying. The airline's present 707 is a 320-C class, a dual-purpose design with cargo doors and a heavy floor, he said. CALL TO LIFT CURFEW--Bulawayo--Bulawayo's Mayor, Councillor Mike Constandinos, last night urged the Government to lift the curfew over the city's western suburbs, or at least adjust the times so people can move more freely and enjoy the Christmas festive season. He made his appeal while switching on the lights in Centenary Park, the traditional start of the city's Christmas celebrations. "I think it is very sad that something like 80 percent of the population of Bulawayo will be unable to see this display, which has been provided for the benefit of all the citizens of Bulawayo," he said. "As this is the season of goodwill, I would ask the Government to lift the curfew which has been imposed on our Western Suburbs. [Text] [Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 14 Dec 80 p 1]

UANC MEN JOIN NFZ--Four former UANC members yesterday announced they had joined the National Front of Zimbabwe, led by Mr Peter Mandaza. Three of the officials--Mr Thomson Tsanangaurai, Mr John Nyawata and Mr Misheck Hove--were last week expelled from the party for what the UANC termed "undisciplined behaviour." The fourth member, Mr Nicholas Berejena, was an official of the party's general staff. Yesterday the four men said they had decided to join the NFZ as this was a "young, healthy and progressive party" which would give them a platform to air their views. Mr Kingdom Sithole, the NFZ publicity secretary, welcomed the four officials, saying his party would give them an opportunity to move around the country to "preach the gospel of peace, unity and equality" for all Zimbabwean ethnic groups. PIG PRODUCTION--There has been an upsurge in pig production during the last three months of this year, according to the 1980 annual report of the Pig Industry Board of Zimbabwe. The report just published says interest and production for the 1980/81 period could well rise to its all time peak of 1977. This follows a 30 percent drop in the national pig herd because of the war and other factors. During most of the year under review, pig slaughterings have been at the lowest level for many years. The report attributed the increase in interest in pig production to higher producer prices during the second quarter of 1980. "The number of visitors to the Pig Industry Board comprising intending new producers and also existing producers wishing to expand has increased," it says. Zimbabwe had all the feed ingredients and expertise necessary for efficient pig meat production. There was a sound platform for the rapid supply of quality pig meat for both local and export markets. The report stressed that it was essential that any expansion is planned and controlled according to likely market demand. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 11 Dec 80 p 1]

PF MEN RELEASED--Bulawayo--Some of the 15 PF Hlengisizwe branch officials picked up by the police on December 2 were released over the weekend, PF sources said here yesterday. The exact number of those released is not yet known, but the sources said several, including Mr Thembinkosi Nleya, had been set free. Police declined to deny or confirm the release saying it was not their policy to comment on such a matter--Herald Correspondent. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 9 Dec 80 p 3]

POWER CORPORATION PROFIT--The Central African Power Corporation had a net profit of $5.5m. for the year to June 30 this year, says the annual report released yesterday. This was $3.1 million more than last year and was because of the increased tariff on bulk sales; increased demand; continued delays in maintenance work; a reduction in thermal generation in this country and revaluation of the Zimbabwe dollar. The corporation says it may have to negotiate at least one more long term loan before June next year to pay for expansion. Warning of a serious shortage of specialized engineers, CAPCO says recruitment from abroad has become increasingly difficult particularly in Britain, because of rapidly increasing salaries there and the rise in the strength of sterling. On new sites on the Zambezi, the report says planning for site investigations is under way. The first phase of exploratory drilling for Kariba south extensions has also started. For the first time since 1973, a full survey was made of dam structures at Kariba and no defects were found. [Text] [Salisbury BUSINESS HERALD in English 11 Dec 80 p 1]

HARTLEY'S NEW MAYOR--The new Mayor of Hartley, Mr Bizeck Mapuranga, who will be installed on Sunday, said yesterday he was looking forward to a bright future for the town with the assistance of experienced councillors who had been retained. Mr Edwin G. Hughes, the Town Clerk, said the whole council regarded Mr Mapuranga's impending installation as a "very significant event." He also said he was "impressed with the spirit of harmony" developing among the three old and six new councillors. Such co-operation augured well for the town's development. Mr Hughes paid tribute to the residents of Hartley, who, he said, had given the council their full co-operation in the past. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 11 Dec 80 p 3]

NIGERIA OFFERS GHANA HELP--President Shehu Shagari has indicated Nigeria's willingness to help Ghana in her economic recovery. In a ceremony to receive Ghana's new High Commissioner to Nigeria, Alhaji Youssif Patty, President Shagari said "if we are approached and it is within our competence, we are ready and willing to help." Alhaji Patty noted the long history of friendship and cultural links between the two countries and said that Ghana looked forward to greater co-operation with Nigeria. The ambassador later said that his first major assignment was to get the Federal Government to relax the ban on goods like furniture, leatherwares and wood products which Ghana could export to Nigeria. He further said that he will try to convince Nigeria to grant concessions to ECOWAS countries by lifting those bans. His next major assignment would be to do something about Ghanaian prostitutes in Nigeria. [Text] [London WEST AFRICA in English 1 Dec 80 p 2454]

INDISCIPLINE, WAR BLAMED FOR UNATTAINED OBJECTIVES

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 22 Dec 80 p 5

[Text]

LUANDA. — Indiscipline at work and a continuing state of war have been blamed by Angola's ruling party for a failure to realise objectives laid down in 1977.

The objectives — to provide for the people's basic needs — were too ambitious, the Jornal de Angola said in a report on a special meeting of the Angolan Peoples Liberation Movement (MPLA) Workers Party.

The newspaper, basing itself on a report to the congress of the party's central committee, also attacked officials who, it said, had acquired "the most fabulous privileges".

The "dishonest behaviour" of these officials enjoyed "protection" and the congress would be taking measures to "punish the saboteurs of the national economy and the revolutionary process", the paper said.

The newspaper asserted that "the cleansing of the present economic conjuncture" would lead to a rapid solution to such serious problems as hunger through an increase in production and productivity.

Angolan President Jose Eduardo dos Santos said the forces of imperialism were increasingly aggressive and the gap between industrialised and underdeveloped countries was growing.

He noted economic successes, particularly in oil production, but said that education, health and above all food supplies were far from satisfactory, and that the Planning Ministry must take measures to assure a balanced economy.

President Dos Santos stressed Angola's friendly and co-operative relations with states such as the Soviet Union and Cuba.

He also reaffirmed support for two African liberation movements, Swapo and the African National Congress. — Sapa-AFP.

PRESIDENT INTERVIEWED BY SAUDI PAPER

LD181135 Jidda 'UKAZ in Arabic 12 Dec 80 p 3

[Interview with Djibouti President Hassan Gouled Aptidon by Nasir al-Shahri and Hasan al-Zahiri--place and date not given]

[Excerpts] [Question] Mr President, can you please tell us about the circumstances of your visit to the Saudi Arabian kingdom and the results of your meetings with officials at various levels?

[Answer] My visit to the kingdom is private, for a vacation and to spend some time in the city of At-Ta'if.

[Question] What about the bilateral relations between the kingdom and Djibouti?

[Answer] The relations between our two countries are exemplary and are strengthened by the Islamic spirit and principles. We hope, God willing, that these good relations will become stronger and more deeply rooted.

[Question] During your visit to France, did you discuss with officials there the question of obtaining military aid or conclude any bilateral agreements?

[Answer] Relations in various fields exist between the two countries but during my recent visit we did not discuss any subject. The relations between the two countries are based on mutual respect and cooperation in various fields.

[Question] What about your relations with neighboring states?

[Answer] We regard the relations between us and neighboring states as relations of good-neighborliness. Naturally, we must not forget to point out that the area is in a state of turmoil. However, our relations with our neighbors are good.

[Question] What is Djibouti's stance on the AFAR issue and how much aid are you giving to this front [presumably the AFAR Liberation Front]?

[Answer] All of us are aware that the Horn of Africa is experiencing violent upheavals. Disputes exist among some of the states in the area and many elements from the AFAR area, Somalia and Ogaden migrated to Djibouti during the war. Our view on this subject includes all these factors.

[Question] Mr President, surely this affected Djibouti's economy?

[Answer] Naturally. A great many of them have come over and this has somewhat upset Djibouti's economy. The refugees constitute 12 percent of Djibouti's population. We believe that we should bear responsibility for these refugees and cooperate with our fraternal countries in providing them with accommodation and health and educational services. The refugees now live in camps. I emphasize, however, that in their present numbers, the refugees constitute a burden on Djibouti's economy and its development.

[Question] Your excellency, the Red Sea area is undoubtedly being subjected to many dangers that are threatening its safety, security and ideologies. How can the area be safeguarded against these dangers?

[Answer] Djibouti's attitude to the Red Sea basin is that it should be a zone of security and peace. If any problem arises among the Red Sea states, they are capable of solving it themselves and the Red Sea would thus remain, as we have already said, a zone of security and peace. We appeal to all the big powers in the world not to interfere with this waterway, not to make the Red Sea basin an area of war and con flict and not to bring their problems to this area, so that the Red Sea can remain a secure waterway. The Red Sea states must also take a serious view of the dangers arising from the conflict among the big powers in the area, because the presence of the big powers and Soviet expansion constitute an extreme danger to the areas around the Red Sea. Djibouti also believes that it must adopt a neutral stand and not interfere in other states' internal affairs.

[Question] Does Djibouti feel any particular danger as a result of the foreign movements on the shores nearby?

[Answer] As you know, the big powers present in the area undoubtedly constitute a danger to Djibouti and, in our view, they also constitute a danger to the area as a whole. Moreover, their presence is not in the interest of the area's states because the objective of these states is to control the strategic Strait of Bab el Mendeb and the oilfields.

[Question] Your excellency. The problem of Afghanistan posed by the Soviet invasion of that country constitutes a challenge to the Islamic nation. Is there a possibility of ending this challenge?

[Answer] Djibouti was one of the first states to deplore the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. We have also denounced it at every opportunity and we continue to denounce it. We call upon the Soviet Union to immediately withdraw from Muslim Afghanistan so that the latter can determine its own fate in complete freedom. In my view, this invasion constitutes a danger whose dimensions can be seen from the expansion that has begun, with other steps to devour peaceful Islamic states, thus constituting a serious threat to world peace and security.

[Answer] Djibouti's position regarding the current war between Iraq and Iran is one of calling on the two Muslim countries, first, to stop the bloodshed, to take into consideration the Iraqi people's right to their territory and to resolve the dispute by peaceful means.

[Question] What is new in your stance regarding the question of stability in the area?

[Answer] Djibouti's stance regarding the Palestinian people's rights and the aggressions committed against South Lebanon is clear and specific. Djibouti condemned the Camp David agreement and Israeli expansion, which seems to have no limits and through which Israel is seeking to establish a greater Israel (from the Nile to the Euphrates). The Arab and Islamic nations must seek to liberate their holy places and to restore Jerusalem to Arab sovereignty. These nations must also prepare to confront the danger threatening their security and safety. For this reason. I appeal to the Arab states to overcome their peripheral differences and to work toward achieving Arab solidarity, which is the strongest weapon with which the nation can confront the danger threatening it.

MOI RETURNS FROM SUDAN VISIT 18 DECEMBER

LD181630 Nairobi Domestic Service in English 1400 GMT 18 Dec 80 EA

[Text] His excellency President Daniel Arap Moi today returned from a successful 4-day state visit from the Sudan to a warm welcome by thousands of Wananchi at Jomo Kenyatta International Airport led by the vice president, Mr Mwai Kibaki. On arrival President Moi inspected a guard of honor mounted by the 7th battalion Kenya rifles and received a fly-past by a formation of Kenya IAR forces jets.

Addressing the nation from the airport, the president said that his talks with the Sudanese leader, President Numayri, centered mainly on world and African affairs, developments and the Horn of Africa and bilateral matters between Kenya and the Sudan. On regional cooperation, the president said that a followup ministerial meeting would be held early next year in Khartoum between Kenya, Sudan and Ethiopia. He called on the neighboring Somalia to desist from its territorial claim on its neighbors and to ensure peaceful coexistence in the region.

President Moi said that the joint communique issued at the end of his state visit to the Sudan stresses the importance of good neighborliness and internal peaceful coexistence for African nations, and particularly within the east and central African regions. The communique also recommended the need for cultural exchanges and closer commercial links between Kenya and the Sudan. President Moi announced that the Sudanese Government had offered six military scholarships for Kenyan army officers to train in the Sudan Military College.

He commended Kenya Airways' pilots, Kenya Air Force and the Kenya Army personnel for their efficiency and dedication to work and called on the airport workers to assist the government in fighting smuggling and corruption in the country.

GOVERNMENT MAY LIFT WANACHI PROVINCE CURFEW

LD181314 Nairobi Domestic Service in English 0400 GMT 18 Dec 80

[Text] The government will soon lift the curfew in the northeastern province of Wananchi if they agree to cooperate with security forces to wipe out the Shifta menace. This was disclosed by the area's provincial commissioner, Mr Benson Kaaria, yesterday when he addressed a baraza [public meeting] at Wajir Park. The provincial commissioner said the security forces could not eradicate Shifta activity in the area unless local Wananchi cooperated by exposing the Shiftas.

Mr Kaaria assured Wananchi in the area that all development projects set by the government will continue as arranged.

Addressing another baraza at Mandera Town, the provincial commissioner said that the war against Shifta in the province was being hampered by a few disgruntled people, who harbored persons of double loyalties. Mr Kaaria said that the current curfew in the province was for the good of the peace-loving Wananchi and that it will be lifted as soon as the situation has come back to normal.

He assured Wananchi in Mandera that food supplies will be increased to the area to meet the demand.

The Mandera district commissioner, Mr Ondiek, addressing the same meeting, thanked the people of Mandera for cooperation with the government during this difficult time.

ECONOMY SAID HARMED BY MOZAMBICAN PORT PROBLEMS

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 18 Dec 80 p 19

[Article by Gordon Knowler]

[Text] THE Malawian economy is taking a severe hammering because of the inability of the Mozambican port of Nacala to handle its imports and exports.

Shipping lines are experiencing difficulties in ship operation because the cargoes, in containers, are just not reaching the port in time to meet the ships they are booked for.

Nacala, according to Kevin Clarke, marketing manager for Africa for the American Moore McCormack Line, is the only port through which Malawi can receive and send containers destined for Blantyre. Beira is used on occasions for break-bulk cargoes.

'Sabotage'

During 1979 Mozambican exports of tea quadrupled, those of Malawi shrank because their cargo was not reaching the ports on time to meet the shipping commitments and for this reason there are suggestions among Malawian exporters that Mozambique is exercising economic sabotage.

Shortage of vital equipment at Nacala for cargo handling is aggravating the situation and this, coupled with insufficient and unskilled staff, is further affecting the position.

And to compound the problems, the executive controlling the movement of cargo at the port is about 250 km away at Nampula.

Mr Clarke said that at Nacala about 1 200 import containers awaited trucking inland, while about 300 more awaited export at the inland Blantyre container depot.

Tobacco exports to the US are being particularly hard hit because from January 1, it is imposing a surcharge duty on tobacco. The additional duty is expected to be between 4 and 6 percent.

Parts of the rail track in Mozambique are said to be unsafe, so that freight trains have to negotiate sections at walking pace.

Only hours before they arrive off Nacala, it is claimed, are ships advised that their cargo is available for shipment; at times vessels are diverted past the port because cargo on hand is insufficient to warrant the call, despite prior freight bookings.

Estimates of tea and tobacco exports for next year run at about 1 000 containers and shippers are worried that the cargo will not reach the port on time. Exporting has become very much a hit and miss affair, with an adverse effect on the Malawian economy.

Zimbabwean tobacco exporters are also having difficulties. To try to help them Moore McCormack railed 30 empty containers to Salisbury. But it took the shipping company almost a month to get them to the Zimbabwean capital.

Apparently, there is too much South African rolling stock "arrested" in Zimbabwe, principally DZ-type trucks, and the SAR is unhappy about sending more trucks to be "lost" for an indeterminate time.

Transit

Transit time to Salisbury from Johannesburg is about 30 days and from Salisbury to Durban about 6 weeks. This exposes the shipper to excessive storage or demurrage costs because the cargoes are negotiated FOB Durban or other specified ports.

Because of the uncertainty of specified shipping dates, American importers of Malawian and Zimbabwean tobacco are not happy, but they appreciate the difficulties facing Southern African shippers.

A South African-made gantry crane is soon to be installed at Nacala, and it is expected that this should significantly help the loading and unloading of containers at the port.

RESULTS OF RECENT ELECTIONS DISCUSSED

Nationalist Party Promises Recalled

Windhoek DIE REPUBLIKEIN in Afrikaans 17 Nov 80 p 1

[Text] For 3 months now, the Southwest's Nationalist Party has been beating the racial drum and has been telling its followers that the Republican Party cannot be trusted, because the black and colored groups within the Democratic Turnhalle Alliance (DTA) are not to be trusted.

At the same time it promised "a return to Turnhalle"...along with those once "untrustworthy" leaders of the other groups.

Attorney Percy Niehaus even said that this would take place within 6 weeks following the outcome of the elections. Thus it will not be until about Christmas and New Year that the people would again gather around the conference table!

We are waiting for this and if the Nationalist electors do not remind their leaders of this we will do it for them and we will do so relentlessly. We will demand every pound of flesh from the Southwest Nationalist Party's election promises.

We have compiled a short list so that this may not be forgotten:

--back to Turnhalle. Within 6 weeks we certainly want to see a move;

--the reestablishment of the Immorality Act and the Act on Mixed Marriages for whites. Kosie Pretorius shall especially dedicate himself to this on the day that the Southwest's Nationalist Party takes the reins of government under the new state of affairs. We and the electors want a report on Pretorius' progress;

--the obtainment of rights for hotel, restaurant and cafe owners to conduct business with clients of their choice as far as color is concerned;

--the creation of an exclusive residential area for whites;

--the proclamation of a private territorial area as an area of authority;

--reserved hospitals for whites.

In the event that it will not be possible to reach a decision on one of these matters without the collaboration of other groups it will be imperative for the Southwest Nationalist Party to obtain consensus immediately with the other moderate parties.

They will not have to wait long. Democratic Turnhalle Alliance leaders are already starting to come in Windhoek this week for a general committee meeting. Opportunity is therefore knocking at the door and we are waiting to see that it is taken.

Nationalist Party Victory Too Slim

Windhoek DIE REPUBLIKEIN in Afrikaans 17 Nov 80 p 6

[Text] A closer look at last week's white elections provides the following information:

Out of a total of about 52,000, 43,908 voters cast votes. This comes to over 80 percent of the voters.

Of this number, 21,202 voted for the Nationalist Party. This comes to 48.2 percent of the total number of votes cast and 40.7 percent of the number of people authorized to vote.

The Republican Party got 18,246 votes which is equal to 41.48 percent of the votes cast and 35 percent of those having voting rights.

More than 15 percent of the voters did not vote. They could have tipped the scales one way or another.

The Reconstituted Nationalist Party drew 4,532 votes which is 10.3 percent of the voters who cast their votes and 8.6 percent of those entitled to vote.

No Upper Hand

For the first time in nearly 40 years, the ruling white party does not have decisive majority support over the opposition parties.

During the forties the VNSWP [United National Southwest Africa Party] definitely had the upper hand. From 1950 on, the Southwest Nationalist Party maintained an absolute majority among both the voters and the candidates.

This is no longer the case.

In contrast with the 21,202 voters who voted for the Nationalist Party, 22,778 of the voters joined ranks with the opposition parties (Republican Party: 18,246, Reconstituted Nationalist Party: 4,532).

This comes down to the opposition representing 43.8 percent of the electorate and the ruling party representing 40.7 percent of it.

Out of the total votes cast, the opposition has a representation of 51.8 percent and the ruling party 48.2 percent. In order for it to claim that it will be talking "for the whites" in matters of stipulations the Nationalist Party must therefore obtain the support of one of the two opposition parties. The party is quick to talk about stipulation, but nobody will be sending it to stipulate on any matters if it is going to talk only for itself and never for the other half of the country's white population. With its majority of under 7 percent (2,956 votes) over the Republican Party, the Southwest Nationalist Party definitely has no "stipulative powers with respect to the whites!"

On the basis of its victory, it can rule in the white legislative assembly, but it is there that its capacity comes to an end.

It is no wonder that Du Plessis says that he would have liked to have had a greater victory!

SWAPO Machinations

Windhoek DIE REPUBLIKEIN in Afrikaans 17 Nov 80 p 4

[Text] This past election in Kavango degenerated into a mini-SWAPO election. This is the opinion of Dr Paul Van der Merwe, chairman of the Republican Party, who just returned from the Kavango region where he first held a series of meetings throughout the region and then in the course of the elections he also represented his organization in the name of the DTA [Democratic Turnhalle Alliance].

The vote counting began at 7 o'clock this morning in Windhoek and the results are expected this afternoon. In three regions in Kavango, namely in the Mbunza, Sambyu and Gciriku, the NCDP [National Christian Democratic Party] of Hans Rohr put up candidates. In the other two regions, namely Kwangali and Mbukushu there was no opposition to the DTA.

Last night Dr Van der Merwe told DIE REPUBLIKEIN that the NCDP had operated under the standard of a Christian party; however as time went on it became clear that SWAPO elements in Kavango had combined forces with the party in an effort to break up the DTA. In each of the regions where an election took place the NCDP put up four candidates.

The strongest NCDP candidate was Kosmas Makanga from Mashare in the Sambyu region and it is also mostly in this region that the NCDP threw in all of its forces. Makanga has been a known leader of SWAPO and recently he established himself in Mashare near the college. On Friday following the election, he showed up at a well-known restaurant and addressed a large crowd of people waiting for news.

According to a former instructor who had been working at the DTA office and was also from the Sambyu region, Makanga told the people that the DTA must be done away with, that the old people in Sambyu will have to go and that young people of his choice must take over the governing functions. The NCDP candidates and all the party's workers at the polls were mainly instructors.

A group of male students from the Rundu school came to the DTA office during the election and stated that Makanga had read a letter at the restaurant; this letter, allegedly written and signed by Bishop Bonifatimus Hausiku of Windhoek, called upon the youth to vote for the NCDP. They had come to find out why they should no longer vote for the DTA. To the credit of the Catholic Church in Kavango it may be said that the leader of Sambyu mission station in Sambyu, Father Bernhardt van Rosmalen, personally told Dr Van der Merwe that he had sent a circular letter to the mission stations to the effect that the church was not having anything to do with politics and he also forbade the NCDP to hold meetings on its grounds.

Known SWAPO sympathizers in Kavango sided strongly with the NCDP in the elections. These methods strongly resemble those employed in the most recent elections in Zimbabwe.

For example, the story was widely circulated that the voters would have to dip their hands into a fluid as in the 1978 election. The fluid is invisible, but can be seen under a strong light.

Allegedly the fluid causes an incurable disease and this is the reason which is keeping voters from the polls. Another reason is that the two fingers of the DTA represent the devil's fork. DTA voters were also told to draw a cross next to the party which they do not want. In school they were taught that a cross is drawn next to something which is wrong.

The results of the Kavango elections will be a strong indicator of the extent to which SWAPO is being supported in Kavango. However, Dr Van der Merwe said that a large number of NCDP votes will be representative of a sincere church-minded group.

Because he is now in Germany, Bishop Hausiku was not available for comment yesterday.

MUDGE QUERIES DELEGATION COMPOSITION

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 19 Dec 90 pp 1-2

[Article by David Pieters and Anne Marie Du Preez]

[Text]

THE ADMINISTRATOR General Mr Danie Hough and the Chairman of the Ministers Council and DTA Mr Dirk Mudge met in Swakopmund today to discuss the composition of the delegation of the internal parties which will attend the Geneva all-party conference next month.

The DTA has expressed considerable dissatisfaction about the formula announced by the AG on Monday.

Mr Mudge is said to have taken the AG to task this morning and has warned that the DTA is not prepared to attend the conference unconditionally.

During a DTA caucus dif-meeting lasting several hours on Wednesday strong dissatisfaction amongst certain groups within the DTA was expressed concerning the number of representatives that ferent groups comprising the DTA would be allocated according to the AG's quota of 14 representatives for the DTA and 12 for the other internal parties.

Individual groups within the DTA have been said to be dissatisfied about the proportional number of delegates they will be allowed to send to Geneva in relation to certain opposition parties in the National Assembly.

Mr Dirk Mudge confirmed this morning that there was dissatisfaction concerning the Herero and Coloured parties, as well as the Namibia Christian Democratic Party.

It is argued that while the DTA affiliated Herero party of Mr Kuaimo Riruako, Nudo, won far more votes in the recent second tier elections than the opposition party of Mr Johannes Karuaihe, Nudo Progressive, each is to have one delegate at Geneva

Similarly in the case of the Coloured DTA and opposition parties.

Apparently Mr Joey Julius, leader of the DTA affiliated Coloured Labour Party, is discontented because his party will only have one delegate at the talks, while the opposition Liberal Party of Mr Andrew Kloppers, will have two.

This is despite the fact that Labour won the recent ethnic elections by a large majority.

Mr Mudge is reported to have said that the DTA is not happy about the fact that the NCDP led by Mr Hans Rohr, is being allowed two delegates while only having one seat in the National Assembly.

Mr Mudge is also reported to have said that there is serious apprehension about the situation with the Damara political groups.

Mr Mudge told the Advertiser this morning in Swakopmund, that the impression had been created that the DTA would attend the Geneva talks unconditionally.

This was not the case, he said. There were a number of very specific points which the DTA wanted clarified before they would leave for Geneva.

These included the following:

- The UN must demonstrate its impartiality to all parties involved in the pre-implementation talks;
- The agenda as well as the procedure of the Geneva talks must be laid down prior to commencement of the talks;
- And the present composition of the SWA delegation to accompany the AG must be satisfactorily adjusted.

Mr Mudge said he regarded the question of the composition of the delegation going to Geneva as very important.

Meanwhile it is reported that the internal Swapo group has confirmed that it is in the process of composing a delegation which is to leave for Geneva independently to join forces with Sam Nujoma's delegation around the conference table in Geneva.

DTA TO COUNTER SWAPO ABROAD

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 5 Dec 80 p 1

[Article by Gail Visagie]

[Text]

THE DTA leadership is to visit Europe and the UK next week to launch a strong public relations drive as a forerunner to the UN talks and to counter Swapo's intended foreign campaign.

The DTA delegation will comprise Mr Dirk Mudge and Mr Peter Kalangula, Chairman and President of the DTA respectively, and Mr Kuaima Riruako, leader of the Hereros.

This morning early Mr Mudge confirmed that he and his two colleagues would be travelling abroad.

"We intend holding a number of Press conferences, which will coincide with Press conferences being held by Swapo. We will be in a position to give comment on Swapo. We have also indicated to the Western countries, especially West Germany and Britain, that we will be available. There are indications that Lord Carrington is eager to speak to us."

With an amused chuckle Mr Mudge said that Lord Carrington was doing his best to mete out equal treatment to all.

Early in November this year while addressing the last public meeting of the Republican Party in the election campaign, Mr Mudge lashed out at the attitude taken by West Germany's Foreign Minister, Mr Hans-Dietrich Genscher, towards members of the DTA.

Mr Mudge pointed out at that time that on the one hand Mr Genscher welcomed Sam Nujoma, Swapo's leader with traditional red carpet treatment, even toasting Swapo.

On the other hand, when the DTA asked to see him, he was not available. The times that he had seen the DTA, it had been secretly. It seems obvious that the DTA delegation will be putting Mr Genscher to the test this time.

Meanwhile, from London, it has been reported that Lord Carrington is expected to hold talks with Mr Mudge and the Swapo leader, Sam Nujoma. British officials have also confirmed that Lord Carrington would take the opportunity of updating himself on the SWA dispute. But no dates have been set as yet for a meeting.

Mr Nujoma starts his two-day visit to London on Tuesday, while Mr Mudge and his colleagues will arrive there on Thursday.

Britain is backing the UN plan for a pre-implementation conference on the SWA issue to be held early in January.

Junior Foreign Office Minister Mr Richard Luce told the House of Commons yesterday that Britain, together with the other members of the five-nation Western contact group, would continue to try and use their influence to bring about a SWA settlement.

DTA WILL NOT BUDGE ON UN ISSUE

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 12 Dec 80 p 9

[Text]

LONDON: DTA leaders gave notice yesterday that they would take a strong negotiating position at a pre-implementation conference on SWA, saying the UN would have to reverse its recognition of Swapo before elections could take place.

The DTA's Vice-Chairman, Mr Kuaima Riruako, said his delegation would make three demands at the proposed talks scheduled to take place next month.

These were that the UN General Assembly withdraw its recognition of Swapo as the sole and authentic representative of the people of SWA, that Swapo's observer status at the UN be withdrawn, and that the UN cease financial aid to Swapo.

"We will not have an election unless these three points are met," he told a press conference.

Mr Mudge urged that parties to the conference should attend it with "a new spirit". But he warned that if Swapo succeeded in creating the impression that it had any particular status at the talks "then that will be a bad start."

The DTA and Swapo have agreed to attend the talks, but no venue has been fixed. Mr Mudge confirmed that the DTA had rejected Maputo, and said a neutral venue had to be found.

The DTA Chairman said independence for SWA could not be proposed indefinitely, and told the press conference he did not believe the South Africa Government was holding the process. "South Africa wants us loose. We often feel that South Africa is putting pressure on us to accept solutions," he said.

Mr Mudge repeatedly emphasised the problems created by UN recognition of Swapo. This recognition, he said, would have a psychological effect on the people of SWA and would influence the outcome of an election.

"When South African troops move out and UN troops move in, they could be seen as the troops of an organisation which represents Swapo," he said.

He also accused Swapo of raising new problems before the pre-implementation talks take place, and cited statements in London this week by a Swapo delegation which said its guerrillas operating inside the territory would not be disarmed.

He also predicted that the Swapo leader, Mr Sam Nujoma, who cancelled a trip to London for "security reasons," would not attend the talks.

"I have a nasty feeling that Nujoma will not be prepared to go to the conference, again for 'security reasons'," said Mr Mudge.

The DTA leaders said they accepted that the Administrator General of the Territory, Mr Danie Hough, should head a delegation including the internal parties. But they made it clear they intended playing a major role at the talks.

DTA IS APPREHENSIVE ABOUT CONFERENCE

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 18 Dec 80 pp 1-2

[Text]

WINDHOEK: The SWA Ministers Council had decided, after hours of deliberation in Windhoek yesterday, to seriously reconsider attending the pre-implementation talks on the Territory, scheduled for January 7 in Geneva, Mr Dirk Mudge, Chairman of the Ministers Council, said last night.

The executive of the DTA, the ruling party in the SWA National Assembly, would meet on January 2 to reconsider its position finally, he added.

The Ministers Council had decided on this step after a recent overseas visit by Mr Mudge and other officials and because of other factors.

It should be realised that the pre-implementation talks would have an immense influence on the political future of SWA and its people, he said. The Ministers Council could not be expected to make glib decisions on it.

The Ministers Council had reconsidered attending because of the following factors:

"The reasons for this very drastic decision are, firstly, that there is, at this late stage no certainty about the procedure to be followed (at the conference) and we have absolutely no details about the agenda for such a conference," Mr Mudge said.

There was a strong possibility that a great deal of a single week in January for which the conference had been set down would be taken up by bickering about procedure and the agenda.

"There is also the possiblity – a risk we dare not take – that our (DTA) delegation might be insulted and humiliated," he said.

There was also no guarantee that other political parties – those not included in the Administrator General's delegation would not also be given the opportunity to attend the conference on their own.

This would brand those parties in the Administrator Generals delegation as puppets of Pretoria or the Administrator General, Mr Mudge said.

"We will all rather attend the conference on our own and if other parties are allowed to go on their own while we do not have the opportunity, it will be a psychological disadvantage for us."

Mr Mudge said the Ministers Council was also not satisfied with the composition of the Administrator Generals delegation to the conference.

"After hours of deliberation today, the Ministers Council had come to the decision that the composition of the delegation, as proposed by the Administrator General, is in no way (hoegenaamd) acceptable to us."

Mr Mudge declined to elaborate on which points of the Administrator General's proposed delegation the Ministers' Council did not agree.

He said the matter would be discussed with the Administrator General, Mr Danie Hough, within the next few days.

Mr Mudge added that the composition of Mr Hough's delegation was one of the most important reasons why the Ministers' Council would reconsider its attendance of the conference.

He said this was not a final decision not to attend the Geneva talks.

"But I must say that we are increasingly gaining the impression that – especially after our visit abroad – this proposed conference would be a futile exercise."

Asked why there had been a change of heart, Mr Mudge said political leaders were prepared to run certain risks with resolution 435 to achieve peace in SWA.

But the UN had seriously deviated from the original settlement plan. Swapo was still being assisted financially by the United Nations.

Neither the Western Five nor the UN Security Council had ever repudiated the General Assembly for its actions.

The South African forces were criticised for actions against Swapo across the Angolan border, but the Western Five had never criticised Swapo for its terrorist activities in SWA.

Mr Martti Ahtisaari had continued in his position as Commissioner of the Council for Namibia, Mr Mudge said, which was a body in which Swapo had played a controlling role.

The internal political parties in SWA had throughout been forced to negotiate through South Africa, while Swapo was allowed to act on its own behalf, Mr Mudge said.

All this had systematically whittled away trust in the UN as an impartial referee, as well as in the West as reliable ombudsmen.

"We saw the pre-implementation talks as the ideal opportunity to bridge this credibility gap," he said. "This would have given the UN the chance to show its impartiality at this very critical stage... but this has not happened."

"There is serious doubt in our minds if we should continue with this conference," he said.

Should any of the Ministers' Council's objections be eliminated before January 2, it would naturally influence decisions made at the DTA executive meeting next month.

"But there will definitely have to be action from more than one quarter if we were to take part," Mr Mudge said. – Sapa

TIME SEEN RUNNING OUT FOR NAMIBIA

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 15 Dec 80 p 12

[Article by Don Knowler: "Sands of Time Running Out in Namibia"]

[Text]

SWAKOPMUND.

"HERE I stand. I can do no other." The quotation from Martin Luther which adorns an old steam tractor stuck in the sands of the Namib Desert has a new significance for the mainly German community here.

With sardonic humour they are using the expression, in the context of the locomotive, to describe their Afrikaner neighbours, many of whom are rejecting the inevitable changes which are occurring in Namibia.

The stubborn old tractor, built in 1896, became bogged down a few years later when an entrepreneur tried to take it into the German colonial territory's hinterland. It has stayed in the same place ever since.

Similarly, the whole complex process to abolish discrimination in Namibia and open the country up for all races is becoming bogged down now that a significant number of whites have voted to put a brake on change.

And what makes it more serious is that the world is watching internal political developments in the territory as momentum builds up for a proposed all-party conference on Namibia's future, sponsored by the United Nations.

In what was virtually a referendum on how far change should go, the Republican Party, which represents white interests in the Democratic Turnhalle Alliance, was firmly defeated by the National Party last month in ethnic elections.

Mr Dirk Mudge, the RP's leader, was hoping for a white vote of confidence to boost the overall image of the ethnic alliance in good time for the U N, one man, one vote elections which are now predicted for late next year.

But like the steam tractor, a majority of whites thought otherwise (even if the verdict was distorted because of the large number of South African civil servants in the territory who were allowed to vote and whom, it is believed, mainly voted Nationalist).

It is ironic that it should be the German community particularly which was disappointed at Mr Mudge's defeat. Traditionally the Germans have aligned themselves behind the Afrikaner nationalists, propagating the same viewpoints on rigid separation and ethnic and community identity.

The alliance with the Nationalists can be traced back to an intense distrust and dislike of English-speaking South Africans from the time of the First World War.

Members of the German community — which now numbers about 19 000 out of the territory's 109 000 whites — were also interned during the Second World War and when the conflict was over the Germans looked to the National Party for protection.

Mudge has changed this in part. When he broke away from the nationalists in 1977 to form his own party, the "Suidwester lied", a German song, was sung at the end of the inaugural meeting. And Mudge, fluent in German, boasts at all his meetings that his is a "three-language party" (German, Afrikaans and English).

The softening of German attitudes towards general change can also be ascribed to the fact that the German community to a large degree has maintained its links with the "mother country".

This is evident from the exclusive shops in Windhoek's Kaiser Strasse that stock goods imported directly from West Germany and from the travel agencies which mainly advertise package tours to Europe in their windows.

"Many Germans now go back to Germany periodically and they can view this place (Namibia) from afar," said a German businessman in Windhoek. "But the Afrikaners only get as far as South Africa for their holidays and they just can't understand the reality of the situation we now face."

Reality to most thinking Germans, and thinking Afrikaners for that matter, is the knowledge that the South West Africa they knew, in a cosy cocoon, watched over by the might of South Africa, will soon be gone forever.

The dramatic events which overtook Rhodesia this year are sweeping Namibia a way and there is a realisation in some quarters here that the militant South West Africa Peoples' Organisation (SWAPO) might win a U.N. supervised election.

That may be too much for the old school of South-westers to take, but South African Government and internal propaganda about SWAPO being "marxist, anti-white terrorists" has not entirely convinced people that there is no place for them in Namibia if SWAPO should come to power.

That is not to say that people are starting to gear themselves for a SWAPO government, though.

There is a bizarre atmosphere in Windhoek at the moment, not unlike that in Rhodesia's cities at the height of the bush war in that country when a visitor might not have realised these were a people at war, and facing an uncertain future.

It is about 9 p.m. at the showgrounds in Windhoek and a crowd has gathered to hear the result of the white vote for second-tier administration in the Windhoek South constituency.

Over a portable radio comes the news flash that the Nationalists have won another Windhoek constituency and Nationalist supporters and their children, wearing orange and blue caps, start jumping up and down with delight.

A young woman breaks into tears and says in Afrikaans: "These bloody Afrikaners. You just can't trust an Afrikaner to do the sensible thing . . ."

South - westers had never known such political division in the territory.

Brother stood against brother in one constituency, there were fights in bars and a reporter from a Johannesburg Afrikaans newspaper was manhandled by Nationalist officials at a polling booth.

Although internal politicians cannot see it, or do not want to admit it, there is a parallel in what is happening in Namibia with Zimbabwe's modern history.

In the old Rhodesia the white community was also split over issues involving black advancement, but that was in a direct referendum on whether to accept the principle of majority rule.

The whites, however, voted for universal franchise which led to Bishop Muzorewa becoming Prime Minister. As in Namibia, the only black leaders to participate in this internal settlement were the ones not waging war, the guerillas and their leaders remaining outside the country.

The Government of Bishop Muzorewa, like the "government" or ministerial council in Namibia, was not recognised outside the country and Rhodesian parties were forced finally to go to a conference, to hand over sovereignty to the British and to have fresh elections.

There are differences with the Namibia situation (namely the South African Administrator-General wields the real power in the territory) but the pattern of events is shaping up to be similar.

The same can be said for the war. Admittedly, it was far more intense in the old Rhodesia but there is a significant parallel in the amnesty campaign, launched in Rhodesia and Namibia for guerillas to return.

This failed miserably in Rhodesia and, perhaps this more than anything else, persuaded Bishop Muzorewa and his white backers to go to the Lancaster House conference.

The amnesty campaign has also failed in Namibia.

South Africa may be in a far stronger position to contain the war in Namibia (it has not really affected the territory outside Owamboland, in the north) but for how long will this be acceptable to the people at home?

Conversely South Africa's military strength might be a strong factor in the "frontline" countries' determination to push SWAPO into attending a conference because some states consider it a war that SWAPO cannot win on its own.

IN a bookshop in Windhoek two young blacks are looking at a book about the South African Defence Force and the S.W.A. Force's role in the bush war.

But the blacks are not interested in the pictures of South African whites leaping from helicopters and so on.

They are looking at pictures of dead "terrorists" and identifying their weaponry, which includes AK-47 assault rifles and rockets.

Compared to the "official" internal parties, SWAPO keeps a low profile in the territory and for an outsider it is impossible to gauge what support the movement may have.

But people who travel in Owamboland (the Owambos form 46 percent of the total population of nearly one million) say the people there appear to be solidly behind the movement.

The awareness of black nationalism also reaches the Windhoek township of Katutura, where painted on the door of a simple home in the Herero quarter is a black map of Africa, with Namibia and South Africa painted white.

Pressure from blacks for a better deal and international pressure on South Africa over the Namibia issue has changed the face of Namibia in recent years. In restaurants and bars blacks sit alongside whites and a few blacks are gradually moving into white suburbs.

It is vastly different from South Africa but discrimination is still practised to an unacceptable level in the eyes of the international community.

EDITORIAL PLEADS FOR END TO BLOODSHED

Windhoek WINDHOEK OBSERVER in English 6 Dec 80 p 20

[Editorial: "Growing Hysteria"]

[Text]

There is growing hysteria about the proposed pre-implementation conference agreed to by the South African Government and the United Nations Secretary General, Dr. Kurt Waldheim. The hysteria follows unwaveringly the pattern of the past -- every participant in the political circus claiming that his opposing counterpart has deviated from the modalities agreed to.

Why a pre-implementation conference has to take place is beyond the understanding of even the average-minded human being who is acquainted with the situation in South West Africa. The first and foremost imperative is an end to the bloodshed in the north, and this can only be achieved by means of a ceasefire. Termination of hostilities can only be decided by the warring parties, those being South Africa and SWAPO. That is the prerequisite to the entire effort to bring, after a period of 61 years, South West Africa finally to the objective of political stability and independence.

The most unbelievable political circus has erupted because South Africa, as a face-saving measure, claims that an all-party conference is to take place. She knows that no political party with self-respect will sit at that proposed conference under the auspices of the Pretoria Government. No party -- and that includes the Democratic Turnhalle Alliance -- wants to be labelled a stooge of South Africa. South Africa knows it, and is therefore well aware of the fact that the whole exercise is an abortion.

What then is going on? Is it another delaying trick? Where must this end, for there is an immense task ahead for this country?

The most formidable tenet of this job which awaits us is to bring about a spirit of brotherhood and co-operation among a population, fragmented and callously disregarded in the past. It is a task which is virtually insurmountable, for we are a poor country and not endowed with those riches about which some seem to trumpet to the world.

We must stop playing tunes for the various occasions, stop the political lies, and we must do something. If South Africa does not want SWAPO to be a participant in an election, then say so, rise to the occasion, take up arms and exterminate SWAPO entirely whereby, of course, potential disaster will be invited, because an extermination order such as that, would lead to one or other international reaction.

If she is serious about SWAPO, let us start by putting an end to the miserable bloodletting, about which the people in Windhoek and elsewhere in the country know nothing, for who feels for the poor tribesmen being shot to shreds in a murderous orgy!

FORMER SWAPO LEADER IS GIVEN FREEDOM

Windhoek WINDHOEK OBSERVER in English 6 Dec 80 p 29A

[Text]

WINDHOEK:

The 'Rudolf Hess of South West Africa', Mr. Axel Johannes, 33, bade farewell to South West Africa on Wednesday night. Tears glistened in the eyes of the former SWAPO office-bearer who had been restricted to his house during the last months of his stay in the country.

The man, who had intermittently been imprisoned since 1964, showed no bitterness and, in fact, spoke in warm terms about the advice the Security Police officer had given him.

"He told me: 'Look, you remain restricted as long as you are on a South West African Airways Boeing, but the moment you set foot on ground at Frankfurt Airport in West Germany for a connecting flight to London, the ban on you is lifted' ". Mr. Johannes smilingly related.

• Mr. Johannes was first arrested in 1964 when he was the Secretary for SWAPO's Youth League.

• His next arrest came in 1966, and he was held from December of that year until May of 1967.

• He was then again 'laid in chains' (jestingly said) in 1973 and held for a number of weeks.

• In 1974 he again went to prison from January until September of that year.

• But it was in 1975 that his longest term of imprisonment started. He was subpoenaed by the State to appear as a witness at the trial of two men who had been accused of complicity in the assassination of Mr. Filemon Elifas, the Chief Minister at the time of the Ovambo-speaking region. Mr. Johannes entered the witness box and refused to say anything. He was given two years.

• His next arrest came in 1978 just after Mr. Clemens Kapuno was assassinated. He was released after a while, but re-arrested and held until October of 1978.

• In February of 1979, he was again arrested, but released after a short while in detention.

• In April 1979 he was arrested and held until July of that year.

• It was after this last arrest that he was restricted to house arrest.

Mr. Johannes, an indefatigable character, applied for leave to go abroad to further his studies at a London university. He said he was delighted when informed by the authorities that he could go.

In London, he plans to study history and economics.

HOUGH ANNOUNCES DELEGATION COMPOSITION

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 17 Dec 80 p 2

[Text]

WINDHOEK: The Administrator General of SWA, Mr Danie Hough, has announced the composition of the SWA delegation to attend pre-implementation talks on the Territory scheduled for next month.

The delegation would consist of at least 26 delegates.

Political groups omitted but who wished to attend the talks would be entitled to do so.

Mr Hough said in a statement issued in Windhoek there was continuous consultation between him and Pretoria on the venue for the conference.

Final deliberations about the venue were taking place and an announcement by the South African Foreign Minister, Mr Pik Botha, was expected soon.

Mr Hough said he had, after serious deliberation, decided to use proven support at the SWA political polls as a criterion in the compilation of the delegation.

The current composition of the SWA National Assembly, elected in a one man, one vote election was a good norm, he said.

But, because Swapo — a participant in the proposed conference — had never been put to the test, he regarded it as unfair to omit political parties or groups in the Territory who had not taken part in the 1978 elections.

He said these parties were in exactly the same position as Swapo and it had been decided to give them the opportunity to attend.

Mr Hough consulted with a number of political parties and groups in the Territory at the beginning of the month to sound them out on the talks, as proposed by the United Nations Secretary-General, Dr Kurt Waldheim, in his latest report.

Mr Hough said the number of delegates allotted to each party had been decided on the basis of their relative support at the polls.

He said the Swapo Democrats, The Namibia National Front, the National Independence Party and the Herstigte Nasionale Party had indicated during consultations that they were not interested in attending the pre-implementation talks.

The following parties will now be invited to attend the talks: the ruling Democratic Turnhalle Alliance (14 delegates), the main opposition in the National Assembly, Aktur (three delegates), the Namibia Christian Democratic Party, the Liberation Front and the Liberal Party (two each), the Nudo Progressive Party of Namibia, the Namibia Peoples Liberation Front and the Federal Party (one each).

"The Administrator General has also decided that requests by political parties who wish to take in part in the proposed conference will be considered on merit," the statement said.

Observers in Windhoek said it would now be up to the different parties to announce their individual delegates.

The conference is scheduled to start on January 7. — Sapa

SWAPO BLAMED IN SUPERMARKET BOMB ATTACK

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 12 Dec 80 p 6

[Text]

TWO OWAMBOS were killed and twelve other people injured on Wednesday when a bomb exploded in a supermarket five kilometres south of Ondangwa, an official of the Owambo Administration made known yesterday afternoon late.

The names of the dead and injured have not been released as yet and the spokesman said that three of the injured were in hospital in a serious condition.

The two dead persons were cashiers at tills at the check-out points of the supermarket and as far as could be established the bomb had been placed between the two tills.

It was not known yet what type of explosives had been used. The supermarket belonged to Mr Thomas Phillipus, an Owambo businessman, who was killed by Swapo terrorists last year.

Officials at Oshakati have said that Swapo terrorists were responsible for the explosion which rocked the supermarket at 9 am on Wednesday morning.

Commenting on the incident, yesterday afternoon, the Chairman of the Owambo Executive Committee, Pastor Cornelius Ndjoba said that this type of violence by Swapo would not contribute anything to the independence process in the Territory.

According to political observers in Windhoek, the explosion in the crowded supermarket might be an attempt by Swapo to draw attention to its presence in the Territory. Swapo had, in the past, often pulled off spectacular acts of terrorism during or just before important talks on the future of the Territory.

It was felt that the latest incident might be an attempt by Swapo to establish the impression that it was a force to be reckoned with in SWA before the proposed multi-party conference in January on the settlement issue.

Earlier this week, Swapo officials at a press conference in London said that the organisation could not be expected to lay down arms before such a conference had to take place.

CAPRIVIAN EXILES MAY RETURN SEEKING INDEPENDENCE

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 19 Dec 80 pp 4-5

[Article by David Pieters]

[Text] Nineteen of the 24 Canu members who fled from Zambia where Swapo has launched a campaign against Caprivians following the expulsion of Canu leader Mishake Muyongo, former Vice-President of Swapo from the Central Committee.

GROWING numbers of Swapo-Canu members returning to Caprivi from exile have pledged themselves to put Caprivi on to the road of total and seperate independence from SWA.

This emerged in interviews newsmen had with 24 returned Caprivian exiles.

The newsmen were taken by the authorities to Caprivi to do the interviews.

The 24 exiled Caprivians fled Zambia when Swapo initiated its campaign against Canu. The Canu leader and former Vice-President of Swapo, Misheke Myongo, was expelled from Swapo in July.

The group of 24 which includes three women and four children made use of the AG's amnesty proclamation and fled from various stations in Zambia to Eastern Caprivi about two weeks ago.

This brings the total number of Swapo dissidents who have deserted the party from 12 to 36 in two weeks.

There are reported to be approximately 1 000 Swapo dissidents allegedly languishing in jails and refugee centres in Zambia and southern Angola, most of whom are Canu members.

There are an estimated 2 000 Caprivians outside SWA engaged in the "liberation" movement.

Most of the group of 24 are trained intelligensia who have been educated and worked in medical, teaching and administrative posts at various centres.

Most of the dissidents are Canu members who left the country about five years ago to join Swapo, although some had been in exile for more than 10 years.

Swapo and Canu merged in 1964 in an armed effort to oust SA from the Territory.

Returning Canu members are all loyal supporters of Misheke Myongo who regard the expulsion of their leader from Swapo and his deposition as Vice-President of the movement as an act nullifying the 16-year-old accord between the two parties.

Misheke Myongo and eight other Canu officials were expelled from Swapo in July following allegations that the Caprivians were "engaged in counter-revolutionary activities aimed at dismembering Namibia's national integrity."

Canu is reported to have disbanded in 1972.

The latest group of returning exiles repeated Press reports carried in August about large scale discrimination against and extermination of Canu and Caprivian speaking Swapo members after the split between Canu and Swapo within Swapo's central committee had broken the surface in July.

Allegations were made by the dissidents that Swapo was dominated by the Ovambo speakers, in particular the Kwanyama which is the largest Ovambo tribal group.

It was said that the Ovambo- majority within Swapo feared that the Caprivians would rise to leading positions within the party because of their educational predispositions and ability to master English at an early age.

Newsmen were told of various examples where Caprivians were discriminated against in the interest of the formation of an Owambo elite within the ranks of Swapo.

All of the dissidents spoken to were unanimous in their hatred of Swapo as a result of alleged extermination of Caprivians outside SWA, and also in their bitterness towards the Owambo people.

Asked if they hated only Swapo-oriented Owambo's or all Owambo's as a result of their experiences in Zambia and southern Angola, several of the returned exiles replied: "There is no difference between Swapo and the Owambo's."

Most of the spokesman for the recently returned dissident group insisted that Canu wanted nothing to do with SWA as a whole and after consulting with tribal leaders in the Caprivi, would embark on a policy that would lead Caprivi to a separate and sovereign independence on its own.

The reason offered was that Caprivi had little in common with the rest of SWA along historical, social, cultural and political lines.

Neither were they interested in settling anywhere in SWA other than the Caprivi where they said they would practice the skills they had acquired while in exile.

The officer commanding the security forces in the Caprivi, Commandant Gert Opperman, said the Defence Force had received information that between 300 and 400 Caprivians were being detained in Swapo concentration camps, a large number were languishing in Zambian jails and about 275 were being kept in a UN refugee camp just outside Lusaka, the Zambian capital.

The camp is under the aegis of the UN High Commissioner for refugees.

Most of the latest group of exiles returning to Caprivi had studied at the Lusaka Institute and other centres on Swapo's ticket.

According to an army spokesman another 100 returning Carpivian exiles are expected to arrive at Katima Mulilo before Christmas.

The exiles already returned expressed their fear for the lives of their brothers and sisters in Zambia and elsewhere and have called upon the people of Caprivi to apply themselves to the task of achieving the release of all those Caprivians still in the hands of Swapo.

ECONOMIC PERFORMANCE TOPS OFFICIAL FIGURES

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 19 Dec 80 p 20

[Article by Leon Kok, editor]

[Text]

THE SWA Finance Department has just put out some statistics on the local economy. In this article Advertiser Editor LEON KOK analyses these figures and gives his interpretation of the situation. Some might conclude that there is much to be desired. That may be so. The writer however concludes that Southwesters are well off, considering the situation elsewhere on the African continent.

ECONOMIC activity in SWA has more than trebled in real terms during the past decade.

This emerges from figures just released by the SWA Department of Finance.

The Department admits that the figures are only approximate but nevertheless says that they are about the best record that exists.

The gross domestic product (GDP) rose from R321m in 1970 to R1,2b last year.

These figures show a quadrupling in money terms but if inflation is taken into account the GDP probably trebled.

The top contributor to the GDP last year was minign at 49 percent followed by agriculture, forestry and fishing at 9,6 percent.

The afforementioned figures exclude Walvis Bay's economic activities.

The growth over the past decade is actually phenomenal considering the political uncertainty faced by the Territory, the recessionary conditions during a good part of the seventies and the collapse of the fishing industry.

It must also be remembered that SWA is one of a mere 20 states in Africa that has shown a positive economic growth rate since 1974; the other 30 have all experienced an economic decline.

The average per capita national product of R1 200 in SWA is way above the African continent's estimated average of R317. Twenty of the world's poorest nations are in Africa.

A breakdown of the major contributors to the GDP last year shows mining R586m, agriculture, forestry and fishing R116m, general government R99m, finance, insurance, real estate and business services R86m, wholesale and retail trade, catering and accommodation R[illegible]m, transport, storage and communication R76m and manufacturing R57m.

Much has been said about the "lack" of new investment in SWA, but the view is really fallacious: gross domestic fixed investment last year was an estimated R360m.

True, the level was probably down on 1978, but this can probably be ascribed to the completion of the Rössing Mine and the drop in profitability of the CDM diamond mines.

Against this there was a sharp increase in government capital spending while statistics show a sharp rise in property development. This has been carried through to the current year.

The Finance Department says that the smaller mining companies can in all probability make a much larger contribution to the GDP and the creation of employment opportunities in the near future. A major obstacle at this stage is that several companies are not making use of exploitation rights in their possession. A turn in the political tide however could make all the difference.

The mining sector accounted for R55m of the country's gross domestic fixed investment in 1979 while the increase in inventories amounted to R20m. The fixed investment in 1979 showed a decline of some 47 percent compared to 1978 which is largely attributable to the levelling off in capital development at Rössing.

Agriculture's contribution to the GDP rose from R112m in 1978 to R116,3m in 1979.

Gross domestic fixed investment in this sector amounted to R21m in 1979, an increase of 4,3 percent compared with the previous year.

The Finance Department remarks that the future of the cattle industry seems more promising but expresses alarm about the decline in karakul prices.

"As a whole this sector still has considerable unexploited potential, and especially in the undeveloped parts of the country an attempt at development should show result and a contribution can be made by creating job opportunities," it says.

The general government contributed about R98m to the GDP in 1979. Its share was about 8 percent. The figure in 1978 was R81m.

The general government's share in the total gross domestic fixed investment is estimated at 44 percent.

Finance, insurance, real estate and business services contributed about R85m to the GDP last year and in real terms this represents a growth rate of about 15 percent. General and commercial banks in SWA contributed an estimated R11,7m or 13,6 percent to this sector's product.

Interesting figures emerge from the wholesale and retail trade, catering and accommodation. Total contribution to the GDP was R79,4m compared to R74,4m previously. Total net profit was R28m, total turnover R755m and investment R6,1m.

The retail trade derived a R10m profit out of a R241m turnover, the wholesale trade R12,8m (R342,7m), motor vehicle trade and repair services R4,4m (R149,7m), accommodation R600 000 (R16,5m) and catering services R200 000 (R4,5m).

Average monthly wholesale sales in the year to July 1980 were a phenomonal 39 percent up on the previous year an dare now probably levelling off.

Retail sales have also increased over the same period but not to the same extent. Average montly retail sales in the year to July 1980 jumped 12 percent.

Inflation considered, retail sales have probably dropped slightly in real terms.

New motor vehicle sales in the first quarter of this year were 16 percent up on the corresponding period last year. Emphasis was mainly on commercial vehicles: new commercial vehicles licensed jumped by 21 percent while new motor cars licesned dropped by 1,3 percent.

Gloom however should not be read into the new motor car figure as the level of sales both last year and this year has been exceptionally high and this will probably hold for the time being.

The strenght of the new car market is perhaps also reflected in that the volume of used vehicles registered during the first quarter of this year dropped 17 percent.

Significantly, the Finance Department notes that while the manufacturing sector in SWA is small, it is becoming increasingly obvious that the country cannot afford to neglect it, particularly from the point of view of processing local products and creating new employment opportunities.

The main obstacles to growth in the manufacturing sector are the small local population, the thinly spread population, the greater part of the population being low in purchasing power, limited availability of qualified manpower, raw materials, water and power, high transport costs and great distances to the SA and other foreign merkets.

The manufacturing sector's contribution to the GDP is currently R58m; a mere 5 percent compared to the figure of 23 percent in SA and 70 percent plus in some major industrialised countries.

Last year gross domestic fixed investment in manufacturing totalled R9,3m constituted as follows: machinery and equipment R6,0 m, buildings R1,9m, transport equipment R1,1m and construction works R300 000.

There should be a considerable increase on these figures for the current year, primarily due to the increased activity of Enok in this sector. One prime example is the erection of the R15m meat factory at Gobabis.

The construction sector's contribution to the GDP is still a paltry R33m or 3 percent. Total gross domestic investment in this sector last year was a mere R6,7m with R3,9 m being domestic fixed investment and R2,9 m being inventories.

What about 1980?

The Finance Department gives little detail but it can be safely assumed that the economic situation will be reflected as considerably bouyant.

Diamonds and fishing are down but most other sectors are well up. Besides, the economy was given a terrific shot in the arm this year by the substantially increased public spending, of which a considerable proportion was directed into capital development.

I would put the GDP for the current year at between R1,4b and R1,6b which is no mean feature.

Next year could even be better!

ORGANIZATION PROJECTS LOWER DIAMOND SALES

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 12 Dec 80 p 24

[Text]

THE Central Selling Organisation (CSO) 1980 diamond sales figures, due in January, will fall slightly from 1979's R2,19 000 million total, analysts and industry sources said.

They forecast sales for the second half of this year will be below both the first half's R1,27 000 million and last year's second half total of R1,11 000 million.

Industry sources said although sales for the first half of 1980 increased 17 percent over the same 1979 period, demand for diamonds has fallen off considerably since then, and in addition sales are often lower in the second half of the year.

The worldwide recession in the jewellery trade and its currently high inventories have meant appreciably lower demand for stones of less than one carat, particularly for diamonds under 0,80 carats.

Results of recent diamond "sights", where dealers are offered selections of stones which they can either totally accept or reject, have been rather poor, the sources said.

Investment demand for larger stones over one carat was fairly strong earlier this year but has dwindled recently, and will not be sufficient to offset falling sales of jewellery stones, the analysts said.

They forecast second half 1980 CSO sales of around R850 to R900 000 m, making around R2, 13 000 m for the year, and most said they did not expect a drop of more than 10 percent from the 1979 total.

One analysts said total 1980 sales may show a slight increase over the previous year in value terms after price increases earlier this year, but he expects lower volume sales, and a slight fall in second half sales compared with the first half.

The analysts said although the expected fall in second half CSO sales will adversley affect De Beers' earnings, the company's strong cash position and its increasing non-diamond interests should enable it to discount the diamond sales to some extent.

In the six months to June 30, De Beers' pretax profit fell to R539-m from R569,1-m in the same 1979 period, but the interim dividend was raised to 25c from 20c.

Despite the forecasts of lower earnings analysts see De Beers' total 1980 dividend payout around 75 to 80c against 72,5c in 1979, due to its strong financial position.

RUSSIAN AIRCRAFT MAY HAVE CRASHED IN COUNTRY

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 12 Dec 80 p 1

[Article by Gail Visagie]

[Text]

UNITA FORCES in Angola have claimed that they shot down the Russian military transport aircraft which, according to the International Red Cross Committee, had gone astray over SWA.

This morning a spokesman for SADF Headquarters in Pretoria confirmed that it had been approached by the International Committee of the Red Cross to conduct an air search for the missing plane, an Antonov 26 — with five people on board, which had gone astray over SWA.

The aircraft had gone missing on November 7, while flying in the vicinity of Mavinga in Southern Angola. But it was felt that it could have strayed over the SWA border.

The spokesman said that all routine air traffic over the northern area of SWA had been alerted to be on the lookout for the Russian plane.

But according to reliable sources, senior Unita personnel in Paris have revealed that the Antonov 26 had been shot down by Jonas Savimbi's forces in the Cuanda Kubanho province, some 200 kilometres form the SWA border on November 7.

These sources have it that there were three dead, while the pilot, identified as Matlaeb Kola 38, and the Senior Flight Engineer, Ivan Chernietski, 46, had been taken prisoner.

Although only five people were mentioned in the SADF communique, the Paris sources have stated that in addition the Antonov was carrying 40 Black troops, although it was not revealed whether they were MPLA or Swapo, or what their fate had been. It was also not disclosed whether they had suffered any casualties.

According to the senior Unita sources in Paris, ever since Unita had obtained the shoulder-held ground to air missiles, a total of eleven Russian aircraft had been shot down by them. These were three Antonov 26's and eight MI8 transport helicopters.

The Antonov 26 is equipped to carry 40 troops, or 24 stretcher cases and is an ideal aircraft for bushwar, as it can land on very rough fields. The MI8 helicopters — heavy duty carries a crew of five, as well as 32 passengers, or 4 000 kilos of cargo.

IMPORTANCE OF WALVIS BAY AS STRATEGIC PORT OUTLINED

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 19 Dec 80 pp 16-17

[Article by David Pieters]

[Text]

IN THIS article DAVID PIETERS discusses the future of Walvis Bay. He argues that the prospects of the port becoming a US naval base are extremely strong and this will have an important stabilising effect on the sub-continent. The writer's analysis is both thought-provoking and interesting.

THE SUGGESTION by a visiting American academic to SWA that Walvis Bay should be made available as a US naval base in order to secure the Cape sea lanes and the western portion of the sub-continent against further East Bloc expansion comes as no surprise.

Professor Lewis Tamb, who made the suggestion while on a visit to SWA in August as a guest of the Prowa Namibia Foundation, was pre-empted with such speculation more than three years ago by "liberation" circles in the Territory.

Many factors converge on Walvis Bay as a strategic port for the western subcontinent in both a political and an economic context.

Consider the following:

- It is the natural outlet for the Palapwe – Gobabis railway link which is destined to carry Botswana coal and frozen beef processed at Gobabis' new R14 m factory;
- It is the closest import point for US and European manufactures in their competition with Japan and Taiwan for expanded markets on the subcontinent, as well as with SA itself;
- The declaration of Walvis Bay as an internationally recognized duty free port constitutes the most convenient resolution to the contradictory demands of SA and nationalist tendencies in SWA for control of the enclave;
- A strong US presence at Walvis Bay represents an effective compromise between the Western and Eastern Blocs in their struggle for a secure foothold in the area.

In naval terms, the US' presence in Walvis Bay promises to be an ideal factor with which a real balance of sea power could be attained in the Cape Atlantic waters. An inadequate naval force is the one chink in the RSA's armour which nobody could deny exists.

Economic factors such as the planned Kalahari-Walvis railway link and political factors such as strategic control of rival spheres of interest on the subcontinent are inseparable in contemporary international relations.

When the Windhoek Advertiser raised the matter of the Palapwe to Walvis Bay railway link, it was partly moti ated by the desire to see a strong western multinational investment presence establishing itself in the subcontinent's economic structure.

The outcome of the negotiations are of course pending, but it was pointed out that SWA politicians have a crucial role to play in the general run of these negotiations, and Mr Mudge's visit to Europe this month should not only be interpreted as a trip to canvass wider political recognition, but also to stimulate financial interests in projects such as the Palapwe to Walvis Bay line.

An effective superpower presence in Walvis Bay will contribute enormously to the stabilization of the externally anchoved disruptive forces contesting with one another to get a foothold in SWA.

As a spin off, such a development will add impetus to those political forces in SWA that are oriented to the centre. This is of vital importance if real social progress is to be achieved and a swing either way too far to the right or to the left, is to be obstructed.

An independent SWA regime, no matter be it DTA or Swapo, could not tolerate SA's continued stranglehold on our only viable port. Although it does not figure prominently as a political issue at the moment, the Walvis Bay question promises to rank as a major vote catcher or repellant in the not too distant future.

At the same time, the ominous Stalinization within Swapo augers ill for a non-aligned Walvis Bay, the international entrance through which economic commodities and political influences are bound to enter an independant SWA.

Astute political observers adopted a very sceptical attitude last year to the big fuss made about the US 'spy plane' scandal, realizing that far from being enemies, the US and SA were fundamentally so well aligned in terms of their mutual political and economic interests, that to contemplate military enmity between them was nonsensical to say the least.

The idea thrust into the fore now that a US naval base might be established at Walvis Bay makes far more sense.

Such a development would inject a powerful and much needed dose of detatchment from SA if our constitutional independence is to have any semblance of meaningfulness.

At the same time it would umbrella SWA under a tolerant Uncle Sam while balancing international military power on the subcontinent.

ECONOMIC CONDITION OF COUNTRY DISCUSSED IN NATIONAL ASSEMBLY

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 5 Dec 80 p 4

[Text]

WINDHOEK: SWA was economically dependent on the formation of a constellation of Southern African states, the chairman of the Territory's Council of Ministers, Mr Dirk Mudge, said in the National Assembly.

Replying during the Additional Budget debate, Mr Mudge said that at present, SWA could not do without financial aid from South Africa and that economic independence for the Territory was a "far-fetched" thought.

But it was, nevertheless, preposterous to try and make out as if things on the economic front were so bad in SWA as they had been made out to be by Opposition members, he added.

An Opposition member, Mr Percy Niehaus of Aktur, had expressed concern about the large additional amounts of money being appropriated by the Central Government for certain projects, saying that this could not augur well for the future of the country.

Mr Niehaus, who claimed to be the "father of this whole independence idea, said that SWA would have to achieve economic stability before it could attain political independence.

He was pessimistic about the Territory's economic future, he added.

"If we are not careful we are going to land ourselves in the same situation as other African states who have to rely on handouts from the west."

Mr Niehaus urged the Central Government to curb its expenditure, adding that a sound economy was the most attractive way in which to attract foreign investment — "something which this country really needs."

The additional R8,5m budget was unanimously approved by the House.

The House also adopted by majority vote a National Education Bill providing for the establishment of a National Education Council and an independent Examination Board for the Territory.

The Bill aims to make education in the Territory free and compulsory for all children between the ages of six and 16 years.

Also adopted by majority vote was a motion calling on the AG to investigate the drafting of legislation which will provide for a Bill of Human Rights, a constitutional court and the appointment of an ombudsman to safeguard the rights of the Territory's people.

A motion by the Namibia Christian Democratic Party leader, Mr Hans Röhr, calling on the AG to nullify the results of the recent second-tier election for a Kavango Representative Authority, was rejected by majority vote.

Mr Röhr, whose party managed to win a seat in the Kavango Legislative Assembly, had alleged that his party was intimidated during last months election by officials of the territory's ruling DTA which swept the ethnic elections.

The Assembly adjourned until February 24 next year. — Sapa

SWAPO DESCRIBES HOW IT WOULD RULE COUNTRY

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 11 Dec 80 p 4

[Text]

LONDON: Swapo this week spelt out how it would rule SWA should it come to power and declared that the Territory's military and Police forces would be disbanded immediately.

The guerrilla movement would also embark on an overhaul of the Public Service to "reflect the interests of the Namibian peoples as a whole."

But in an interview with Swapo, Mr Moses Garoeb, Swapo's administrative secretary, sought to assure Whites that they had a future in a Swapo-ruled SWA.

And he indicated that a Swapo government would adopt a pragmatic approach towards South Africa and would not provide a springboard for guerrilla attacks against the Republic.

Mr Garoeb said Whites should have no fears of Swapo rule and would have a "good future if they realise that it cannot be based on privilege or the colour of a person's skin.

"This talk of Swapo's President (Mr Sam Nujoma) being a marxist makes me mad," he added.

"Remember Robert Mugabe was the reincarnation of Marx, Lening and the devil all in one to the Whites in Zimbabwe and overseas. But today they realise he is a practical and sensible man.

"The problem with the Whites in Namibia is that they don't know Mr Nujoma and haven't tried to know him. Hence all this nonsense about his image. The Whites I am sure will be surprised at what kind of man he is."

Mr Garoeb made it clear Swapo will disband the SWA Territorial army and the Police immediately the movement assumes power.

"The Police it goes without saying must be totally dismantled. We are going to have a new force that understands the situation and not these damned Boers.

"Obviously we recognise that there are some who are good in the present setup and that they will recognise the new situation and say I'm a native of this land and I want to play my part."

"It will be a very tiny element but no matter how tiny we will ensure that they play their role."

"But the brutal and sadistic Boer Police that I know as a Black man we will of course get rid of."

Mr Garoeb said there was no question of integrating Swapo's guerrilla forces with the SWA Territorial Army to form a new national army.

"A Swapo Government will make sure they (the SWA Territorial Army) are immediately disarmed and dismantled — they are no different to the Selous Scouts that were fighting in Rhodesia and are absolutely irrelevant."

Mr Garoeb said Swapo's policy on the public service was that it would have to be dismantled but experience elsewhere in Africa had shown that the restructuring to reflect the new order would have to be done gradually.

Swapo believed some 60 percent of Whites in the service would leave after the movement came to power, and while fighting the guerrilla war it had also trained people to take over in the public service and in other spheres to fill such a vacuum.

"The Civil Service must be run by Namibians for Namibians," said Mr Garoeb. "The present civil service is based on racialism and we cannot have that — it must be changed."

On South Africa, Mr Garoeb said Swapo realised SWA Namibia's Economy was at present heavily intelocked with the Republic — the Railway: were a good example — and the movement accepted that no breaks could be contemplated overnight.

But, he said, Swapo would join efforts by Black States in Southern Africa to make themselves economically independent of the Republic.

Mr Garoeb was questioned whether a Swapo Government would provide a springboard for the banned African National Congress to launch a guerrilla attack against South Africa.

"We will support the ANC for the liberation of South Africa, but militarily I think it would be unrealistic for us to give support to the ANC," he replied.

"Not so much because we wouldn't want to do it, but simply for reasons of terrain it would not really be possible for them to fight from Namibia."

"But we will champion their cause diplomaticaly and morally in the international forums that will become available to us.

If there are refugees from South Africa they will get asylum and so on."

Mr Garoeb left London early today after heading a senior Swapo delegation in two days of intensive talks with British political, church and trade union leaders. — Sapa

SWAPO GUERRILLAS WILL REMAIN ARMED

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 10 Dec 80 p 3

[Text]

LONDON: Swapo leaders made it clear yesterday that the position of their forces inside SWA after a ceasefire had not been finalised — and said guerrillas operating inside the territory would remain armed and would not leave.

"The UN plan provides for confinement to bases — but we do not accept being disarmed or being escorted out of the country, Swapo's Administrative Secretary, Mr Moses Garoeb, told a press conference here.

A senior Swapo official, Mr Hage Geingob, backed this up when he said proposals for a demiliterised zone on the SWA border did not mention what would happen to Swapo forces on the ground inside SWA.

Therefore the original idea of bases is still there. We are saying we will not be escorted out — so the question of bases, assembly points, or whatever they are called, is still there," he said.

Their statements underlined the major issues that remain to be resolved before the UN plan for independence elections is implemented. Both men said today they did not know whether this question would be discussed at the proposed pre-implementation conference to be held next month.

Mr Garoeb said Swapo had accepted Maputo as the venue for the conference, scheduled to open on January 7.

He laid down these conditions on which Swapo would attend:

- That its purpose would be to discuss the "mechanics" of implementing the UN plan for independence.
- That there would be only two delegations, Swapo and the South African Government
- That the conference should be chaired by either the UN Secretary-General, Dr Kurt Waldheim, or someone appointed by him.

He said Swapo agreed to the internal SWA parties attending the meeting, but only as part of the South African Delegation.

"These so-called internal leaders are South Africa's creation. The puppets can come, as part of that delegation," he said.

He accused the SA Government of raising new problems by suggesting alternative venues, and predicted that an argument about where the meeting was to take place would last four months.

He pledged that until the plan was implemented, the war would continue.

"Our army will remain intact. If anyone wants to interfere with it, be it the UN or South Africa, then in the words of our president we will shoot first and ask questions later," he said.

"We shall continue the war with the support of the Front Line States. No-one can ask us to stop fighting for our country."

Mr Garoeb said his delegation would raise important issues when it meets Lord Carrington. One would be what Swapo considers to be insufficient pressure from the British Government on South Africa over SWA.

SWAPO OFFICIAL TERMS MEETING WITH UK'S CARRINGTON EXCELLENT

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 11 Dec 80 p 2

[Text]

LONDON: A Swapo delegation met Britain's Foreign Secretary, Lord Carrington, yesterday and came away from the talks with a pledge that the British Government would use its influence to ensure that the pre-implementation conference scheduled to take place in January is not delayed.

Swapo's Administrative Secretary, Mr Moses Garoeb said after the half hour meeting: "We have agreed there is a need to speed up the implementation of the United Nations plan and we have agreed that the conference should take place as scheduled. The whole implementation process should start in March.

"The British Government has promised they will do everything in their power to ensure this and to ensure that South Africa comes to the conference."

The Swapo Delegation met the Foreign Office Under-Secretary, Mr Richard Luce, for 45 minutes before talking with Lord Carrington.

Mr Garoeb described the meetings as "excellent -much better than we expected."

He said general agreement had been reached on what he termed "other matters of mutual interest"

Mr Garoeb told a press conference on Tuesday that he would ask the British Government to increase pressure on South Africa to enpure Pretoria's compliance with the UN-plan.

After yesterday's meeting he appeared satisfied that this would be done.

SWAPO WILL BE UP TO OLD TRICKS, CLAIMS MUDGE

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 17 Dec 80 p 2

[Text]

WINDHOEK: The Chairman of SWA's ruling DTA, Mr Dirk Mudge, said yesterday his party would attend next months all-party conference on SWA as members of the National Assembly.

Speaking briefly to newsmen on his return to the Territory after a week-long overseas visit, Mr Mudge said whether Swapo liked it or not, the DTA would be taking part in the pre-implementation conference.

Mr Mudge said he was convinced Swapo would try and get up to its "usual tricks" at the conference, for which a venue has not yet been decided on.

He did not elaborate, but added that Swapo would probably send a low-key delegation to the talks, claiming that its leaders ran a security risk" by being there.

Mr Mudge reiterated his appeal to the UN and the Western governments involved in bringing SWA to nationhood to give a clear demonstration of impartiality before the conference.

The DTA felt that all parties should be accorded equal status at the conference, otherwise the talks would be an outright failure right from the outset.

Referring to the eight-day visit to Europe by a six-man DTA delegation last week, Mr Mudge said the team had generally been well received by the various parties it had spoken to, including the British Foreign Secretary, Lord Carrington.

During the shuttle, the DTA had had a good opportunity to put its case across at a series of press conferences and at meetings with various political figures in West Germany and Britain.

"We informed them that the election campaign in the Territory was already underway and that there was no need for them to be concerned about fighting for independence for SWA.

"We said independence for the Territory was a foregone conclusion and that it had already been accepted by all the parties," Mr Mudge said.

The only issue that still had to be resolved was how independence for the territory was attained.

"Swapo advocates violence but we believe in attaining independence through peaceful and democratic means," Mr Mudge said. — Sapa

FEDERAL PARTY URGES LEADERS TO ATTEND TALKS

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 12 Dec 80 p 11

[Text]

THE FEDERAL Party of SWA has urged all political parties to attend the UN proposed all party talks next month.

In a statement issued in Windhoek by the party's Executive yesterday, the FP says that the proposed talks are a gesture towards reconciling mutual mistrust which constitutes the main obstacle to the implementation of UN resolution 435 of 1978.

Despite the FP's lack of enthusiasm and certain reservations it had about the forthcoming talks, it was nevertheless important to attend the talks which are to clear the way for free and fair elections and internationally recognized independence for the Territory.

The FP regards as first priority the reaching of a settlement which should be placed before selfish party interests to jeopardize the talks.

The statement continues: "Without peace, the destruction of our country and people will continue, violence and bloodshed will increase, hatred will grow, and justice will disappear."

The FP rejects Swapo's stance that all internal parties are puppets of the SA regime.

It also rejects the DTA's unfavourable attitude towards the smaller internal political parties, especially those who have not participated in the National Assembly.

The statement goes on to say that for the past two years, both the SA Government and the DTA have campaigned for internal parties, including those not Turnhalle-oriented, to be granted status equal to that enjoyed by Swapo. This move had been apparently motivated by the desire to stimulate the formation of a powerful third force inside the Territory.

It was only after the DTA had suffered setbacks in certain ethnic elections held recently, that it was now campaigning for equal status between Swapo and the bigger parties inside the National Assembly only, the FP says in its statement.

It goes on to say that "the real test for all parties and alliances is the election along the lines of Resolution 435 and no elections preceding those."

The FP's reservations concerning attempts by some internal parties to others in terms status, relates to the fact that the AG will have the prerogative in inviting internal parties to attend the January talks.

The FP also states that the attendance of the internal parties as part of the AG's delegation, does not detract from the independent status of those parties, since SA's role has been defined as one of interlocutor between the various parties involved in the talks on SWA.

BRIEFS

SWA SITUATION BEING WATCHED--Windhoek--The Military situation in SWA would be carefully watched in the run-up to a multi-party conference and SWAPO would have to bear the consequences of insurgent action, sources close to the Administrator-General of the territory said yesterday. They were asked to comment on reports that SWAPO's President, Mr Sam Nujoma had referred to the "serious security situation in Southern Africa" and alleged "killer squads" have been trained by Pretoria to assassinate SWAPO leaders. "Political groups in SWA are anxious to attempt to find a settlement around the conference table but until such time as something is achieved the military situation will be carefully watched," sources said. "If SWAPO tries to undermine the multi-party talks with all kinds of tricks it will be held fully responsible and will have to bear the consequences." [Text] [Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 10 Dec 80 p 1]

KALANGULA'S MESSAGE--The first priority for a peaceful democratic settlement in SWA was a Bill of Rights, says the President of the Democratic Turnhalle Alliance. In a Christmas message, Mr P.T. Kalangula said that with the assumption of his office as President of the DTA, he had great hopes of a happy future for the Territory. Expressing his personal ideals, he said that a Bill of Rights was essential. It would guarantee freedom of speech, freedom of religion and freedom of movement for all inhabitants. He believed in the right of everyone to fulfill themselves to the utmost of their capabilities, receiving promotion on merit, regardless of colour, race or religion. Mr Kalangula said that the aim of the country should be to develop one nation with a common pride--a nation in which all radical groups could live together in harmony and understanding. He also expressed the view that because a large percentage of the Territory's population lived in Owambo where there were many children, he felt that a substantial proportion of monies should be set aside for education in Owambo. Touching on the bomb blast which occurred at Oniipa some weeks ago, Mr Kalangula said he deplored this action because "I condemn terrorism of any kind and no one has the right to take the law into their own hands." Because it was the festive season and a time of goodwill, Mr Kalangula said that he wanted to appeal to the public for donations, no matter how small, to be sent to Bishop Dumeni--to enable him to rebuild and continue his good work in printing spiritual texts. [Text] [Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 12 Dec 80 p 4]

ALL-PARTY CONFERENCE VENUE--Maputo--South Africa had suggested Malawi and Mauritius as possible venues for the SWA independence conference scheduled for next month, Mozambican Government sources said yesterday. Last month the Foreign Minister, Mr Joaquim Chissano announced that Mozambique had accepted a United Nations request to hold the conference and said South Africa had agreed to this. But, the sources said, South Africa had turned down Maputo because of internal problems and was suggesting Malawi or Mauritius instead. The official Mozambican Press Agency (AIM) said today South Africa had also turned down Salisbury. SWAPO had rejected Gaborone because of insufficient security arrangements. TERRITORY'S FIRST MILITARY TRAINEES--The Territory's first military trainees will be reporting for compulsory military service between January 6 and 12, 1981, according to Commandant Bill Murray, Liaison Chief of the SWA's Territory Force. Black, Brown and White soldiers of SWA will be getting their basic training at Walvis Bay while further or more advanced training will be given in centres in SWA. He said that it was expected that there would be three intakes of trainees next year, all destined for training in Walvis Bay. Young men from Owambo, the Kavango, the Caprivi and Kaokoland will not be called up at this stage for military training. [Text] [Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 10 Dec 80 p 4]

SWAPO D AT CONFERENCE--Windhoek--The Labour Secretary of the SWAPO Democrats Party Mr Solomon Mifima, said yesterday his party was interested in attending next month's conference on the future of SWA, but not as part of the Administrator General's delegation. "We would be only too happy to attend if the conference is going to produce something conducive to resolving the situation and providing that we are invited by the convenors of the conference," Mr Mifima told Sapa in Windhoek. He was reacting to a statement by the Administrator General, Mr Danie Hough, that SWAPO D would not be represented in the SWA delegation to multi-party conference because it was not interested in going. "We did not say we were not interested in going. Nor did we refuse to attend the conference," Mr Mifima said. "We merely said that we did not want to be included as part of the Administrator General's delegation," which, he said, was the delegation of a "colonial power which we are busy fighting against." He hoped the UN, which is sponsoring the conference, would invite the party as an independent participant. The SWA representatives at the Geneva talks will be part of the South African delegation, headed by the Administrator General.--Sapa [Text] [Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 18 Dec 80 p 7]

SWAPO PROTEST--About 2,000 SWAPO supporters gathered in the Katutura township on the outskirts of Windhoek yesterday to protest against compulsory military training in SWA. With the exception of a few drunks and, possibly, early festive season revellers, the demonstration, which was in the form of an open-air meeting, took place in a congenial and incident-free atmosphere. Members of the so-called SWAPO "police," brandishing bright-coloured batons and bows and arrows--one even had a motor car silencer chained around his neck "to silence trouble-makers,"--kept the chanting crowd in check, while camouflage-uninformed policemen occasionally [sic] patrolled the perimeter of the open field where the meeting was held. There were about six speeches--all by members of SWAPO's Youth League--but few of the speakers confined themselves to the question of military conscription. Most of them dedicated their speeches to the recent ethnic, second-tier elections in the territory, which they dubbed as a ploy by the South African "boere" to divide and rule the SWA. Those who did speak about compulsory national service, which was only recently introduced to the territory, referred to it as an "evil trick" by South Africa. [Text] [Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 15 Dec 80 p 1]

MILITARY SERVICE BOYCOTT--The United Namibia People Party has called for a total boycott of compulsory military service--to be introduced in the Territory next year. In a statement released to the press by the Party's Department of Information and Publicity, the UNPP states that after evaluating the subject of military conscription, it has come to the conclusion that this would only cause confusion among the people of the Territory and result in "untold political resistance and a heavy exodus." "We see no sense why our children should be forced to join the Army when our country is still a colonial subject." The Party felt that there were more important things that had to be attended to, such as the state of unemployment. [Text] [Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 12 Dec 80 p 2]

ABSENTEE LANDLORDS NOT WANTED--The National Unity Democratic Organisation rejects the practice that Blacks in SWA are not able to obtain land, but that land not occupied here is sold to foreigners. In a statement released to the Press this week by Nudo's Deputy Secretary for Foreign Affairs, Mr Kaimbire Tjamuaha, Nudo said that it was high time that the untenable practice of land being sold to absentee landlords who in turn convert this land into game farms, whilst thousands of Black people have no land, was stopped. "Whilst many Blacks have to live in huts and pondokkies and overcrowded reserves, the Whites live in comfort. Now the land that is not occupied by Whites is sold to foreigners who have no link (except their pocketbooks) with this country. "We are not trying to deny property rights to anyone. But the interests of the people of SWA should come first. We have the ludicrous situation that although it is now possible for a Black to buy land anywhere, he not only has to compete with the local Whites, but also with foreigners who come here with money bags." Nudo was all for investment in the country "but certainly not to the detriment of the people of the Territory." [Text] [Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 5 Dec 80 p 4]

WHITES URGED TO STAY--Windhoek--A member of the SWA Ministers' Council, Dr Ben Africa, urged the Territory's Whites to stay and help build a peaceful future for SWA. Speaking during the Additional Budget debate, Dr Africa, who is Vice-President of the ruling DTA, said the DTA did not want to see what happened with the Whites in Zimbabwe occur in SWA. The Black and Brown people of the Territory realised the importance of the Whites and were willing to cooperate with them on all levels. The Black also realised that most whites had come to accept SWA as their home and many of them had no other fatherland, Dr Africa said. "The Whites are part of this Territory and they cannot be done without. So let's give them the assurance that we can live together in peace and harmony," he added.--Sapa [Text] [Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 5 Dec 80 p 11]

DEFENCE FORCE CONSCRIPTION--Windhoek--SWA could not remain militarily dependent on South Africa forever and that is why conscription had to be introduced in the Territory, a member of the SWA Ministers' Council, Dr Ben Africa, said in the National Assembly this week. Speaking during the Additional Budget debate, Dr Africa, who is also Vice-President of the Territory's ruling DTA said SWA needed to be able to defend its own borders. In order to achieve this objective, the Territory needed a powerful defence force whose members were loyal and patriotic to the nation. Dr Africa said the introduction of national service had met with criticism from some quarters, but the reasons for rejecting it were completely unfounded.--Sapa [Text] [Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 5 Dec 80 p 11]

STATISTICS ON RISING FEDERAL PAYROLL PROVIDED

Lagos BUSINESS TIMES in English 2 Dec 80 p 1

[Article by Onyema Ugochuku]

[Text] The payroll of the Federal Government will rise substantially in 1981, if President Shehu Shagari's budget proposals are passed unamended. The amount proposed for salaries is N1052.03 million, as against N584.5 million for the nine months of fiscal 1980.

The amount will cover the salaries of unspecified numbers of officers, including elected officials, Federal civil servants, police officers, judges, and members of various national commissions.

The number of persons on the Federal payroll excluding members of the armed forces, is proposed to increase by 77,658 in 1981, with the police force accounting for the bulk of the increase.

As in previous years, the Ministry of Defence will maintain the largest payroll. The allocation for this in 1981 is N397.2 million. Out of this, N19.6 million is for the payment of salaries of officers and men of the Air Force, N18.4 million for the officers and men of the Navy, and N318.9 million for those of the Nigerian Army.

The balance of N40.3 million will cover the salaries of 24,953 other employees of the ministry.

The Nigerian Police Force follows with an allocation of N273.2 million for salaries. The strength of the force is proposed to increase by 50,401 persons to 145,720 during 1981. The expansion of the force, in addition to other substantial allocations for purchase of equipment and other materials, reflects presumably the government's concern at the high crime rate in the country.

The emphasis on security appears to be confirmed by allocation to the Ministry of Internal Affairs which operates the country's prisons. For salaries, the ministry will spend N45.2 million in 1981--the third biggest allocation for this purpose. The number of persons covered by this amount is proposed to rise from 30,094 in 1980 to 33,205 in 1981.

The other outstanding payrolls belong to the Ministries of Works and Finance, the Presidency, the Ministries of Education, External Affairs and Agriculture.

The Ministry of Works is to increase the number of persons employed from 20,631 to 22,530 and will pay out 42.4 million in salaries.

The Ministry of Finance, which includes the Department of Customs and Excise will employ 25,947 persons as against 24,260 in 1980 and will pay ₦36.6 million as their salaries, while the Presidency incorporating with the executive Office of the Head of the Civil Service and Steel Development Department, etc., will pay ₦35.0 million to 24,653 employees.

The Ministry of Education is to pay ₦29.5 million to 16,527 employees, while the External Affairs Ministry, which has on its payroll the highest paid public employees on average, will pay ₦27.6 million to 4,775 persons.

Ministry of Agriculture will pay ₦24.8 million to 11,892 employees. The number of employees has increased by 2,713 over the 1980 figure, reflecting presumably the higher priority now given to the sector by the government.

HABYARIMANA ANNOUNCES LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY

AB181707 Paris AFP in French 0627 GMT 18 Dec 80

[Text] Kigali, 18 Dec (AFP)--Rwanda will have a legislative assembly, President Juvenal Habyariamana of Rwanda announced at the opening session of the Third Congress of Rwanda's sole party, the National Revolutionary Development Movement (MRND).

The congress must specify the special directives in order to facilitate the starting of the national development council, which according to Article 51 (of the constitution) and jointly with the [word indistinct] exercises the legislative power, Major General Habyarimana declared in front of more than 700 participants in the congress.

It will be recalled that Rwanda adopted a constitution in December 1978 through a referendum. This text stipulates the creation of a national development council with its members elected through universal suffrage. The head of state, who came to power through a coup d'etat in 1973, was elected president of the republic in January 1979.

Enumerating the achievements under the second development plan (1977-1981), the Rwandan president underlined the difficulties brought about by exhaustion of arable farm lands and the decrease in production.

With an area of 26,000 square kilometers, Rwanda's population rose up to 4.9 million inhabitants in 1979, thus acquiring a population density of 190 people to the square kilometer. This represents the highest in the whole of Africa, it is noted.

MUGABE ADMONISHED ON HIS INTENTIONS ON SOUTH AFRICA

Capetown DIE BURGER in Afrikaans 25 Nov 80 p 16

[Editorial: "Mr Mugabe Should Think Again"]

[Text] The fact that Zimbabwe does not intend to participate in sanctions against South Africa, even though it may be required to do so by the international political community, must be more reassuring for the people of that country than it is for South Africa. The reality of the matter still is that South Africa can hardly be seriously hurt by a Zimbabwe economic boycott and that this black country will be the one to soon feel the suffering.

Yesterday in his interview with DIE BURGER Mugabe revealed the sober realistic fact in this respect. However with respect to certain other matters he should be just as realistic if he wants to prevent his country from becoming the victim of circumstances which he will not be able to control later on.

One of these is the hope which he expressed for the eventual establishment of mutual diplomatic relations with Russia.

Thus far Mugabe's ruling ZANU (PF) party has been very cool toward Russia, especially in view of the fact that during the war the latter preferred to lend aid to the ZIPRA forces of Joshua Nkomo. Perhaps Mugabe's new attitude ensues from his dissatisfaction with the West which in his opinion has not come near the promises of economic aid it has made.

Another matter which Mugabe will have to consider is his intention of allowing the South African National Congress and the Pan-Africanist Congress to establish full-fledged offices in Salisbury "in the course of time." In the past the Zimbabwe prime minister expressly stated that he would not make his territory available to subversive movements working against South Africa. But Mugabe is living in a fool's paradise if he thinks he can prevent this if he goes on to provide a foothold for the ANC and the PAC.

WALVIS BAY'S ECONOMY MAY FORCE UNION WITH SOUTHWEST AFRICA

Capetown DIE BURGER in Afrikaans 31 Oct 80 p 13

[Text] South Africa's strategically extremely important Walvis Bay harbor enclave in Southwest Africa has basically two future options: either remain a South African base or fall into Russian hands. In any case, the economic crisis which is now afflicting the region bodes nothing good for the future.

The man who made this oppressive prediction yesterday in the course of an interview with DIE BURGER is someone who, because of his official position, knows Walvis Bay intimately. He is Dormehl Vosloo, the director of Walvis Bay.

There is great concern about the future, especially with respect to the economic prospects of the harbor town which, ever since the failure of the pelegian fishing industry (Walvis Bay's most important source of income), is experiencing one of the greatest crises in its history.

Vosloo said that the financial pinch which the inhabitants of Walvis Bay are beginning to feel increasingly can create an extremely dangerous situation.

Because they are situation so far away from the nearest economic centers of South Africa (Capetown) and because, as residents of South African territory, they cannot have even a bite of Southwest Africa's economic cake, they could decide to seek an anschluss with Southwest Africa.

If this happens Walvis Bay would end up in the hands of the Southwest's government. But who can predict what this government will be like in a few years' time? Vosloo asked.

South Africa has repeatedly made it very clear that it will not give up Walvis Bay. However, it is willing to negotiate with the Southwest's government such things as the use of the harbor facilities. But if South Africa wants to maintain its hold on the enclave it must help to support it economically.

Vosloo stated that the strategic importance of Walvis Bay, an all deep-sea harbor on the west coast of southern Africa which has not yet fallen into the hands of the enemy, cannot be underestimated.

He said that Walvis Bay is the danger point, the Achilles heel of Southwest Africa.

Militarily speaking, an attack on Southwest Africa from the north is logistically impossible. However, whoever controls Walvis Bay controls the sea and air routes on the west coast of Southwest Africa. The harbor is the Southwest's only access to the sea. Its exports and imports go through this harbor. The harbor has a well-developed infrastructure which includes railroad lines, vehicular roads and airports. It also offers complete access to the Southwest and its people.

It is especially important for the minority groups of the Southwest. Vosloo said that as long as the enclave stays in safe hands the security of the whites, Basters and of other minorities can be guaranteed.

The task of the economic stabilization of Walvis Bay and its 1,124 square kilometers is a gigantic one. How bad things are with the once progressive fishing town can be deduced from the pelagian fish catches.

Only 5 years ago 1 million tons of pelagian fish (anchovies and sardines) were still being caught. This year the boats could not even catch 150,000 tons. Sardines, the cannery fish and the biggest moneymaker, even disappeared completely.

Vosloo went on to point out that if one considers the fact that 78 percent of the inhabitants of Walvis Bay are dependent on the fishing industry then the extent of the crisis can be realized.

There are only 5,000 fishing industry workers left out of the original 16,000 workers.

Artificial economic stimulation is not going to provide a solution, according to Vosloo. Alternative sources of income must be sought.

Because of the uncertain political future of Southwest Africa, investors are hesitant about investing in factories which can exploit the whitefish resources of the region. The whitefish industry could again provide work for many people and earn a lot of money for the region, so stated Vosloo.

Uncertainty

Other possible sources of income which Vosloo mentioned are tourism, the further development of the salt industry and the building of factories for the production of soda ash, magnesium and chloro-glicerine.

But all of this costs a lot of money and uncertainty about the future is causing investors to be hesitant.

If the area is not helped economically then Walvis Bay inhabitants, of whom 80 percent of nonwhites are ethnically bound to the Southwest and most of the whites have interests in the Southwest, would have to seek salvation in the Southwest rather than in South Africa.

Vosloo warned that this could play directly into the hands of the Russians.

COMMENT ON BERNSTEIN INCIDENT IN SOWETO: ABIDE BY LAWS

Capetown DIE BURGER in Afrikaans 17 Nov 80 p 10

[Editorial: "Visitors and the Nation's Laws"]

[Text] It is regrettable that an internationally known newspaperman such as Carl Bernstein of Watergate fame has been held for questioning by the police in Soweto. The shame of it all is that this is going to give way to a flood of negative and damaging publicity for South Africa.

We feel sorry for the embarrassment which this must have caused to Bernstein, however, he must blame the appropriate persons for this. He was in the company of people who must have known that a permit is necessary for entering the black city. Due to the fact that South African laws were transgressed, the police actually had no other choice than to take action and after all it makes no sense to complain over the fact that the group was arrested and questioned. This would have also happened to a South African citizen had he entered the area without a permit.

According to reports, Bernstein was terribly annoyed by this incident over the weekend. He said that this should never have taken place and that he feels very hurt and offended over this matter. We can understand this, but then he must not forget who is to blame for this. It would be an unreasonable attitude if he were to assume that because he is a famous newspaperman he actually deserves to stand above the laws of the country. He should know better.

This also applies to the two Americans who accompanied him, even though one of them could claim diplomatic immunity. Diplomatic immunity does not mean that such a person and his visiting guests can do as they please in a foreign country. It is still necessary to abide by the laws of a certain country to the best of one's ability, in accordance to unwritten diplomatic rules.

If a South African diplomat or newspaperman were to purchase a firearm in the United States and then try to smuggle it to South Africa (whether or not he knows that there is an arms ban against South Africa) he would immediately find himself clashing with American justice. A transgression is a transgression whether or not one agrees with the legislation in question.

Americans in South Africa (visitors as well as diplomats) may as well get rid of the sort of arrogance which came to light in this incident and as civil people try to pay attention to the laws of the country in which they are guests.

APARTHEID-MINDED MINISTER'S VIEWS CONDEMNED

Capetown DIE BURGER in Afrikaans 25 Nov 80 p 16

[Editorial: "Worshipping in a Church"]

[Text] In light of the Dutch Reformed Church's official views on joint worshipping it is shocking to have a preacher refer to this as a "chaffering with the thoughts of unity in Christ" and for him to regard such worshipping as the dismantling of white national identity. This minister, the Rev H. B. Senekal of the Bronkhorstspruit congregation, stated from the pulpit that joint worship will lead to assimilation, integration and to the ultimate disintegration of nation and church.

A stronger rejection of the ideas of joint worship is hardly possible. This stands at the same level as the recent threat by a retired Cape Province member of a church council to ban colored and black visitors from Dutch Reformed Church buildings.

The Reverend Senekal's statement is in conflict with the letter and spirit of the decision of the General Synod of 1974 which reads: "Spiritual fellowship is also experienced wherever the faithful are together with Christ through his Word and Spirit. This fellowship can also be exercised where the faithful from various churches happen to pray together. The manner in which this takes place in the church is the responsibility of the local church council."

In accounting for this decision, the wording of which is contained in the report: "Race, People and Nation and National Relations in the Light of the Scriptures," the unequivocal statement is made that a person's or a people's own nature as well as one's own language, play a role in the manner in which God talks to his children through His Word and Spirit. "It is thus inevitable that each ethnic group will exercise its own collective worship within its own culture and linguistic ties." Moreover a strong emphatic point is made that a thing such as common worship must not be forced upon anyone, because then the spontaneous character of commonness would disappear as a result of enforcement.

It is a grevious matter to see a preacher of the Dutch Reformed Church set himself so daringly against the moderate and balanced viewpoint of his church. What is worse is that his concepts about Christian religion and the common practice of it are apparently based on a simplistic view of the political differences between "liberal humanists" and other people who do not wish to be under one roof with different national groups.

If the preacher's actions and thinking as a Christian have been soured to such an extent by the obsolete concept of an apartheid devoid of love, then this sort of apartheid has become a dangerous monstrosity which should not continue to exist.

As long as such noises are heard within the Dutch Reformed Church it will be necessary to pray and to ponder uninterruptedly on the best way of making sure that the church's considered decisions are adopted by all church members...even by the preachers.

DEVELOPMENT OF ROCKET ARTILLERY, AIR-TO-AIR MISSILE PRAISED

Capetown DIE BURGER in Afrikaans 27 Nov 80 p 11

[Text] Johannesburg--An artillery rocket system, which was developed exclusively by South African engineers and technicians and manufactured locally without any foreign license agreements, was crowned with the highest science honors in South Africa yesterday in Johannesburg.

The retiring chairman of the Associated Scientific and Technical Union of South Africa (ASTU), A. A. Middlecote, yesterday handed over an engraved commemorative plate from Kentron (Pty) Ltd for the development of the rocket system and an air-to-air missile.

The ASTU honor is the most important one ever given for an achievement in the field of science and engineering. F. Z. Naude, assistant chief director of Kentron received the award.

The missile is being used as the air force's most important defense weapon. This is a fast-response weapon and was also developed locally.

The 127 mm artillery rocket is the first of its kind to be used by the army. The development of this arm has also encouraged the establishment of other local industries, according to Middlecote. Both of these weapons compare well with similar weapons manufactured and marketed by other countries.

D. G. Kingwill, the director of information and research services of the WNNR [Council for Scientific and Industrial Research], was appointed in Middlecote's place as chairman of ASTU. The new deputy chairmen are Prof W. J. van Biljon and I. W. P. van den Bosch.

ATLANTIS DIESEL ENGINE DATA--With more than 2 million units sold since its original manufacture in 1953, the ADE-152 is one of the soundest diesel engines in international mass production and the one on which the Perkins fortune has been based. It was originally designed in the combustion heading chamber model having an 88.9 mm bore width. The present cylinder volume of 2.5 liter was attained in 1959 when the bore diameter was increased to 91.5 mm. Along with the four and six cylinder variants this engine represents the beginning of Perkins' worldwide multiapplications role in its motor class. The direct injection model of the engine, which was intended to be sold in parallel with the precombustion chamber design for many years, was made available for the first time in 1964. A further development of this engine, described as the improved specification forming the basis of the ADE-152, was announced in 1973. With a maximum torque of approx. 900 Kn/m^2 (bmep) [brake mean effective pressure], the engine without the booster has one of the highest power outputs of any mass-produced engine in the world. Because of the especially compact dimensions of the combustion chamber, the ignition takes place with excellent evenness and smoke control. It was this engine which formed the basis from which the first example of Perkins' unique low-pollution "Squish-Lip" ignition system was developed. The first "Squish-Lip" engines for the 152 were manufactured in 1979. [Excerpt] [Capetown DIE BURGER in Afrikaans 26 Nov 80 p 5] 7964

COMMENTARY LAUDS ACHIEVEMENTS IN ECONOMIC RECOVERY PROGRAM

AB182223 Kinshasa AZAP in French 1100 GMT 18 Dec 80

[AZAP commentary: "The End of the Tunnel"]

[Text] Kinshasa, 18 Dec (AZAP)--Of the long interview Guide Mobutu Sese Seko accorded Radio France Internationale last Tuesday, we were mostly interested in the passage dealing with the recent evolution of the national economy.

The remarks the father of the nation made on that issue are not misleading and they clearly indicate that Zaire, though still facing economic difficulties, is now beginning to see the light at the end of the tunnel. Zaire's economic crisis caused by endogenous as well as exogenous factors and once considered a result of the general economic situation has become structural. Therefore, in order to overcome it, it was necessary to take drastic measures requiring fundamental reforms of the state machinery, and the assistance of foreign experts.

The founding president really took the bull by the horns. First, commendable efforts were engaged for the valorisation of the management of public affairs through rugged reforms introduced in the areas of customs, the Department of Finance and the Bank of Zaire. Secondly, steps taken at the international level recently allowed the consolidation of Zaire's public and commercial debt; these steps also yielded a firmer commitment by foreign partners as well as international organizations to support the recovery effort agreed to by the Zairian authorities.

Today the results are there, palpable: Due to the achievements Zaire realized in the field of the administration of public finances during 1980, the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank themselves are publicizing our country in international circles.

Announcing Zaire's exploits to the listeners of Radio France Internationale, Guide Mobutu felt a justified happiness at seeing his work crowned with success.

Zaire's access to IMF facilities for next year is eagerly awaited by the people who spared no sacrifice in order to support the head of state's action.

MUGABE TO PURSUE ANTI-SOUTH AFRICAN MEASURES EXCEPT ECONOMIC BOYCOTTS

Capetown DIE BURGER in Afrikaans 25 Nov 80 pp 1, 2

[Article by Tienie Fourie: "Zimbabwe Will Not Boycott South Africa"]

[Text] Salisbury--In an interview with DIE BURGER held yesterday Zimbabwe's Prime Minister Robert Mugabe said that Zimbabwe will not take part in any sanctions against South Africa even though the United States will make this mandatory. This was one of the few interviews granted to a South African newspaperman.

Mugabe said that Zimbabwe is economically dependent on South Africa and therefore he cannot take part in an international boycott against it. This has been Zimbabwe's view in the past and it still is unchanged, he said.

However, he went on to say that he will not oppose "selective measures" against South Africa by the international community.

Among other things, Mugabe said the following in the course of the interview:

All sport contacts between South African sports entities and their Zimbabwe peers must stop "immediately." If these do not, the government will take measures against sports organizations and individuals.

"In the course of time" the South African National Congress and the Pan-Africanist Congress will be allowed to establish full-fledged offices in Salisbury.

The central committee of the ruling ZANU (PF) Party as well as the Zimbabwe cabinet have "not yet decided" whether Edgar Tekere, the minister of labor force utilization who stands accused of murder will be "pardoned" in the event that he is found guilty.

ZANU (PF) as well as the Patriotic Front will continue to have guerilla fighters trained abroad.

The recent incarceration of officials of the Patriotic Front in Zimbabwe is aimed at "isolating those elements which are not simply opposed to any particular party, but whose aim is to subvert the legal government of Zimbabwe."

He also expressed the hope that Russia will follow up last week's visit of Gen Vassily Solodovnikof to Salisbury with talks on a ministerial level aimed at the establishment of mutual diplomatic relations.

Frontier

With respect to Southwest Africa, Mugabe stated that he supports the United Nations in its efforts to bring about the independence of that region. He is aware that the international community is considering certain measures against South Africa aimed at exercising pressure upon that country with respect to Southwest Africa. Zimbabwe will not stand in the way of such measures, but it is not itself in a position to apply sanctions against South Africa. In answer to a question, he also said that the closing of the frontier between Zimbabwe and South Africa would come down to sanctions; therefore, Zimbabwe will not close its frontier.

He repeated his offer to act as the host for a summit conference on Southwest Africa. However, Mugabe went on to say that this depends on the parties interested in this matter.

MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE PREDICTS END OF TIES WITH SOUTH AFRICA

Capetown DIE BURGER in Afrikaans 26 Nov 80 p 18

[Text] Salisbury--Yesterday Zimbabwe's minister of agriculture, Senator Dennis Norman, stated that agricultural ties between Zimbabwe and South Africa will be gradually slackened and ultimately cut off completely.

In an interview with DIE BURGER, Senator Norman said that the first victim of this new policy of the Zimbabwe government will be the agreement between his country and South Africa aimed at the extermination of locusts. This agreement will not be renewed next year.

As they expire, other agricultural agreements will no longer be renewed either. Private companies and agencies will be encouraged to break their ties with South Africa.

This new policy will be something new for South Africa especially in view of the fact that Zimbabwe's prime minister, Robert Mugabe, had indicated that his country wants to maintain trade ties with that country. Ties in the area of agriculture are normally taken as a part of normal trade ties.

Nevertheless Senator Norman went on to say that the new attitude of the government of Zimbabwe is being necessitated by the group of countries of Southern Africa which are meeting in Maputo this morning for the purpose of devising plans for a complete economic break with South Africa. Zimbabwe has been given the task of serving as the pantry of black Africa and as such it will be making friendly overtures to the north of its borders at the expense of those which already exist to the south.

Senator Norman said that in any case Zimbabwe has not much to fear with respect to such things as locust control. South Africa will be keeping this matter under control and it will not be necessary to have a formal agreement on this.

In the past, such agreements have made provisions for a pool of funds, knowledge and research for combating a specific infestation or to tackle a special task. Thus in the future South Africa will have to do this on its own.

Research Facilities

Senator Norman, who was born in England but has lived in Zimbabwe for many years, also said that breaking these ties with South Africa "is regrettable to a certain degree." However, when a country such as Zimbabwe undertakes a new order of things it is necessary to conduct matters in accordance with new rules.

Zimbabwe now has the research facilities and the other necessities to manage without South Africa, according to the senator.

With regard to Afrikaans-speaking farmers in Zimbabwe, the minister of agriculture said that Zimbabwe needs them in the same way that it needs the farmers of any other other national group. The only condition is that they must accept "the new rules" and therefore they "must play the game accordingly."

He does not expect that there will be any enmity against the Afrikaans-speaking farmers. Of course there are individual cases, but this is something which occurs in any country of the world.

Senator Norman said also that he does not think that Afrikaner farmers will be leaving the country in great numbers. In countries such as Kenya and Zambia, where black governments have been in power for many years, Afrikaans-speaking farmers are still there.

REFUGEES REPORT MNR ACTIVITY NEAR ZIMBABWE BORDER

Border Violence

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 15 Dec 80 p 1

[Article by Rob Linden]

[Text] Rebel forces belonging to the so-called Mozambique Resistance Movement (MNR) are waging a campaign of terror, intimidation and sabotage in provinces bordering Zimbabwe, according to refugees who have fled to this country to escape the violence. They say the rebels are mutilating and decapitating people who refuse to support them.

The campaign culminated in an all-out attack on the Frelimo garrison town and district administrative centre of Espungabera, in Gaza Province, at the beginning of the month.

During the fighting that followed, Frelimo officials told several hundred townspeople, mainly women, children, the old and the sick, to cross the Zimbabwe border, 14 km away, for safety.

Most of them returned under Frelimo escort the next day, but about 50 people are still staying in the church at the Mount Selinda mission, south of Chipinga, and an unknown number are living with relatives in border tribal trust lands.

Interviewed as they cooked sadza--provided by the mission and the Department of Social Services--over a log fire outside the church, the refugees told of the rebels' assault on Espungabera on December 1.

Heavy firing began just after 5 a.m. "The rebels advanced from the east shooting fiercely," said Mr Enoch Daniel, one of the refugees. "There were many of them. They surprised the Frelimo troops and forced their way into the outskirts of the town."

Then, he and other refugees said, the Frelimo unit rallied and after a fierce fire-fight, drove the rebels back. "Some people", they said, were killed, but they did not know how many, as they had been ordered by Government officials to flee to safety in Zimbabwe.

Clustered around the fire, the Mozambicans also told of how young men and girls were being seized by the rebels and being dragged into the bush.

They confirmed a report by the HERALD's Africa News Service in October that Frelimo officials and others who refused to support the MNR were having their ears cut off.

Villagers Believe Frelimo Will Crush Nomad Rebels

One firm conviction unites all the refugees who have fled the terror in Mozambique; that Frelimo will win in the end, and the rebels will be routed.

"Nobody backs the rebels," says Mr Enoch Daniel, a refugee from Espungabera. "The only way they can get food and recruits is by terrorising the people."

And Mrs Maria Diago brought an approving chorus from the refugees gathered outside Mount Selinda mission church when she said: "We believe in Samora Machel and Frelimo. Frelimo will win."

But Mr Daniel said Mozambique forces were having great difficulty in pinning down the rebels. "They have no bases. They move around the bush all the time, sometimes staying in one place for a few days, sometimes just for a night. Sometimes they even cross into Zimbabwe to escape Frelimo, then go back again."

He said the MNR guerrillas wore a variety of camouflage uniforms, some of them old and tattered, and were armed with AK rifles and light automatic weapons. But they seemed to have no heavy weapons and relied on mining the roads to hit at Frelimo units and halt the transport of food and supplies.

According to refugee accounts, rebel action is also worsening the level of malnutrition in Gaza Province, already severe because of the drought and the war.

People trying to plough and plant are being harassed, and a system of heavily guarded villages has been set up to stop the rebels' intimidation and looting raids.

The refugees were also unanimous that the guerrillas were not local people. "They might come from other parts of Mozambique, but they are not of our tribe," Mrs Diago said. Mr Daniel added: "They are not Shona speakers. They are not of our people."

Mrs Diago concluded, again to an approving chorus: "Whoever they are, they will not move us. The Government tells us that Frelimo is going to beat them. We believe Frelimo."

Terrorism Deplored

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 16 Dec 80 p 10

[Editorial: "Costly Struggle"]

[Text] REPORTS from refugees from Mozambique would seem to indicate that there is a savage bush war in the making. People who have fled across the border report torture, atrocities, terror and intimidation of villagers at the hands of a so-called Mozambique Resistance Movement.

There have been indications for some time that all is not well, but these stories are more detailed and more disturbing than many had imagined.

Little is really known of the aims of this organisation apart from trying to overthrow our friend and neighbour, the Frelimo leader President Samora Machel.

Even less is known about the source of the backing for this group or groups of adventurers.

Before independence gangs operated from this country but Prime Minister Mugabe has already pledged to destroy any bases on this side of the border and rout out the rebels and offered any support he can for President Machel.

According to the refugees these gangs of adventurers have no support from the people who are convinced that Frelimo will beat them.

But, as been proved in the past, a struggle can be long and costly in terms of human lives.

This outbreak of violence is one of pure opportunism and must be crushed.

REPORTAGE ON SHOOTING OF ZAIREAN SOLDIERS IN ZAMBIA

Border Incident

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 6 Dec 80 pp 1, 5

[Text] ZAIRE has protested to the Zambian authorities over a border incident this week in which two Zairean soldiers suspected to be bandits were shot dead in Chililabombwe.

Zairean consul-general in Ndola Mr Bomele Ikaki said yesterday that the two uniformed men killed in a shoot up with Zambian paramilitary officers at Konkola were soldiers and not bandits.

He claimed that the men were attacked on Zairean soil and not inside Zambia as earlier reported.

Mr Bomele was reacting to an earlier story in this paper which said the two Zaireans whose bodies are still lying in Konkola mine hospital mortuary were killed in an exchange of fire between "an armed gang from that country" and paramilitary police last Monday.

He said he had met outgoing Copperbelt Member of the Central Committee, Mr Shadreck Soko, to protest against the term "bandits" in the story referring to Zairean soldiers.

He said: "I went to the Member of the Central Committee to protest against calling these people bandits. These are not bandits but Zairean soldiers attacked on Zairean soil by armed men from this side."

In Lusaka, outgoing permanent secretary for Home Affairs Mr Phineas Musukwa confirmed that Zambian security forces shot two men found wearing Zairean army uniform in the Konkola area.

He denied that the two men were killed on Zairean soil but declined to give details and referred the case to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

Foreign Affairs permanent secretary Mr Peter Kasanda said although it was normal that this case would eventually be handled by his ministry, he did not have details at the moment.

However, Mr Kasanda said Zambian security forces were not adventurous by nature and it was not possible that they crossed into Zaire.

"From established practice, our security men have never crossed into neighbouring countries and it is not possible that they did this time," he said.

The Zairean consul-general criticised Zambian newsmen for not checking their facts with competent authorities, thereby creating a wrong impression for the people of the two countries.

Mr Bomele said he deeply regretted the border incident, but felt that despite "these disturbing reports" the friendly relations between the two countries would grow stronger.

Meanwhile, the security guard abducted by heavily armed bandits in Mufulira in the early hours of Thursday has been found.

Securicor branch manager, Mr Gilbert Limwanya, confirmed in Mufulira yesterday that Mr Daudi Mashimikilo, 20, was left near the Mokambo mine, a few kilometres from the Zambia/Zaire border. He then walked to a village on the Zambian side where he was picked up by Zambia and mine police.

The guard was not harmed although the gunmen robbed him of property worth K16.

● The district development committee in Chililabombwe has approved measures taken by the Party and its Government in conjunction with mine authorities to curb smuggling and general crime in the area.

Governor, Mr Leo Katakwe said measures being taken included the digging of a deeper trench than the existing one between Konkola township and the notorious black market established by Zaireans.

Zaire Demands Explanation

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 9 Dec 80 p 1

[Text] ZAIRE has demanded an explanation from the Government over the killing of two men dressed in Zairean army uniform in Konkola last week who it claims were its soldiers killed on Zambian soil.

Foreign Affairs permanent secretary, Mr Peter Kasanda said yesterday that Zaire Foreign Minister Mr Ngaza Karl Bond has sent a cable to the ministry yesterday demanding an explanation.

Mr Kasanda said he had no full details of the incident from the Ministry of Home Affairs because his counterpart, Mr Phineas Musukwa, was moving to the Ministry of Defence after last week's reshuffles by President Kaunda.

Zaire protested to the Zambian authorities over the border incident and said the men were not bandits but its soldiers killed on Zairean soil.

Claimed

Zairean consul general Mr Bomele Ikaki claimed in Ndola on Friday that the men were attacked on Zairean soil by Zambian para-military officers and not inside Zambia.

But Mr Kasanda said this meant that the Zambian security officers entered Zaire, shot the men and brought the bodies into Zambia which was not possible.

From established practice, Zambian security men had never crossed into neighbouring countries and it was impossible that they did so this time, he said.

"Our security forces are not adventurers by nature and it is not possible that they crossed into Zaire," Mr Kasanda said last week.

Removed

The bodies of the two Zairean soldiers have been removed from Konkola Mine Hospital where they were taken after the border incident.

Police sources said in Chililabombwe yesterday that the two bodies were moved from the hospital on Friday just before Mr Bomele visited the area.

Mr Bomele could not be reached for comment on the whereabouts of the two bodies yesterday.

The sources said before Mr Bomele arrived in Chililabombwe, police removed the bodies from the hospital but could not say where they were taken.

Residents in Konkola township said they were living in fear and that the lifting of the curfew meant little to them since they would continue being indoors by 18 hours "because the situation here is tense."

And Zana reports that Zambezi governor Mr Edward Limande, accompanied by senior police and immigration officials, has rushed to Chavuma to try and secure the release of a Danish national detained by Angolan authorities.

Mr Peter Holl Gregersen, a Danish expatriate working in Lusaka, is being held by Angolan authorities for allegedly flouting that country's immigration regulations. He was arrested on November 29 after he crossed the border at Chingi in the Chavuma area.

North-western Province police chief Mr Adam Shiyanda said that efforts were being made to secure Mr Gregersen's release.

Official Defends Killings

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 10 Dec 80 p 1

[Text] POLICE Inspector-General Mr Crispin Katukula has supported the Zambian paramilitary police action in which two Zairean soldiers were killed in Konkola last week and said "our men did an excellent job".

In an interview in Kabwe yesterday, Mr Katukula, who was on his way to the Copperbelt, supported the Ministry of Foreign Affairs' stand on the issue.

"I had a very bad experience with the Zaireans when I was on the Copperbelt," Mr Katukula said. The Zairean solders "used to come to the tennis club in Ndola armed and dressed in army uniform to terrorise club members."

Mr Katukula maintained Zambian security forces were not at fault in killing the two Zairean soldiers, and that they did a "good job."

Zaire has demanded an explanation from the Zambian Government on the killings saying they were killed inside Zairean territory. The demand was communicated to the Government from Zaire's Foreign Minister Mr Nguza Karl I Bond through the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

Entered

Foreign Affairs permanent secretary, Mr Peter Kasanda, has said although he had not received full details on the incident from the Ministry of Home Affairs, Zambian security forces could not have entered Zaire to kill the two soldiers.

From established practice, Mr Kasanda said, the security forces had never crossed into neighbouring countries and that it was impossible that they could have done so this time.

Mr Katukula is believed to have gone for an on-the-spot check of the shooting scene in Chililabombwe.

In Chililabombwe, police have arrested four heavily armed men.

Copperbelt deputy police chief, Mr Levy Bwacha, confirmed this in Ndola yesterday, but said he was awaiting a full report from the commanding officer in Chingola.

The gunmen were arrested on Monday after a tip-off.

He said the situation at Konkola after the shooting of the two Zairean soldiers had now returned to normal.

Mr Bwacha also said police on the Copperbelt might reimpose the restriction of people's movements between 23 and 05.00 hours during which those found on the streets without good reason would be charged.

The restriction order was imposed by provincial police chief, Mr Julius Zulu, last October at the height of the crime wave in which several people were killed in a spate of murders and robberies.

Mr Zulu said at the time the unnecessary movement of people late at night was one of the factors hampering his men's operations and that the order was to curb crime in the province. —Zana.

TANZANIAN-ZIMBABWEAN FRIENDSHIP PACT HAILED

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 9 Dec 80 p 11

[Article by Tonic Sakaike]

[Text] THE people of Zimbabwe and Tanzania last week took another step towards extending the relationship between them from a political party level to Government level.

This was facilitated by the highly successful State visit to Zimbabwe concluded at the weekend by President Nyerere. The transformation of the relationship, made possible by independence in Zimbabwe, first occured when formal relations were established between the two States earlier this year.

Both countries have now gone further by reaching a friendship and co-operation agreement expected to be mutually beneficial in the long run.

It would be too optimistic to expect early benefits from their trade, economic, scientific and technological agreements.

But a strong foundation exists for the achievement of the goals set last week. Both Governments are committed to socialism and are led by men with a reputation for unwavering commitment to principle — Dr Nyerere and the Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe.

Contact between them is enhanced by identical official languages and they have — to a large extent — had similar experiences under the same colonial master.

Although the chronological disparity in the attainment of independence has brought a new dimension to each country's experiences, that in itself seems to have created a framework within which a fruitful exchange of ideas can be conducted.

Seventeen years of independence will enable Tanzania to give Zimbabwe constructive advice drawn from its fund of experience built on past mistakes and successes.

On the other hand, prolonged colonialism has bequeathed to Zimbabwe an economic infrastructure from which Tanzania can materially benefit at less cost.

One of the important things learnt by Tanzania is that unity is essential for national development — hence President Nyerere's repeated appeals to Zimbabweans to guard their unity jealously.

Fratricidal wars sparked off by petty political differences and sometimes inordinate ambition, have cost many an independent African country both money and time that could have been usefully employed improving the people's lives.

Zimbabwe's delayed independence would have been worth the long wait if the lesson was learnt and the people's efforts were channelled into the various development arteries opened by the new Government instead of being wasted on retrogressive action.

That noble lesson which the Mwalimu brought to Zimbabwe does not seem to have fallen on deaf ears.

Another theme which featured repeatedly in Dr Nyerere's speeches was a call to the leaders of Africa's newest State to discharge dutifully and honestly the trust vested in them by the majority of the people.

He backed his advice with facts drawn from the practices and experiences in other independent African States in which colonial misdeeds appear to have given way to indigenous practices of a similar nature.

This, happily, is a development which Zimbabwean leaders vowed to resist, both during the struggle and after independence.

The good expected from the accord reached last week will extend beyond the borders of the two States. The support expressed for the freedom struggles in Namibia, South Africa, the Saharawi Arab Democratic Republic and Palestine will inspire the people.

However, consistent with the principle that it is the primary duty of an oppressed people to free themselves and that of others to assist, Zimbabwe and Tanzania did not commit themselves to armed confrontation in the quest for justice in these troubled spots.

They preferred to work for their goals within the context of the non-aligned movement, the OAU and the United Nations.

As far as the implementation of the bilateral agreement between Zimbabwe and Tanzania is concerned, the task will soon fall on the joint commission to guide the two countries towards their set objectives.

The State visit of President Nyerere was an appropriate note on which to end Zimbabwe's official programme during this momentous year. The Mwalimu came and won the hearts of the people with his wisdom, dignity and modesty.

Dr Nyerere now expects to play host to President Banana and the Prime Minister who have both accepted his invitation to visit Tanzania on dates still to be agreed.

REPORTAGE ON MUGABE VISIT TO NIGERIA

Strengthening Ties

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 16 Dec 80 p 1

[Text] The Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, leaves early today for Lagos, leading a 25-member delegation on a three-day official visit to Nigeria.

In the party are Mr Mugabe's wife, Sally, the Minister of Information, Dr Nathan Shamuyarira, the Minister of Finance, Senator Enos Nkala, and the Minister of the Public Service, Mr Richard Hove.

Also included are the Deputy Minister for Foreign Affairs, Dr Witness Mangwende, the Deputy Minister of Posts and Telecommunications, Dr Naomi Nhiwatiwa; the Deputy Minister of Commerce and Industry, Mr Moses Mvenge, the vice-principal of the University of Zimbabwe, Professor Walter Kamba and Mr Sheba Gava from the office of the Minister of State.

Mr Mugabe will be awarded an honorary Doctorate of Civil Laws by the Ahmadou Bello University during his visit, an official statement said yesterday.

The statement gave no indication of any other engagements, but observers believe serious discussion will take place between Zimbabwe and Nigeria on strengthening relations between the two states.

Talks are also expected on trade, information and telecommunications. In discussions with Nigerian President Shehu Shagari, Mr Mugabe is likely to review developments in Namibia and the situation in South Africa.

While in Lagos in April for the Organisation of African Unity economic summit, Mr Nkala held talks with Nigerian businessmen and said interest had been shown in buying Zimbabwean products.

The presence in the delegation of the Deputy Minister of Commerce and Industry could be designed to take this subject a step further. Oil-rich Nigeria could crown Mr Mugabe's visit with an aid offer in fields to be discussed this week.

The Prime Minister's delegation returns to Salisbury on Thursday.

LAGOS.

THE economy of Zimbabwe was still being controlled and manipulated by those dislodged from political power, the Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, said here yesterday.

Calling for Nigeria's co-operation in Zimbabwe's "economic struggle", Mr Mugabe spoke of pressures on the new nation from "all over" and declared that "the struggle has not ended".

Zimbabwe's enemies had now resorted to economic tactics, he added.

"After being dislodged as political sovereigns in our State, they retain the reins of our economy and continue to manipulate it: There are pressures on us from all over.

"They seek to introduce investments into our economy in a manner which is intended to bring about economic control now that they have lost political control."

Mr Mugabe was speaking minutes before Zimbabwean and Nigerian Ministers concluded discussion of a general co-operation agreement which was later signed by him and President Shehu Shagari.

The agreement covers the economic, technical and scientific fields but it is only a broad outline of the will to co-operate and its implementation depends on the drawing up of more specific pacts in the fields to which it applies.

The two Governments appeared to have hit a hitch in their intentions to reach a trade pact. President Shagari expressed the hope that final agreement in that sector would be reached soon.

The Prime Minister told President Shagari that Zimbabwe needed Nigerian support in its economic struggle: "For if yesterday we joined hands in dislodging the political enemy, let us today join hands in overpowering the economic enemy."

The Prime Minister went on: "We need to achieve a position of self-sufficiency, a position that lessens our dependence on South Africa in particular and also on Western powers."

President Shagari assured him of Nigeria's readiness to assist in training, technical manpower, agriculture, mining and transport and power.

No reason was given for the deferment of the signing of the expected trade pact, but President Shagari commented casually at a session during which both leaders made statements of intent that there was no delegate from the Nigerian national petroleum company.

He said the organisation was attending a conference abroad. Mr Mugabe continued his official visit yesterday by laying a wreath at the cenotaph at Tafawa Balewa Square and visiting Tin Can Island port complex.

He later attended a dinner after a reception in his honour. His wife, Sally, had a separate programme laid on for her and it took her on a visit to Lagos Island maternity home, the palace of the Oba of Lagos and the local museum.

His visit ends today with a visit to the northern town of Kaduna where he will be conferred the Doctorate of Civil Laws by Ahmadu Bello University.

The Prime Minister is due back in Salisbury later tonight.

● The Minister of Information and Tourism, Dr Nathan Shamuyarira is on a special mission to Nigeria, according to the Prime Minister.

Mr Mugabe told his host President yesterday: "The Minister of Information has a definite mission here well known to you, Mr President.

"The area of information and publicity is a very vital one. If Government activity is to be interpreted and Government policy understood, the Minister of Information must be well equipped with those means which are capable of interpreting Government policy."

THE integration of the armies was creating stability in Zimbabwe, the Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, said in Lagos.

At a news conference marking the end of a three-day official visit to Nigeria, Mr Mugabe said Zimbabwe was moving in the direction of stability.

"But I would be wrong if I say there is stability immediately there is integration. We are creating stability by the process of integration," he told a questioner.

Underlining the problems of bringing together three disparate forces, he said the British plan that required guerillas to gather in assembly points lacked the infrastructure to absorb facilities and barracks. There was also no provision for instructors.

Because the new Government had been forced to train instructors and integrate the armies simultaneously, there had been delays. "But that delay has not upset the forces in the assembly points. They have been very patient."

In the discipline of these forces should be seen the prospect of stability when they are integrated under one umbrella, said Mr Mugabe.

He dismissed a suggestion that there was no co-operation between ZANU (PF) and the Patriotic Front. "There is co-operation between us," he said.

In the Government the PF leader, Mr Joshua Nkomo, held "a very vital portfolio" responsible for law and order. "It is the hostility between the unintegrated forces rather than between the integrated forces that shows itself up occasionally."

However, the Prime Minister said there should be greater unity of all the democratic forces in Zimbabwe.

Asked about the effect on whites of the acquittal by the High Court of the Minister of Manpower Planning and Development, Mr Edgar Tekere, Mr Mugabe declined to make an assessment.

"There is some grousing and Smith expressed his disgust about the judgment. But let me say we have not created any new courts yet. These are courts created by Ian Smith and supported by Bishop Muzorewa during the few days of the internal settlement," Mr Mugabe said.

He explained that the people who heard the case in which Mr Tekere and seven former guerillas were charged with murder and attempted murder arising out of the killing on August 4 of Mr Gerald Adams were all inherited from the old institutions.

The Government had not interfered with the judicial process although "at one time it was thought we were going to prevent the hearing of the case".

Mr Mugabe stressed that the Government would stick by the court's verdict.

In a joint communique issued at Kaduna on Thursday, Mr Mugabe and President Shagari pledged to consolidate the friendship between Zimbabwe and Nigeria and to increase economic co-operation.

They expressed concern about the widening economic gap between North and South and disapproval of the deterioration in the terms of trade between developed and developing countries.

Condemned

In their review of African affairs, the two leaders expressed grave concern and indignation about the situation in Southern Africa.

They condemned the recent military incursion of South Africa into Angola. "This wanton, reckless and irresponsible action will further endanger the cause of peace in Southern Africa," said the communique.

Reaffirming their "total and unwavering support" to the liberation struggle, Zimbabwe and Nigeria called on the international community to reject any attempts to install "an unrepresentative, undemocratic and puppet government" in Namibia.

The communique emphasised the responsibility of independent African states to rid the continent of remaining pockets of colonialism and urged Africa to redouble its efforts to achieve these objectives.

President Shagari and Mr Mugabe also declared support for SWAPO, which they described as the authentic representative of the people of Namibia.

On Western Sahara they hoped a speedy solution would be found in accordance with the spirit and Charter of the OAU. They called for a negotiated settlement within the framework of the Lagos Accord to resolve the Chad problem.

MOZAMBICAN PRESS EXPOSES 1978 PLOT TO ASSASSINATE MUGABE

Salisbury THE HERALD in E ~ tish 20 Dec 80 p 1

[Text]

MAPUTO.

THE Mozambican Press yesterday published details of an abortive attempt to assassinate Mr Robert Mugabe when he was living in Maputo in 1978.

The Maputo daily, Notícias, and the national weekly magazine, Tempo, both carried extensive accounts of the murder attempt which ended with an explosion in a Maputo cafe, injuring 50 people, reports Zana-Rtr.

Both publications had been allowed to interview three Mozambicans detained on security charges. One of the detainees, Mr Amaro Tavares da Silva, spoke of the attempt to kill Mr Mugabe.

Mr da Silva (21), a former teacher, said he was recruited by a Rhodesian Special Branch officer in South Africa in April 1978. The three detainees said they were trained at a camp called Retreat Farm, near Bindura, north of Salisbury.

Tempo reported that Mr da Silva said he had transmitted orders to several agents to kill Mr Mugabe, one of whom went to Mr Mugabe's house in July 1978 to plant explosives. The house was so heavily guarded that he decided to abandon the case of explosives at a cafe.

When the bomb exploded on July 25 more than 50 people were injured, mainly by flying glass. The would-be assassin escaped.

Mr da Silva was arrested by the police when he entered the country on another mission in January this year.

The second detainee, Mr Jose Timane, was quoted as saying he had been sent to attack a house in Maputo, but was foiled by a security guard at a suburban railway station. He threw one of the eight grenades he was carrying at a crowd of people. No one was injured and Mr Timane was arrested.

Mr Ernesto David Mavue was arrested a year ago. He had been sent on a reconnaissance mission to Mr Mugabe's house, and those of other Zimbabwean leaders, but said he had not carried it out.

Mr Timane and Mr Mavue said they considered Mr da Silva the leader of the Mozambicans at the camp, but Mr da Silva said he merely interpreted instructions from Rhodesian Special Branch officers.

NRZ DENIES DELAY OF IMPORTS FROM SOUTH AFRICA

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 13 Dec 80 p 3

[Text]

CUSTOMS and National Railways of Zimbabwe officials yesterday denied that imports from South Africa were being held up at the border.

Retailers and wholesalers in Salisbury had complained that stocks they had ordered from South Africa for Christmas were being delayed at the border.

One disgruntled confectioner said: "In October I ordered about 400 kg of dried fruit from South Africa for Christmas. I understand this and other goods including liquor and toys are just standing at the border.

"The dried fruit is for mince meat and cakes but if it does arrive it will be late for Christmas. The stocks should have arrived in November."

He said he understood that there was a shortage of loading trucks.

A freight agency in Salisbury said yesterday that delivery of goods which used to take only two to three weeks was now taking 10 weeks.

A spokesman said South African Railways were allowing 12 wagons to come into Zimbabwe for every 25 that went down to South Africa from this country.

"This is because the amount of South African Railway trucks in this country may be exceeding the number that should be here," he suggested.

But he said trade was not likely to suffer as they had explained the position to their customers.

UNDERSTANDING

"They have been very understanding and have not cancelled their orders. But the people who can feel the effects of such delays can only be the National Railways of Zimbabwe.

"People are willing to bring in their stocks by air and are prepared to pay the extra money if it means getting the goods in time for Christmas."

A spokesman for the Customs and Excise denied that there were any delays.

He dismissed the complaints saying: "I do not know of any delays and I have not heard any complaints at all."

Last night a spokesman in Bulawayo also denied that there were delays or that the South Africans were allowing 12 trucks into Zimbabwe for every 25 that went south.

"The National Railways of Zimbabwe is not aware that there are any Christmas goods being delayed at the border stations. There have been no general complaints made to the railways' headquarters or the area offices in Salisbury and Bulawayo.

"The number of wagons quoted is factually incorrect. There is no arbitrary restriction of wagons on a ratio basis.

"The South African Railways continue to apply a restriction on the use of SAR open type wagons for loading in South Africa owing to a shortage of wagons in that country," said the spokesman.

KAFUE GENERATOR BREAKDOWN HITS ZIMBABWE, ZAMBIA

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 18 Dec 80 p 1

[Text]

ONE of the effects of Tuesday night's power failure over much of Zimbabwe will be a shortage of bread for many people over Christmas. Bakers say that production losses, due to the electricity cut, now mean that they will not be able to bake extra loaves to allow Christmas Eve shoppers to stock up for the holiday.

Some bakeries in Salisbury said yesterday that they had lost thousands of loaves when the power failure brought production to a standstill.

A spokesman for Lobel Bakeries said yesterday that the company had lost more than 4 620 dozen loaves as a result of the power cut.

"The loaves lost included those that were still in the ovens and the dough that was being prepared. We had to spend four hours cleaning up before production could resume.

"The loss in bread production did not affect today's deliveries because we bake a day in advance when we prepare our stocks for the Christmas period.

"But there is going to be a shortage of extra bread over the Christmas holiday because we are already behind schedule in our production, although we are working 24 hours a day," he said.

He said the company was going to ensure normal deliveries for the Christmas period.

Pigs seem to be the only animals that have benefited from the loss suffered by the bakeries. Farmers with piggeries were yesterday loading their lorries with the damaged loaves and dough from the bakeries.

London Bakery said the blackout the company suffered had resulted in a loss of nearly 500 dozen loaves. They were also involved in lengthy cleaning operations before production resumed but met yesterday's supplies.

Rubins Bakery said they had lost a complete shift, but North West Bakery escaped without significant losses.

A spokesman for the company said they operated on a different system from that employed by the other bakeries, and this had enabled them to overcome difficulties in production caused by the power cut.

He did not say what the method was.

The hospitals were also affected by the power cut. A hospital spokesman said they were able to cope with the situation because they were fully equipped with emergency power plants.

Many industries said they were hit by the power failure but there had been no drastic effect on their products.

A production of Alice in Wonderland at Reps Theatre was cancelled an hour after the power failure. Actors entertained the audience by singing carols and telling jokes, but eventually the show was cancelled when it became apparent that power could not be restored in time.

Bulawayo bakers, who start their night shift at 8.30 p.m. were not affected by the power cut as power was restored to Bulawayo at about 7.30 p.m.

Generators Back After General Black-Out

POWER was restored from Kafue in the early hours of yesterday morning after a technical fault which left most of Zimbabwe and Zambia without electricity for more than an hour on Tuesday night.

"It definitely was not sabotage," said the chairman of the Central African Power Corporation, Mr Jimmy Ward. "It was a technical fault."

Mr Ward said the CAPCO power failure had hit the Zambian Copperbelt and Lusaka and the reverberations were felt right across Zimbabwe.

Kafue is one of the power generating plants which feeds a system covering most of Zambia and Zimbabwe.

The system had to resort to "load shedding"—not "low shedding" as the Herald reported yesterday. This meant, said Mr Ward, that with a limited amount of power, "somebody had to sacrifice some of their supply".

According to a stipulated plan, the electricity undertakings determined the areas which had to be cut, he said. Load shedding was a form of rationing, which, in the case of Salisbury, was decided by the municipality.

END OF BAN ON BOTSWANAN BEEF IMPORTS DEMANDED

Local Meat Too Expensive

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 8 Dec 80 p 1

[Text] THE Government must lift the ban on cattle imports from Botswana as a means of reducing local beef prices.

And the board could lay off 500 workers if it closed down uneconomical depots in areas where the cattle population was not favourable in order to cut down on operational costs.

Cold Storage Board of Zambia general manager Mr Dominic Chilao said his organisation had made these representations to the Government if the CSB was to be saved from collapsing.

Zambia stopped importing beef from Botswana in 1974 because it was too expensive to airfreight.

The then Minister of Rural Development, Mr Paul Lusaka, said the decision was taken to conserve foreign exchange and to achieve self-sufficiency in beef needs.

In August 1977, President Kaunda said unless cattle farmers stopped asking for exorbitant prices, the Government might be compelled to import cheaper beef to protect consumers' interests.

According to the report of the committee of parastatal bodies for this year, Mr Chilao has asked the Government that since local cattle and meat were too expensive, the board should be allowed to import cattle from Botswana where it was cheaper.

Flooded

"This way, the meat market would be flooded thereby forcing a reduction in prices," he said.

Following the reduction of Government subsidy to the board from K2.5 million to K1 million, the CSB had been experiencing severe operational difficulties, according to the report.

But if the board was to keep giving satisfactory services, an additional subsidy of up to K2 million must be granted, Mr Chilao told the committee.

If this was not granted, all uneconomical depots in areas where cattle population was not favourable must close.

But Mr Chilao warned that this move would result in redundancies of more than 500 workers which might bring about political repercussions or industrial unrest.

"If none of my proposals are accepted, the operations of the board will grind to a halt," Mr Chilao warned the committee.

The committee has studied the proposals carefully, especially the one on beef imports and concluded that they were worth serious consideration by the Government.

It urged the Government to make a viable decision at the earliest opportunity in order to help the board carry out its obligations to the nation.

Butchers' Association Support

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 9 Dec 80 p 5

[Text] THE Zambia Butchers' Association has come out in full support of the Cold Storage Board of Zambia's call for the Government to lift the ban on cattle imports from Botswana as a means of reducing local beef prices.

In a statement issued in Ndola yesterday association secretary Mr Anwar Malik, said the organisation felt that the Government should favourably consider the request by the board so that Zambia could have sufficient beef in butcheries.

Mr Malik said the prices butchery owners paid to both Government and private ranchers were very high, but if the CSBZ was allowed to import beef, farmers would be forced to reduce their prices.

"We have made similar requests to the Government in the past because of the shortage of beef in the country. The only way we can improve the situation is to import cheap beef.

"For many years, butcheries have been chasing fewer animals on the market and this has made farmers continue to increase prices. In the end, butchery owners have been blamed for high prices of beef," said Mr Malik.

In Lusaka the Ministry of Agriculture and Water Development said it was considering the request by the Cold Storage Board of Zambia to lift a ban on beef imports.

But the ministry's permanent secretary, Mr Francis Kateya, emphasised that it was only the Cabinet office which could make a final decision although his ministry would consider the request and submit its report to the appropriate authorities for consideration.

CSBZ general manager Mr Dominic Chilao's call is contained in the parliamentary committee on parastatal bodies report.

Meanwhile, the public should expect an acute shortage of bread in Lusaka Province shortly because of a critical shortage of flour, general secretary of the Bakers Association and Industry of Zambia Mr Gullam Mulla warned yesterday.

He claimed that the National Milling Company had cut down on flour allocation to bakers by 50 per cent beginning from Wednesday last week.

No comment was available from the National Milling Company yesterday.

AFRICAN ADULT EDUCATION GROUP HOLDS CONFERENCE

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 10 Dec 80 p 5

[Text] CONDEMNED drugs in Europe are being used in Africa, President's Citizenship College principal, Mr Emmanuel Chalabesa has said.

Mr Chalabesa charged that Africa was being used as an experimental base for useless or dangerous drugs.

He was speaking shortly after his return from the seventh bi-annual conference of the African Adult Education Association held in Swaziland where Zambia was elected chairman for the next two years.

Mr Chalabesa said this problem was discussed at length during the nine-day conference and delegates expressed great concern on the issue.

"We drew the attention of governments to this problem and discussed the role national associations can play in combating this hazard," he said.

"The problem of drugs is making Africa a dumping ground on experimental basis which you don't find in Europe. Some of the drugs we use here are even condemned in many European or Western countries like the United States," he said.

Although the chemical industry was good since it brought about fertilisers, this could have devastating results in Africa if efforts were not made to stop the pollution of water and air by by-products.

Mr Chalabesa said soil erosion by deforestation and the unprecedented growth of African population which was not proportionate to food output was of great concern to delegates.

Environment was important to development and everybody should be aware of it. If members of the public ignored this fact, the future generations would have very few resources to rely on.

Mr Frank Nabwiso, regional educational officer of the International Planned Parenthood Federation, blamed the present problems of the African environment on atmospheric changes which made the continent hotter every year.

In a paper he presented to the conference on "environmental education through adult education programmes," Mr Nabwiso who is based in Nairobi, included other factors like political instability, inter-state warfare, violence, deforestation, diseases, poor sanitation, urban slums, prostitution, excessive population growth and many others.

WOMEN'S LIBERATION SEEN AS UN-AFRICAN CONCEPT

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 14 Dec 80 p 12

[Article in "Muongorori's View" column]

[Text] After all that has been said about Dr Naomi Nhiwatiwa's utterances--reportedly in defence of women's rights in Zimbabwe--it is with a heavy heart that I succumb to my male instinct to add my observations to the acrimonious protestations that her recent remarks provoked.

As an avowed defender of women's rights, Dr Nhiwatiwa, Deputy Minister of Posts and Telecommunications, has certainly got a lot of clout. That much I will say for her, for I have my doubts that any lesser woman with a husband to consider would have found the courage to deride men for their nocturnal forays without running the risk of a major family dispute.

Understandably, Dr Nhiwatiwa's remarks sparked off an avalanche of angry phone calls to the Press from staunch advocates of male supremacy who felt she had overstepped the traditional norms governing the status of women in Zimbabwe's African societies.

Angry

An irate caller to whom I spoke thought Dr Nhiwatiwa should be "excommunicated" from Government saying the post she held was bestowed on her at the discretion of the men she now has the temerity to denigrate.

I do not agree with that: I think she has the merit otherwise she would not be where she is today.

But Dr Gordon Chavunduka, Dean of the Faculty of Social Studies at the University of Zimbabwe, said Dr Nhiwatiwa was ignorant of the country's traditional customs and beliefs.

Dr Chavunduka warned Zimbabwean women against becoming vehicles of decadent Western cultures to the detriment of indigenous ancestral and traditional heritage. "The mistake with some of our women leaders," he observed, "was the tendency to approach everything with a Western outlook, ignoring the views and backgrounds of the majority."

Undoubtedly, the very concept of women's liberation is un-African. It would have shocked any of those pre-colonial monarchs who believed it a royal privilege to acquire as many wives as they wished.

Reprisals

In olden days women who dared oppose marriage, even in a polygamous family, attracted serious reprisals from village elders. If the suitor happened to be of royal blood a woman who showed disobedience was considered a curse on her family and often ran the risk of being sacrificed to destroy the evil in her.

With the coming of religion and the consequent banning of all beliefs and activities seen by missionaries as contrary to the gospel, the first seeds of Westernisation were planted on the African continent.

From then on until the advent of the much celebrated International Women's Year of 1978, a great deal has happened to disorientate the African woman from her original trends of life.

That, of course, is not the issue. What I would like to do is point to a few home truths about women, and about bars, beer drinking, and of course, what Dr Nhiwatiwa describes as permissiveness among the Zimbabwean men.

At the risk of sounding like the one of the unrepetant "male chauvinist pigs" that she so evidently detests, I feel I could never live with my conscience if I failed to state that implementing any of her suggestions would be courting disaster--and that could well be an understatement.

Of course, I am positive the Government would never consider slapping a blanket ban on beerhalls. Morals aside, beer-sales remain one of the Government's most prolific revenue earners and the local authorities have a stake in the high rates and licence fees paid by beerhall owners.

The claim that Zimbabwean society was restrictive against women may have been true 50 years ago, but to say the same today one would need to have strong evidence.

And evidence is what I have hunted for in vain to justify the allegation by Dr Nhiwatiwa that while men drunk themselves into an alcoholic stupor and knocked around with just any women they liked, the good wives stayed home wiping mucus from children's noses.

Elusive

Also elusive is evidence to show that only men are responsible for the promiscuity and moral decadence emanating from beerhalls. Neither is it strictly factual to suggest that women have clear slates as far as morality goes.

Prostitution is on the increase in Zimbabwe. The oldest profession is practised are the numerous drinking dens and pleasure houses scattered throughout the country. It is also true that men are often drawn to these places by women whose mode of dress and blatant sexuality conspicuously advertise their trade.

A young girl I met in one of Salisbury's night clubs admitted that she had resorted to "selling" herself because she had no other means of supporting herself and her two children.

For her and thousands of her kind, the solution to the problem will not be found in the abyss of nebulous objectives of cosmetic causes such as women's lib, but through tangible efforts to give them skills that will enable them to fend for themselves.

ZIMBABWE TO SPREAD FAMILY PLANNING IN AFRICA

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 21 Dec 80 p 6

[Text] ZIMBABWE may soon be spreading the gospel of family planning to much of black Africa.

A regional training and research centre for East, Central and Southern Africa could be set up in Salisbury next year.

Birth control workers from surrounding countries, including Mozambique, would then come on courses to learn how to get the message over to the people.

The centre would be the "engine room", powering the push against the catastrophic population explosion.

Zimbabwe is the obvious choice because its family planning programme is one of the most effective, efficient and inexpensive in all Africa.

The fact that the annual population growth rate is 3.6 percent — topped only by Kenya in Africa — is a tribute to the health services in keeping people alive rather than a discredit to the Government-backed Family Planning Association.

FPA director Mr Peter Dodds said last week he planned to call a big conference in Zimbabwe of African birth control officials.

He would then suggest that regional centres be set up throughout the continent to co-ordinate the battle against over-population — one of the biggest causes of poverty in the Third World.

One of the regions could be the English-speaking nations of East, Central and Southern Africa, plus Mozambique.

"I'm sure that I could get international aid to stage the conference, which wouldn't cost very much," said Mr Dodds.

If the training centre idea gets off the ground the FPA will merely extend their building next to Harare Hospital.

"Again, that wouldn't cost a fortune," said Mr Dodds.

He added that international co-operation was crucial if Africa was to conquer the crisis.

Several countries, including Zambia, have already said they are eager to swop ideas throughout the region.

"To a great extent we have the ridiculous situation where each country is sitting on its own trying to tackle the birth control problem," said Mr Dodds.

"We should be talking to each other, learning from each other. That is the way forward."

Zimbabwe has much to offer in experience to its neighbours.

Apart from talking to children in school, the FPA has educators and contraceptive distributors out in "the field".

They talk to the people in their kraals and in their township homes.

"It's a unique scheme in Africa," said Mr Dodds. "It's no good having a posh distribution clinic in the middle of town — you have to get out there among the people."

Proof that the system works can be seen on the end-of-year balance sheet.

In the year from July 1980 to June 1981 the FPA expects nearly 700 000 people to have used some sort of birth control method — a 17 percent increase on the previous year.

Each person accepting birth control will have cost the FPA $4.60.

In Kenya, which has a 3.8 percent annual population growth rate, the cost is $75 per acceptor.

The cost is worked out simply by dividing the number of acceptors into the total spent during the year by the FPA.

ZAMBIA'S REFUGEE PROBLEM--Zambia's refugee problem has been described as having reached explosive proportions and urgent measures to correct the situation have been called for. A Lusaka spokesman for the United Nations High Commission for Refugees said both the U.N. and the Organisation of African Unity had realised there was urgent need to increase funds allocated to helping refugees. A meeting would be held in Geneva at which the problem would be discussed, Ziana reports. Zambia has refugees mainly from Chad, Ethiopia, South Africa, Namibia and Angola. According to the UNHCR and the Zambia Episcopal Conference Commission for Relief Development, there are more than 35 000 refugees in the country. A spokesman could not, however, confirm reports that more than 800 refugees had just arrived in Zambia from Angola, where heavy fighting between Dr Jonas Savimbi's UNITA movement and ruling MPLA troops was said to be taking place. ZIMBABWE-ZAMBIA PHONE LINK--The STD telephone link between Zimbabwe and Zambia, broken off during UDI, should be fully operational soon, says the Minister of Roads and Road Traffic, Posts and Telecommunications, Mr George Silundika. And a minefield in the Chirundu area, earlier reported to have been hampering work, "was removed some time ago." Replying at the weekend to questions submitted by the HERALD about the resumption of the telecommunications link with Zambia, the Minister said: "Work is under way to restore it as soon as problems of equipment are resolved, as work on the Zimbabwe side has been completed." Altogether 60 channels--Salisbury through Chirundu to Lusaka--would be in use when the STD system returned to normal, said the statement. Independent sources said 24 of the channels would link Zambia with South Africa via Zimbabwe. The Minister's statement said the number of channels from Sinoia to Chirundu could be increased to 120 lines "if the volume of traffic justifies such an increase." The Minister said meetings had taken place between engineers of Zimbabwe and Zambia to coordinate efforts for purposes of ironing out technical problems caused by the electronic exchange system at Lusaka. "Thus, in view of this close technical cooperation between the two countries it is anticipated that the STD link will be fully operational very soon." According to a final communique issued at the end of 3 days of talks between the European and Comoran delegations, the list of aid from the community will be devoted primarily to economic infrastructure, the construction of the ports of Moroni (Greater Comoros) and Fomboni (Moheli), energy, agricultural development, water, small projects, promotion of commerce and professional training. LIFE SENTENCES--Moroni, 18 Dec (AFP)--Three Comoran army officers were sentenced to life imprisonment by the Special Court of Moroni which on Thursday found them guilty of having organized the Iconi massacre on 18 March 1978 during which 12 persons were killed. The court also handed down 20-year prison terms to two other military officials of Mr Ali Soilih's deposed regime, and two 18-year prison terms. The other seven accused received sentences ranging from 6-month suspended sentences to 3 years imprisonment for their role in the massacre. The three men sentenced to life imprisonment, who the Special Court believed were the brains behind the Iconi massacre, were camp commanders under the former regime. They are Mr Mohamed Ahamada, Mr Hassan Kassim and Mr Aboubacr Issa. In addition, the 14 convicts must jointly pay 3 million CFA francs (FF 60,000) as compensation to each of the families of the six victims who filed suit. During the hearings, the accused asked for clemency after acknowledging their errors. A number of witnesses to the Iconi massacre were heard by the court. Mr Soilih's regime was toppled in 1978 by the current president, Mr Ahmed Abdallah, who had support from foreign elements. [Text] [AB182230 Paris AFP in French 1437 GMT 18 Dec 80]

PNP'S 'OLD GUARD' REGISTERS SUPPORT, CONCERN

Expression of Support

Accra GHANAIAN TIMES in English 29 Nov 80 p 1

[Text]

THE working committee of the 'Old Guards' has said that it is not true that their members are determined to withdraw their support for the President, Dr Hilla Limann as leader of the People's National Party (PNP).

The committee has, therefore, dissociated itself from the publication made in an Accra weekly on November 27.

In a press statement issued yesterday, the committee, assured the PNP that the 'Old Guards' had "confidence in the leadership of the party and will continue to support Dr Limann" in accordance with the resolution passed at their meeting on August 24.

The statement said if the 'Old Guards' had any grievances, the working committee would pass it through constitutional means to have it redressed.

Warning Against PNP Factionalism

Accra GHANAIAN TIMES in English 1 Dec 80 p 2

[Editorial: "Arm-twisting Politics?"]

[Text] A few months ago, the 'Times' warned members of the ruling People's National Party on the dangers of encouraging factionalism, based on personal interests, emerging in the party.

The paper reminded members to cast their minds back to the events which strengthened the hands of the enemy to strike against the First Republic and guard against any tendencies which would divide the rank and file of the party.

Our concern here is that a divided ruling party will not augur well for Ghana.

Since the PNP claims to be an offspring of the Convention People's Party, it is necessary that its members learn from past mistakes and rather help to build a united instead of a divided party.

As a mass movement, the PNP is bound to have in its midst a mixture of persons with different ideas, all claiming to seek the same goal.

Such groups as left, centre and right wings do exist in political parties in all the democracies, whether in the East, West or the Third World countries.

Indeed, there is a current struggle within the British Labour Party in which the left wing group is gaining the upper hand.

What is necessary in all these cases is the ultimate goal or objective which the various groups pursue.

In the PNP at the moment are such groups as the Youth Wing, the Women's Wing, the Old Guards and the Kwame Nkrumah Revolutionary Guards.

Within the CPP, the youth wing, known as the Youth League, was used as the nursery ground for the party.

Members were also used effectively for propaganda or field work at the base.

Perhaps it is for the same reason that the PNP and the other parties have formed their youth wings.

Puzzle

The women's wing, as the name implies, has an ovbious role to play.

The Kwame Nkrumah Revolutionary Guards, we consider, are a left wing group and mainly concerned with the party not abandoning the Nkrumah cause. It spells no danger.

It is the formation of the 'Old Guards' which continues to puzzle the minds of many, despite the assurances from their organizers that they mean no harm.

For utterances at some of the 'Old Guards' meetings are rather disturbing, as to their real intentions.

On our part, we would find nothing wrong with such men of experience making their humble suggestions to the recognized leadership of the party.

In the same vein, we find it difficult to consider it proper for such experienced men to behave as if they are the owners of the party, and thus have the right to dictate their terms.

Let's all face it.

The PNP won the elections not because of the presence of some old faces. Some were indeed a liability. Their time is past.

The party simply won because of the Kwame Nkrumah tag. The youth must, therefore, have if not more, equal say as the old in the party.

Indeed, if one were to refer to history, Kwame Nkrumah had to break away from the 'Old Guards' then constituting the United Gold Coast Convention to form a party of the youth. The 'Old Guards' were reactionary, he said.

We are quite happy to note from the weekend assurance by the 'Old Guards' that they still hold allegiance to the leadership of the party.

May it remain so.

Concern Over Appointments

Accra GHANAIAN TIMES in English 2 Dec 80 p 3

[Text] The 'Old Guards' of the People's National Party (PNP) have expressed grave concern over the present mode of political appointments being made by the Government.

According to them, preference was being given to outsiders instead of loyal dedicated and experienced activists of the party.

A six-point resolution adopted by the guards' interim committee at their last weekend meeting at Koforidua and presented to Alhaji Imoru Egala, founder of the party, to be handed over to President Hilla Limann, said the Government should not neglect the 'Old Guards.'

They stated that it was through their relentless efforts, sweat and sacrifices and the goodwill which the people of the country had for the late Osagyefo, Dr Kwame Nkrumah and his erstwhile Convention People's Party (CPP) that PNP won the last Parliamentary and Presidential Elections.

It called on the Government to create job avenues to absorb some of the unemployed and see to the immediate reestablishment of the Workers Brigade. It should also expand the Food Production and State Farms Corporations, and the Ghana National Reconstruction Corps as contained in the party's manifesto.

In their view the PNP Government had no political direction. Besides the performances of some of the Ministers had not had the desired impact, and the recent Cabinet reshuffle was unrealistic.

In consideration of these facts the Government should consider tapping the rich experience and wisdom of the 'Old Guards' in both governmental and party activities, the resolution said.

With the abrogation of the PNP and United National Convention (UNC) alliance all UNC members holding important and sensitive appointments should declare their stand publicly.

It pointed out that the appointment of Members of Parliament as chairmen of Board of Corporations was not in consonance with the spirit of the party's constitution.

In a speech, Alhaji Egala denied that the 'Old Guards' had formed a party outside the PNP, stressing that "I cannot build a house and pull it down."

GOVERNMENT GUIDELINES RESTRICT OFFICIAL TRAVEL

Accra GHANAIAN TIMES in English 9 Dec 80 p 1

[Text] The Government has issued new guidelines on overseas travels by public servants for various official duties.

Designed to check unnecessary travels overseas and to ease the strains on the country's foreign exchange resources, the guidelines were contained in a circular issued from the Office of the President and addressed to principal secretaries, regional administrative officers and heads of statutory boards and corporations.

According to it, only official travels likely to bring in or save foreign exchange resources, as for example, delegations to negotiate aid resources or to bring in essential inputs as well as those involving attendance to conferences organized by recognized international bodies to which Ghana is committed should receive priority attention.

Even in these cases, the circular stressed full use should as far as possible be made of the relevant staff in the country's missions abroad.

Circular

According to the circular these guidelines had become necessary because after a careful and critical review of travels in the past year, it had become clear that most of these overseas travels had been of very little value in the country and had not justified the expenditure involved.

The Government has accordingly directed that all travel requests submitted through the ministries should be critically and thoroughly examined to ensure that only those falling within the guidelines were recommended to the Office of the President for consideration.

The circular finally requested principal secretaries and other public officials to ensure that where telex messages would serve long distance telephone calls should be avoided. Similarly where a letter will serve the same purpose the use of telex should be avoided.

EXPEDITING OF FOREIGN LOANS RECOMMENDED

Accra DAILY GRAPHIC in English 9 Dec 80 p 2

[Editorial]

[Text]

GHANA cannot do without foreign loans. This does not mean we should accept loans from any quarters without taking care of the ulterior motives of the donors.

However, we hold the view that the present procedures for concluding international loan agreements are tainted with corruption.

It is time the Limann Administration brought to book Government officials who thwart its efforts.

Conscious of the economic position of the country, we hope the officials of the Ministry of Finance and Economic Planning would expedite action on such loan agreements. Bureaucracy is delaying too much of our economic projects.

We agree with the committee's recommendation that the Attorney-General's Department should educate all public servants on the constitutional responsibilities of their ministries.

Public servants should be reminded that such delays in future will be treated as gross dereliction of duty which will lead to summary dismissal of officials concerned.

BRIEFS

CLOSING OF BORDERS--The President, Dr Hilla Limann, has revealed that the continued closure of most of the country's borders was connected with national security. He explained that some elements were being financed from outside to cause troubles in the country. Addressing a People's National Party (PNP) fund raising rally at Kpedze on Sunday, Dr Limann warned that Government would deal seriously with anyone who tried to subvert the country. The President said of 36 entry points in the country, past Governments had maintained only 12 because of such vicious activities. He, however, assured the people that the subject was under critical examination. The President repeated that the Government was bent on reconciling the people and healing past wounds. He therefore appealed to chiefs and all Ghanaians to heed his appeal for social peace since infighting will not do us any good. [Excerpt] [Accra GHANAIAN TIMES in English 9 Dec 80 p 1]

OFFICE OF AUDITOR GENERAL BEING CONSIDERED

Windhoek DIE REPUBLIKEIN in Afrikaans 21 Nov 80 p 4

[Text] Legislation is to be introduced for the appointment of an auditor general for Southwest Africa. Such a decision was taken in principle this week by the Ministerial Council.

A proposal in this respect will be submitted in the course of the February meeting of the National Assembly.

The plan calls for the establishment of a department of the auditor general as of 1 April 1981.

It was announced in a statement that the appointment of an auditor general has been necessitated in view of the fact that money for government spending is being made available through the National Assembly and under the legislative bodies in the Southwest.

The auditing of government establishments is now being done by the auditor general of the Republic of South Africa.

The Ministerial Council also decided that for the present there will be no action with respect to building a government complex. The decision has, however, been made to identify the plot of ground behind the White Administration Building as an appropriate site for a future government complex.

The decision not to go ahead with the construction of a government complex was taken in light of greater priorities in the development of the country.

Because of the acute shortage in office accommodations in Windhoek, the decision has been made to go on with the planning of an office block for government departments.

SWAPO ADMONISHED ON ITS NEGATIVE ATTITUDE

Windhoek DIE REPUBLIKEIN in Afrikaans 21 Nov 80 p 4

[Editorial: "SWAPO's Language"]

[Text] SWAPO got cold feet again when a multiparty conference on the dragging Southwest question was about to be clinched. Now the question is being asked as to whether it will serve any purpose to continue trying to negotiate with SWAPO.

While South Africa is being threatened with sanctions unless rapid progress is made on Southwest Africa's future independence, its viewpoint is that a multiparty conference is important, but it is seriously doubted that such a conference can bring about any sort of solution, even if SWAPO should agree to participate in it along with the other internal Southwest Africa parties.

Therefore the evident failure of the so-called "peace" attainable through a multiparty conference, but which is irreversibly heading for the old Rhodesia pattern, is much too conspicuous.

Evidently SWAPO understands only one language and that is the language from the barrel of an AK-47. The only way to move it to see other views is to give it a reply in that language...as the forces of the Southwest and of South Africa are now doing with a great deal of success.

It was the commander in chief of the military forces in the Southwest, Maj Gen Charles Lloyd who, while recently speaking before the Afrikaner Chamber of Commerce in Windhoek, stated that if no other way can be found, SWAPO will be destroyed.

It is now beginning to look as though this decision is more and more the obvious one that has to be taken.

For the Southwest and for South Africa, which irrespective of death and suffering have already had to sacrifice many millions to this struggle, while this money could have been used elsewhere in the interest of peaceful coexistence, and the development which this requires, this is not a pleasant prospect.

But this appears to be the only one.

NEW PRIVATE SECTOR FOUNDATION ESTABLISHED

Windhoek DIE SUIDWESTER in Afrikaans 21 Nov 80 p 1

[Text] An enterprise which will concentrate on the promotion of social urban development in Southwest Africa was established yesterday in Windhoek.

The name of this new enterprise is Private Sector Foundation [PSS] and 29 companies are already members of it.

The foundation's board consists of nine known businessmen with Secretary of Waterways Charles Truebody as its executive director. He will be assuming his new position on 1 December.

The other members of the board are I.R.J.Williams (chairman), who is chief director of Shell SWA; Harold Pupkewitz, who directs 14 companies; Douglas Hoffe, the local director of the CDM; George Siddle, who directs the Barlow Group in the Southwest; David Godfrey, the director of the Rossing foundation; Desmond Mathews, the director of Trust and Mining; Martin Shipanga, the chairman of the Namibia Chamber of Commerce; and Larry Kritzinger, who is a partner in a chartered accounting firm.

Yesterday Williams stated that the foundation is starting out with 750,000 rand in cash and with services being made available by various companies in Southwest Africa. He expects considerable participation and contribution from the private sector in the future.

Objectives

The objectives of the PSS are:

--the promotion of an all-inclusive code of employment;

--the promotion of housing standards and home ownership;

--the coordination and promotion of training aimed at improving the income potential of unskilled and semiskilled manpower and of small merchants.

Truebody described the present social-urban conditions among the less fortunate as "a critical area in terms of future social stability."

The PSS will be doing research on this problem and develop a program of assistance with emphasis on self-help and on the value of the system of free enterprise.

During the following months, the foundation's activity will concentrate mainly on research.

SABC PROMOTING USE OF AFRIKAANS LANGUAGE

Windhoek DIE SUIDWESTER in Afrikaans 21 Nov 80 p 4

[Text] "The eager microphone calls upon the creativity of our people and helps them develop their writing skill. By so doing, the radio and television of today is providing an indispensable service in the propagation and enrichment of the Afrikaans language." This is what Prof W.L. Mouton, the chairman of the SABC [South African Broadcasting Corporation], board of directors, said in the course of the ATKV [Afrikaans Language Cultural Association] congress celebration.

"Ever since the establishment of the Afrikaans service of the SABC, during the second half of 1937, dedicated men and women have taken this occasion to promote and to enrich Afrikaans.

"Translations opened up our windows to an enriching world literature, while original word creations must have helped our technical language to keep in step with a developing world and to allow listeners to live through sports events with the aid of our own sport terminology."

Professor Mouton, the man who controls the mightiest medium--namely, the radio and television of South Africa--added that Radio RSA is carrying Afrikaans far beyond our borders.

Television is demonstrating the applicability and expressive power of our language through the medium of borrowings from other languages. At the same time the doors of thousands of English-speaking viewers are opened up to Afrikaans and thus the need for understanding Afrikaans, to learn and to enjoy it, is created.

"Television is a razor-sharp instrument which, if used responsibly, can establish new breakthroughs for our language."

Professor Mouton went on to point out that Afrikaans literature has outgrown its childhood shoes since 1930 and this can be demonstrated if one looks at its literature of the past 50 years.

"Today the joint responsibility of tempering and expanding our Afrikaans literature to a universal confirmation of its scholarliness rests upon our writers, critics, publishers and readers."

In the business world, it is possible for one now to detect a more favorable disposition toward Afrikaans by business enterprises normally using other languages.

The main language of enterprises is determined by the people controlling them. Up until the thirties there were but few business enterprises managed by Afrikaners.

"Despite the original backward position today we have the necessary terminology for conducting business in Afrikaans in almost every part of our country."

Mouton explained that due to the fact that we are living in a multilingual country the various languages are, consciously or unconsciously, competing with each other for a place of preference besides the mother language involved. On the surface, it would seem that Afrikaans ought to enjoy high regard because it is one of the official languages. It is employed as the mother language by two-thirds of the white community and by a large percentage of the colored community. The Afrikaner is beginning to play an ever-increasing role in the conomy of the country and it is also the language of the ruling party and the language of the civil service.

Nevertheless, from a study carried out by G.K. Schuring, it would seem that knowledge of English is relatively strong in graphic values (reading and writing),while Afrikaans is relatively strong in acoustic (understanding and speaking) values.

The higher qualified people tend to choose English over Afrikaans and generally speaking English is more popular than Afrikaans. However, for practical considerations, Afrikaans is not being ignored by the blacks. Professor Mouton sums it up as follows: "English is the language of prestige, while Afrikaans has more pragmatic values."

Various factors are interacting for this state of affairs among black people. The black Afrikaans instructor seldom has more than an ST-8 certificate and a teaching diploma. There exists a lack of motivation trend for learning Afrikaans and the broken Afrikaans used by Afrikaans speakers in their contact with the black people does not contribute much to the spread of Afrikaans among the black people.

Interest for Afrikaans must be aroused among black people as this will certainly contribute to greater understanding and healthier human relations. This also holds true for learning the language of the black man.

Professor Mouton emphasized the necessity of mutal respect for the sake of selling our language to the compatriots speaking other languages.

"If we do not command their respect as humans, they will reject and scorn our language and this also applies to all people speaking other languages in our country.

PLANS REPORTED UNDERWAY TO OUST KADUNA GOVERNOR

Lagos DAILY TIMES in English 1 Dec 80 p 40

[Text] PLANS are now under way for the removal of the Kaduna State Governor, Alhaji Balarabe Musa. And this will be done before the end of 1981.

This was disclosed by the Majority Leader of the Kaduna State House of Assembly, Alhaji Danda Mani in an interview with our staff reporter in Kaduna.

He said that the legislature had now got sufficient grounds to institute impeachment proceedings against the governor.

"In fact, members of the public are even blaming us for the delay in impeaching the governor", he said that "the delay does not mean we have no grounds to make that move".

Alhaji Mani disclosed that motion would soon be tabled in the House as a first step to removing the state's chief executive.

Already, he said, sufficient time had been given to the Governor to see reason and act within the framework of the Constitution. But, Alhaji Mani declared: "We now realise that waiting for reason on the part of the governor would be like embarking on a wild-goose chase".

Asked whether Alhaji Balarabe was aware of the moves Alhaji Mani said that the governor knew that there was little hope for him to remain in the office beyond 1981.

LEGISLATORS WALK OUT OVER PRP LEADERSHIP ISSUE

Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 3 Dec 80 p 7

[Article by Yinka Kwesi Guedon]

[Text] PEOPLE'S Redemption Party [PRP] legislators pressing for a new party leadership in the House of Representatives staged a walk-out from the House on Monday.

Their action was sequel to Speaker Ume Ezeoke's ruling that the motion they filed for a change of PRP leadership in the House be struck out.

The motion, tabled last Friday, could not debated because of the speaker's absence.

At Monday's sitting, Mr. Ezeoke told the House that it was improper for him to entertain the motion since a court case over PRP crisis was still pending in court.

'It would not be proper for me to go into this issue when the court case over PRP crisis is still pending in a Lagos High Court,' he said.

He, therefore, ruled that the motion be accordingly struck out.

At this stage, about 25 PRP members in the House filed out and assembled somewhere in the National Assembly premises where they held a meeting for about 15 minutes.

Speaking to newsmen after the meeting, a spokesman for the members, Malam Sule Lamido alleged that the speaker's inconsistency on the PRP issue was as a result of his (Speaker's) financial collusion with Malam Aminu Kano.

On why they wanted a new leadership, Malam Sule alleged that they were prompted by the fact that their leaders were truants, adding that "their presence for the business of the House is below the constitutional requirements."

He also accused the present leader, Alhaji M. Mustapha of fraud.

According to him, Alhaji Mustapha had on several occasions deleted names of PRP members travelling abroad, collected the tickets and absconded without proceeding on the journey.

He gave the names of two members who had been victims of the leader as Representatives Sitti Baba and Sarki Adamu.

But commenting on this, Alhaji Mustapha said it was the duty of the party leader to approve the number of persons to accompany the various committees.

Malam Sule disclosed that the constitutional aspect on party split may be evoked if the situation did not improve.

According to him, moves to change the leadership had been on since last December 'with the speaker's knowledge'.

RUSSIANS REPORTED CONCERNED AT SLOW STEEL PACE

Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 21 Nov 80 p 1

[Text] RUSSIAN contractors handling the Ajaokuta Steel Project have expressed grave concern over the delay in implementing the construction schedules for the project. Official sources disclosed that Russian concern arose from the delay by Nigeria to fulfil its contract obligations in respect of the civil engineering works whose contract was awarded in late September, two months behind schedule.

According to the sources, the steel ministry was due to deliver foundations for both the billet storehouse and the finished products by December 15, this year. Administration base was also due for delivery by the same period. Up till now work on the project site was only at the ground levelling stage, the sources said.

The Russians have already indicated that unless Nigeria fulfilled these obligations and approved the working schedules previously agreed to by the two parties, steel may not start rolling from the Ajaokuta plant in 1983. Our sources further disclosed that the Russians reminded the Federal Government of the basic conditions for commissioning the small-section steel mill in June 1983.

One such condition, the sources said, was the commencement of civil works early in October, this year, as well as making first foundations ready for erecting steel structures by December, 1980.

It was pointed out that unless these working schedules are agreed and approved before the end of this month, the delay may have an adverse effect on the agreed date for commissioning of the steel plant. It was understood that following agreement with Russian delegation in October this year, the master and working schedules of the Ajaokuta plant should have been discussed in Moscow this month. It was a matter of concern, however, that the departure date for the Nigerian delegation to the talks was postponed on two occasions, the sources said.

According to the sources, the Federal Government has been advised by the Russians to ensure that schedules are agreed and approved not later than the end of this month so as to enable the contractors to start work without further delay.

IMPACT OF OIL ON ECONOMY DISCUSSED

Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 20, 21, 22 Nov 80

[20 Nov 80 p 5]

[Text] IT is fair to observe that, the discussion of this subject, "The Impact of Petroleum on the Nigerian Economy," in this country has often, over the last few years, been characterised by a great deal of smoke and heat and very little light. It is, also fair to observe that the commentaries, even though not argued on the basis of available statistics and measurable developments, have been overwhelmingly critical and pessimistic.

Perhaps, the general consensus amongst our so-called intelligentsia is that there has been very little positive impact on the Nigerian Economy from the exploitation of our petroleum resources, and that such impact as there is, has been disruptive and negative.

I honestly believe that this view is very wrong judging by economic and developmental yardsticks and moreover it is politically dangerous for everyone regardless of party affiliation or status. But this is not to say that we have used the resources generated by oil optimally, or that there have been no distortions in certain sectors of the economy even though the impact has been very beneficial.

I believe that we should first of all construct a framework for our examination of this all important subject. How do we begin to measure and assess the "Impact of Petroleum on the Nigerian Economy"?

I would suggest that we approach our enquiry from the following aspects: (1) The direct impact of petroleum measured by: (a) Direct contributions to National Income; (b) The generation of employment and manpower development, and the utilisation of various factors of production in activities directly relating to petroleum exploration and production.

(2) Linkage effects (Industrial) resulting from initiatives of the oil industry or opportunities created by the industry e.g. — Petroleum refining — Petrochemical industries — Oil transportation. On the other side of the coin we should examine possible negative impact on other activities e.g. agriculture and fisheries.

(3) The indirect impact arising from government utilisation of the financial resources generated by the oil industry. Again, on the other side, we should assess the impact of rapidly increasing oil revenues on the quality of the management of public funds.

(4) Finally, we should explore the politics — economic dimension of the subject under the following headings: The impact on internal political relations — Centre versus States — Oil States versus non-oil states — Public sector in relation to the private sector — Distortions on consumption patterns and — The consequences from the explosion of the people's expectations.

Further, we should study the implications for our external economic and political relations particularly with our neighbours.

NATIONAL INCOME:

Now we shall examine the direct impact of petroleum on our National Income. As you are all aware the absolute size of the National Income and its rate of growth are a very common and useful measure of economic welfare.

I should begin this section by quoting the opening remarks of the then Honourable Minister of Finance, the late Chief Festus Okotie-Eboh in initiating the debate in March, 1961 in the House of Representatives on the "Sovereignty Budget" of 1961-62.

"Mr. Speaker, Sir, I have it in command from H. E. the Governor-General to move that a Bill for an Act to appropriate the sum of fifty-two million, nine hundred and four thousand, two hundred and eighty pounds to the service of the year ending on thirty-first day of March, one thousand nine hundred and sixty-two" be read a second time. That was the Minister's third Federal Budget — the size — just N64 million! It was not until 1964-65, I believe that the Federal Budget reached £160 million or N320 million. And that was just fifteen years ago!

In 1979-1980 the Revised Revenue figures is N12.886 billion and the Estimate for the 9 months April — December 1980 is N11.880 billion. The difference in a period of 15 years is so great. It is almost unbelievable And as we shall see, the difference is entirely due to the exploitation of our oil resources.

As we all know there were short lived exploration efforts just before the 1st and 2nd World Wars. The search for oil began in earnest after the 2nd World War. Oil exports began in 1957 with 300,000 tonnes or 2½ million barrels for the year. In 1958 it was only 5,000 barrels a day. It rose steadily and by 1966 it had reached 415,000 barrels a day only to fall with the crisis and civil war to 142,000 barrels a day in 1968. However, with the end of the civil war it rose sharply from 580,000 barrels a day in January 1970 to 2,000,000 barrels a day by August 1972. We had thus become established as a major world producer.

Even more significant than the increase in quantities were the increases in prices to follow after 1973.

But we should just look back a little. Scott R. Pearson in his book on "Petroleum and the Nigerian Economy" published in 1970 calculates the value added to the Gross National Product as £7.7 million in 1963 and £32.0 million in 1967 and payments to the government amounted to £5.0 million and £27.0 million respectively.

The World Oil Industry was then completely dominated by seven major Western oil companies — often called the seven sisters. They contrived to keep the market oil price, Arab Light, artificially low and unchanging from 1948-71. Reduced from the 1948 price of $2.08 it stood at $1.80 a barrel from 1960 to 1971. After epoch-making negotiations in Tripoli, Lagos and Teheran in 1971 posted prices were increased by about 40-50 cents a barrel and our effective revenues rose from about 90 cents a barrel to about $1.65 dollars a barrel. That was OPEC victory then! Significant, but a far cry from the price of Bonny Light today, nine years later, of $37.00 a barrel!!

The impact of these developments on our National Income and our capacity to generate resources for development has naturally been very dramatic.

The 1st National Plan 1955-1962 was to cost £184 million. Actual Capital Expenditure during the period was £85 million or ₦170 million. The size of the 1962 — 1968 Plan was £1183 million or about ₦2.2 billion, that of the 1970 — 1974 Plan was ₦3.2 billion. In comparison the Investment Programme of the 1975-80 Plan amounted to ₦30 billion and it assumed near 100% financing by national savings as opposed to the 50% dependence on foreign aid assumed in previous plans and never attained.

Summing up the contrast the authors of the Third National Plan had this to say: "It has been possible to paint this rather optimistic picture of the Nigerian economy mainly because of recent improvements in the prices of crude petroleum and in the tax rates applicable to the industry. Furthermore, the decision of government to acquire substantial equity participation in the industry will increase the impact of the oil industry on the rest of the economy. While oil will account for about 49% of the Gross Domestic Product during the Plan period, its contributions to government revenues and foreign exchange earnings will be approximately 85%. The main strategy of the Third Plan therefore, is to put the impact of petroleum on the economy on a more permanent footing by internalising the rapid growth in that sector through the sectoral investment programmes and the policy package articulated elsewhere in this document.

The projected levels of oil output should not be regarded as Plan targets as such. They are based on an assessment of the productive capacity of the sector but actual output will depend on prevailing international market conditions as well as overall policy on the management of national resources."

The contents and achievements of these national plans will be discussed in greater detail later in assessing the economic impact of the utilisation by government of the financial resources created by the exploitation of petroleum.

EMPLOYMENT:

Next, we wish to consider the impact on employment and the development of higher level manpower.

Of its very nature the oil industry is capital and equipment-intensive and employs a relatively small number of people considering its financial importance. All the employees in the industry in Nigeria would number less than 10,000. Management, supervisory and skilled people would constitute not more than 1,500 persons — this for an industry whose export turnover currently exceeds $20,000 million.

At the beginning of the search for oil in a country the first priority is usually to create through incentives and other policy measures a climate in which companies with the necessary financial resources and know-how are attracted to explore as intensively as possible in order to discover commercially exploitable deposits of oil. Then it becomes a question of encouraging them to commence production and to increase the rate of production as rapidly as possible. At that stage, policy is usually less concerned with maximising the returns from oil to the economy lest in the circumstances prevailing before 1973 the foreign companies are frightened away.

It is fair to observe that we in Nigeria, in concert with other members of OPEC in the Middle East and in North Africa as well as in Latin America, many of whom preceded us in the field of oil production, passed through this stage. It was only towards the end of the decade of the 60s, and in particular after the civil war, that the Nigerian Government was able to turn its attention towards increasing the impact of petroleum on the Nigerian economy in its various aspects.

As regards manpower development, the government stipulated quite clearly in the Petroleum Decree of 1969 that all oil companies producing in Nigeria should within 10 years of the commencement of production have Nigerianised their most senior positions up to at least 75 per cent and the other cadres by 100 per cent. Within this framework officials in the Ministry of Internal Affairs and the Inspectorate Division in the Ministry of Mines and Power became stricter in their processing of applications of oil companies for expatriate quota.

However, it must be confessed that although there were a few Nigerians of the best quality in some senior positions, the speed of Nigerianisation of the higher technical and professional positions in the oil companies was very slow. This was to make it very difficult at the establishment of the Nigerian National Oil Corporation in 1971 to find ready-made top level staff who could be spared from the producing companies to man the key divisions of the NNOC.

Yet with the added leverage obtained from the Participation Agreements negotiated with the oil companies from 1973 onwards and with a sizable training budget of NNOC quicker progress was made in training Nigerians and enabling them to assume still higher responsibilities. In addition, Petroleum Training Institute was started in Warri in 1975 for the production of technicians.

It is fair to conclude that in terms of the generation of employment and the development of skilled manpower the oil industry in Nigeria after 23 years of production and exportation has not really made a significant on general development.

Again with regard to the employment of indigenous local services, for example, seismic work, civil engineering and supplies of various materials, the results have also been poor partly through the original policies of the oil companies, and partly through the unwillingness of Nigerians to engage effectively in such activities.

INDUSTRIAL EFFECTS:

We should now turn our attention to the second aspect, that is, the industrial linkage effects from the operations of the oil industry. Within five years from the commercial discovery of oil in Nigeria, the Nigerian Government took steps to begin the construction of the first petroleum refinery. When it was commissioned in 1965 it made Nigeria self-sufficient then as regards gasoline and diesel for motor vehicles and kerosene for domestic uses. We, however, still had to import aviation fuel, lubricants and other special ore products. But certainly the first refinery was an important contribution to the economy.

Again in 1978 and more recently, this year, second and third petroleum refineries were commissioned at Warri and Kaduna respectively. In full production these three refineries would cover a much wider range of petroleum products and make us nearly self-sufficient in conventional petroleum products up till about 1983. Given however the phenomenal rate of the expansion of petroleum consumption in this country, and the absence of an overall energy policy which will increase our utilisation of other sources of energy such as coal and lignite and associated gas, this rate of expansion will require the commissioning of another major refinery by about 1985.

Nigeria has been able to save some foreign exchange which would have been paid to refiners abroad. Equally important, the refineries give us security of supply of vitally needed petroleum products.

Some of you may recall the very anxious two weeks at the beginning of the civil war when the oil companies suddenly informed the Federal Government that there were no stocks of petroleum products at the bulk storage depots at Apapa and elsewhere in the country. Emergency measures had to be taken, including seeking Russian assistance to divert to Lagos a Soviet tanker carrying petroleum products. Without petroleum supplies the war effort and economy would have grounded to a halt. Of course, in the wake of such energetic reaction, in the event, the oil companies "managed" to find oil products in time.

While there are many West African countries which have built refineries based on imported crude petroleum, there is no doubt that the economics of operating refineries based on local crudes is much more positive and the spectacular programme of refinery development in Nigeria has been directly linked to our position as producers of petroleum.

With regard to other directly linked industrial activities e.g. the development of a petrochemical industry to serve our rapidly expanding plastics fabrication industries, textile industries, and industries to produce fertilizers, etc. we have very little to show for more than a decade of planning and talking and negotiating. The reasons for this failure, in developing industries especially in a sector where we could have achieved a dramatic increase in the value added from our petroleum and so contributed directly to our national income and earned considerable foreign exchange savings as well, will be examined in greater detail when we discuss the general question of the utilisation of Government revenues from oil.

Again in relation to the development of a tanker fleet to carry a part of our oil exports and thereby earn additionally whatever margins are available from such activities, the result is one of failure to exploit past opportunities. And in this, we are very backward compared with other OPEC countries.

It is not that good proposals have not been received and processed but it is a question of constantly changing priorities by different administrations of the country. Given also the amount of imported steel pipes, pumps and metres we import for the oil industry and the several very good manufacturing proposals received, we should by now be producing such items and so increased the impact of oil on the Nigerian economy thereby. We have failed to do so.

The conclusion from this survey must be that in terms of the development of directly linked industrial development, and the generation of employment, or the the development of highly skilled manpower the country has failed to make such progress as it could have made from the exploitation of our oil resources. Yet, however, as I said earlier there has been a dramatic impact of oil on the Nigerian economy and a benefical one too, and it is from the examination of the third set of issues — namely the impact arising from government utilisation of the revenues from oil that we can more clearly see the benefits we have derived so far from the oil industry.

We have earlier noted the significant increase in the Second National Plan, 1970-74, over the First Plan of 1962-63, and the tremendous size of the 1975-80 Plan which is totally explained by the increased availability of financial resources arising from the taxes paid by the oil industry. Indeed the Second Plan called for a capital expenditure of ₦3.2 billion and estimated that the Gross Domestic Product would grow from ₦3.028 billion in 1969-70 to ₦3.987 billion in 1973-74 in real terms. It envisaged a growth rate of 6.6% over the period. It projected that the sectoral contributions to the Gross National Products would be Agriculture — 44.2%, Mining — 13.4%, and Manufacturing and Crafts — 12.4%.

In fact the GDP at current cost rose from ₦9.442 billion in 1970-71 to ₦14.410 billion in 1974-75 and an overall growth rate of over 8% was achieved. In arriving at this it was found that in fact Agriculture and Manufacturing contributed only 24.7% and 4.8% respectively while Mining — in this case mainly petroleum — contributed 45.1% instead of planned 13.4%. It is clear, therefore, that one great impact of petroleum was to make possible a much higher level of consumption and national savings and these are significant economic benefits.

During the Second Plan period it was possible to repair the distruption and damage of the civil war and to put back the economy on reasonable footing largely because of the increased availability resources from oil.

Coming nearer to the present, the Third Plan which is about to end called for gross capital formation rising from ₦2.6 billion in 1974-75 to ₦9.1 billion in 1979-80 representing 20.8% of GDP to 29.4% of GDP. These are certainly remarkable targets made wholly possible by availability of money from oil.

I know that it was claimed sometime ago in some quarters that the government-induced depression of our economy in 1977-78 was due to wrong projections of resources to the be earned from oil during the plan period. Such claims must have been made by officials who did not read the plan properly. I have quoted already the section dealing with oil accounts in the plan and the caveat written into it. What they did not know — and as officials we should always be objective and thorough in promoting the ends of the government of the day — is that the finance projections were conservative and did not flow from the physical scenario of possible maximum development of our oil exports written into sections of the plan.

What they also failed to point out to their political bosses were the distortions particularly on cash-flows introduced by delaying productive self-financing industrial schemes which in 1975 were ready for execution of contracts e.g. Warri Refinery, Internal Pipeline network, tank farms etc. while they accelerated the infrastructure and educational projects; as well as the introduction of non-plan projects e.g. the new Federal Capital project — eminently desirable as it may be.

But indeed in fact the actual revenues earned in 1975 to 1980 amounted to ₦139.50 billion as compared with Third Plan projections of ₦43.78 billion. That is 90% success and not bad at all! And if we add the over ₦2.7 billion of lost sales opportunities due essentially to wrong and uncompetitive prices adopted for our oil in 1977 to 1978 the nearness of plan projections to actual realised revenues would have been much closer still.

INDIRECT IMPACT:

Now let us analyse the investment targets in the various sectors of the plan and actual achievement both for the 1970-74 plan and the 1980-85 plan. We find at once that the bulk of the planned expenditure is for infrastructural activities. Thus major allocations in the current plan call for 6.5 billion Naira for land transport, 3.9 billion Naira for telecommunications, 964 million Naira for water transport, 2.83 billion Naira for education and ₦1.05 billion for water resources, and this could be compared with 837.3 million Naira for agriculture. Even more striking than the plan allocations are the results achieved. We discovered that during the Second Plan, while roads and electricity achieved their targets by up to about 70 per cent the performance of industry and agriculture was very disappointing.

With regard to agriculture, it is often claimed that because of the development of petroleum, agriculture was neglected. I do not think this is whole truth. I shall quote this extract from Professor Arthur Lewis' 'Reflections on Nigeria's Economic Growth' published in Paris in 1967. He estimated that "between 1950-52 to 1961-63 the overall index for Southern Nigeria prices paid to farmers fell from 100 to 73 while that for wages paid by the Federal Government to unskilled labour increased from 100 to 297."

This was before, oil became significant. Therefore, the decline in our agricultural production, or rather its failure to keep pace with the rate of development in other sectors, is largely explained by the incentives and rewards available in agriculture relative to those obtaining in other sectors. Not until recently, with the greatly increased producer prices and subsidized inputs for farming, has the government begun earnestly to try to stimulate agricultural development.

Again one must observe that while it is true that oil helps to mask the consequences of failing agriculture, and that this could not have been masked for so long, or be absorbed by the Nigerian economy without the benefits of oil, it is equally true that the absence of oil does not necessarily stimulate government to pay the critical attention needed to the development of more productive agriculture. The examples of Liberia and Ghana on the West Coast of Africa are eloquent in this regard.

I believe, however, that there are a number of critically important things we should be doing in the agricultural sector which we are not doing sufficiently. A more extensive programme of profitable producer prices for all major foodstuffs should be introduced. At the same time we should set effective country-wide government-financed buying organisations to buy from the farmers at harvest time all their products they are willing to sell to the government buying organisation. But it should be voluntary. Farmers should be free to sell elsewhere if they will make better profits elsewhere. Such producer prices should be fixed taking into account the prices of fertilisers and other essential inputs which the farmer would need to buy from effective and efficient private commercial distributors of such inputs including tractor and other equipment services.

The government should not engage directly in wasteful importation of fertiliser mountains — imports which are often mis-timed and are not suitable. We have seen that the political and civil service machinery cannot do such things efficiently.

Together with setting up well-funded buying organisations, the government should set up directly on its own where necessary and better still, where possible, encourage private interests to set up processing, freezing and storage organisations all over the country to reduce the annual enormous losses of foodstuffs, sometimes estimated at as high as 40 per cent of harvests due to pests and the weather.

In releasing such food already purchased from farmers at guaranteed producer prices, and stored in good conditions, the government can directly apply whatever level of subsidy it considers desirable in keeping with reducing the rate of inflation and alleviating the suffering of the masses.

This is where we must learn from the conflicting examples of America, Russia and the Common Market.

Now, these are not new ideas. The new attitude we need if we are to increase the impact of oil revenues in this regard is to boldly and freely use imported foreign expertise, and foreign-controlled enterprises as well to achieve these things. Foreigners cannot uproot and take away the farms they develop nor can we fail to benefit from the production of abundant food in Nigeria even by foreign-owned firms. And we must have confidence in the ability of our people to emulate good practices and to compete effectively.

Certainly the massive investment and improvement of roads in Nigeria has been phenomenal. I believe that this is one area in which the impact of oil revenues has been greatly felt. Under the Second Plan 3,250 kilometres of roads were reconstructed and tarred. At the end of the plan a further 4,000 kilometres of roads and over 30 bridges were under construction. Under the Third Plan the Federal Government committed itself to responsibility for 27,000 kilometres of Trunk A and B roads and was actually to be involved in a programme of over 31,000 kilometres of roads.

There is no doubt that the network and quality of roads which exist in Nigeria today are far superior to what obtains elsewhere in Africa. Access of rural areas to urban markets has been greatly facilitated. Indirect though this is, it has a great beneficial impact on the development of agriculture and the transformation of the rural areas and this is something we tend to neglect in our criticisms of the use to which oil money has been put.

[22 Nov 80 p 5]

[Text]

Again, in other areas, particularly education, water resources development, telecomunications, development of ports, harbours and so forth, enormous sums have expended to create facilities for a rapidly expanded level of economic activity. Such infrastructural expenditure could not have been financed by foreign aid. Indeed, it has been made possible only because we had resources of oil to fall back on. Certainly, if given the credit-worthiness generated by our position as oil producers, we were able boldly to produce projects and to invest in directly productive sectors of industry and agriculture, we would today be enjoying a more visible impact of oil on the economy. But why has this not been possible?

I believe that these are the serious issues to which groups such as yours in the public service, and this includes not only the civil service but also the universities should address themselves. I believe we have largely failed in translating our oil revenues into more farms and industries, greater employment, faster transfer of technology because of our lack of executive capacity to manage the conception and implementation of such desirable projects.

This has been due, I believe, to the premature exclusion of foreign expertise in certain vital sectors. Such expertise could have been realistically reconciled with the legitimate demand for indigenisation. Our problems have been compounded by arrogant self-confidence often due to ignorance of what obtains elsewhere in the world and of the extent to which rapid progress must be based on borrowed expertise and technology even if admittedly for a temporary period.

In the present circumstances, it is right to ask how we can accelerate the rate of industrial and agricultural development and thereby the impact of oil. Personally, I participated in the expansion of public sector control to many vital sectors of the economy. While I do not believe that we should change policy with regard to the control of strategic industries like petroleum or the banking and finance sector, I believe that the time has come to re-examine to what extent our government procedures as opposed to basic policies are beginning to hinder rather than advance development.

I certainly do not think that some of the instruments of financial control which we have imposed over the last two years are anything but harmful. Credit guidelines which limit the amount of credit to be given by the banks for investment in productive agriculture and industry, while at the same time we close the door to imported goods in those sectors are contradictory and harmful. Many of the foreign exchange control instruments have had the opposite effect of inducing faster and larger outflows of funds than would have been the case.

The stingy and slow approach to granting Income Tax Reliefs, and Approved User Incentives to the manufacturing industry have made Nigeria unattractive to foreign investors and extremely frustrating for indigenous investors.

These problems are now compounded by a confusion of the political and policy role in a ministry. A confusion of policy roles with that of the detailed implementation of projects and government decisions by the civil servants and officials of parastatals. There is no doubt that it is vital to accelerate the pace of the approval and issuing of necessary permits for private sector projects. Once projects have been vetted and submitted to the superior organs of the government and such projects have been approved, the whole country, including the politicians stand to gain more from effective decentralisation which enables competent and trained officials to implement such projects speedily.

I think it is important in this connection to restate that the country is now suffering a great deal from the demoralisation of the public service in recent years. Whatever the performance of one or two individuals, there should be no doubt that the vast majority of public servants are patriotically committed and they stand to benefit as much as other classes from the rapid development of Nigeria. They equally stand to benefit from the political stability which would follow from all the governments of the federation particularly the Federal Government succeeding in their programmes and in improving lot of the masses and the less privileged classes.

Once this basic conjuction of objectives is accepted, it calls for greater charitableness and more skilled human engineering and leadership to ensure that the various sectors of the executive contribute harmoniously to the achievement of better resources. There is necessarily a learning process to be followed. One cannot, therefore, but deplore the recent occasions for public criticism of the public service. The conditions of public servants are on the whole much less attractive than those of people of equal competence employed in the private sector or in their own businesses.

Because of their pivotal positions in relation to the public, and in being custodians of all the means by which the government can execute its policies the service has a special role to play in liberalising and accelerating administrative procedures in order to remove obstacles to the translation of our increasing oil revenues into successful productive projects in all sectors in the plan.

It is as you all know, again the fashion these days to see economic policy questions in their political context hence my reference to the politico-economic dimension of petroleum. First, as regards our internal political relations, we cannot ignore the fact that there is a divergence of views between states in which oil is exploited and the states which do not have oil resources. The military era saw a drastic reduction of the revenues acruing to the oil states on the basis of the derivation principle. Indeed by reducing the royalties to be paid to the oil states to as low as 20 per cent and with the vastly increased earnings from the Petroleum Profits Tax accruing to the Federal Government, and with the increased emphasis given to population as a basis for allocating federal revenues, the oil states now consider themselves to be very badly treated.

Like in many other oil areas of the world, the regions where oil is found in this country are very inhospitable. They are mainly in swamps and creeks. They require massive injection of money if their conditions, and standards of living are to compare with what obtains elsewhere in the country where possibilities of agriculture and diversified industry are much greater.

There is a nudging acceptance of the special needs of oil areas in the latest proposals being discussed by the government but I, believe there is a long way to go to meet the claims of the oil producing areas which see themselves losing non-replaceable resources while replaceable and permanent resources of agriculture and industry are being developed elsewhere largely with the oil revenues. Given however, the small size and populations of the oil producing areas it is not cynical to observe that even if the resentments of oil producing states continue they cannot threaten the stability of the country nor affect its continued economic development.

Again there is the question that on the wings of rapidly rising oil revenues the Federal Government has been able during the military period to extend its role and effectively to create a fait accompli in the division of powers between the centre and the states which has been written into the current Constitution of Nigeria. I believe that on the whole the ability of the centre to mobilise such resources from oil and to intervene all over the country, and to finance the state-programme which, in effect, has created more than a dozen growth centres all over the country in the last 10 years has led to faster and more general development and the greater spatial dispersion of modern sector activities than would have otherwise been the case. All of these have had a positive impact on the improvement of economic welfare of Nigerians generally.

It may well be argued that the expectations of the people have been inflamed by the steeply rising announcements of increases in government expenditure due to oil. There have also been some examples of conspicuous consumption. At the same time, the failure to communicate effectively the long-term benefits to be derived from the tremendous infrastructural improvements financed by oil coupled with deliberate negative political propaganda have led to a general questioning whether in fact there has been a reckless waste of public funds and a diminishing sense of reponsibility in the adminstration of public funds. One can only observe that however vicious the rumours and the campaign, on the few occasions when these matters have been tested by objective enquiries it has not been possible to establish that abuse and waste have been the major problem impeding our development. As a matter of fact our failures are to be explained by our general unprofessional and amateurish conduct of our economy and political affairs and a mis-reading of the true meaning of self-reliance.

I wish to conclude by restating again that the exploitation of our oil resources has opened up for Nigeria a tremendous scope, unique in Africa, for rapid economic and social development.

By far the bulk of the greatly increased resources from oil has been publicly saved and has financed a tremendous programme of infrastructural expansion and improvement. The figures of the plans — 308 million Naira in 1955-1962; 2.2 billion Naira in 1962-1968; 3.2 billion Naira in 1970-1974 and 30.0 billion Naira in 1975-1980; or 108 million Sovereignty Budget in 1981-82 compared with 11.8 billion Naira in nine months of 1980 underscore the vastly altered circumstances.

These vast developments of infrastructure and education will soon begin to yield dramatically visible benefits. They will have positive indirect impact on the productive sectors of agriculture and industry while enhancing more even development in this country.

It is also true that we have not made as much progress as would have been possible in directly productive sectors of agriculture and industry. But such failures are to be explained by shortage of manpower, unfortunate and unprogrammed political upheavals and a wrong mix of public policies. Such a wrong mix of policies is evident elsewhere in the developing world and is not necessarily the consequence of the availability of large oil revenues.

It is, however, positive and true that we have had the good fortune of oil revenues to mitigate and mask the consequences of such wrong choices and of inadequate political generalship of cohesion.

With the lessons we have learnt and, I hope are learning, we have indeed a unique opportunity to utilise more optimally and with more immediately visible beneficial impact on the economy the revenue flowing from our natural endowments of significant reserves of oil and gas. I pray we shall succeed.

GOVERNMENT TO TRAIN INDIGENOUS MANPOWER FOR INDUSTRY

Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 3 Dec 80 p 3

[Article by M. A. Aliyu Biu]

[Text] IT is now imperative for the Federal Government to train a large number of indigenous manpower, to service the growing needs of the nation's economy.

Announcing this in Jos, capital of Plateau State during his official visit to the Industrial Training Fund (ITF), yesterday, the Minister of State in the Federal Ministry of Industries, Dr. I.J. Igbeni, said that this was aimed at promoting industrial growth in the country.

Dr. Igbeni explained that while basic skills could be developed in government-supported vocational training institutions, manufacturers should also develop appreticeship schemes and other forms of in-plant training for their labour needs.

The minister said that the present administration in the country believed that all talks of economic independence will remain empty until this had been achieved.

He explained that this was why President Shehu Shagari announced the highest allocation of funds to the industrial sector in his budget proposals to the National Assembly, last week, for the provision of the necessary infrastructure.

Dr. Igbeni, however, hoped that manufacturers would be willing to co-operate with the ITF to bring about an effective manpower development growth for the country.

He, however, lamented that about 1,000 liable contributors to the Fund are defaulters.

Speaking earlier, the Director of the Fund, Alhaji Lawal Tudun-Wada, said that the functions to be carried out by the Fund in the Fourth National Plan Period, are focussed on efficiency and increased productivity.

NORSPIN TEXTILE PLANT OF KADUNA CLOSES, 3,000 JOBLESS

Financial Losses Cited

Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 2 Dec 80 pp 1, 7

[Article by Owen Anikwue]

[Text] OVER 3,000 junior and senior employees of a Kaduna based textile factory — Norspin Limited — have been laid off by the company.

In a letter dated December 1, 1980, and addressed to the general secretary of the Norspin branch of the Textile, Garment and Tailoring Senior Staff Association of Nigeria, the General Manager of Norspin Limited, Mr. L. Hodgson, stated that "a situation has arisen which has forced the company reluctantly, to close down its operations with effect from the date of this letter."

The general manager's letter said: "The effect of this decision is that all permanent employees except those being retained for essential duties have become redundant from that date."

But in a reaction yesterday, the Staff Association of Norspin Limited, described the action of the general manager as "an economic exploitation of Nigerians."

The general secretary of the association, Mr. I.M. Elayo, told the New Nigerian in an interview yesterday that the issue was being taken up general manager said, had fallen by over 25 per cent at the time of folding up.

Mr Hodgson gave the reasons for the folding up as heavy financial losses the company suffered in the year ended in September, this year.

Unreliable electricity supply from NEPA, he said, resulted in loss of production and additional cost with higher increase in tariff.

The general manager said acute water shortage during the year seriously affected production volumes.

Increases in wages and salaries implemented under the national minimum wage and payment of arrears to April 1, this year, without being able to increase selling prices sufficiently under the government guidelines to defray the additional costs, he said, dealt a serious blow to the financial strength of the company.

Mr. Hodgson also identified what he described as "fierce and unfair competition from smuggled textiles which shows no sign of decreasing", as one of the major reasons that worsened the financial position of the company.

He gave other reasons as "unavailability of sufficient quantities and quality of Nigerian cotton lint and the delay in granting the company the necessary approval to import cotton from other sources.

"Additional operating costs are due to increases in the prices of raw materials, including (cotton chemicals, dye stuffs) and other processing and packaging requirements," he said.

The general manager, however, said there was no hope of reopening the factory.

Peaceful Demonstration

Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 3 Dec 80 pp 1, 21

[Article by Mustapha Tor Waya]

[Text] THOUSANDS of workers from all textile factories in Kaduna town yesterday peacefully marched in the city to protest against the mass dismissal of their colleagues by the Norspin textile company on Monday.

The demonstrators told the Deputy Governor of Kaduna State, Alhaji Abba Musa Rimi, that Norspin (Nig.) Limited had locked out about 3,000 workers on Monday without prior notice.

The workers told the deputy governor that the company's action was a violation of the collective agreement between the employers' association and the workers' union.

He accused the company of using police to disperse workers who, he alleged, were summarily dismissed without their benefits paid to them.

He said it had become the fashion to dismiss textile workers on what he described as flimsy excuses, citing the recent closure of Nortex company and the retrenchment of over 1,000 staff of the Kaduna Textile Limited (KTL), as examples.

Replying, Alhaji Abba Musa Rimi, assured the workers of the state government's determination to help to get the company reopened as soon as possible.

He said the closure of the textile company, coming soon after the closure of Nortex company and the mass dismissals at the KTL were attemtpe to destabilise the state.

He said the closure of Norspin more or less confirmed his fears because, according to him, the company did not deem it necessary to inform the state government before taking the action even though it was aware of what problems the action was going to cause the people in Kaduna State generally.

He advised the demonstrators not to take the law into their hands and to continue to exercise patience while his government sought a solution to the problem.

PEACEFUL MARCH

British Management Accused

Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 3 Dec 80 p 13

[Text] THE British management of the Norspin Limited, Kaduna, has been accused of concealing the real motive behind its decision to close down the textile mill, last Monday. The mill began its operations in 1964.

Speaking to the New Nigerian in his office yesterday, the deputy general secretary and Head of Education and Research of the National Union of Textile, Garment and Tailoring Workers of Nigeria, Mr. Adams E. Oshiomhole, alleged that there had been an on-going disagreement between the Chinese technical partners and the British management over profit sharing.

According to Mr. Oshiomhole, the Chinese technical partners who, he said, felt they bore most of the production burden, wanted a more equitable share of profits than they were now receiving and had also accused the British management of transfering considerable part of the mill's income back to Britain, through ingenuous ways, such as the constant importation of obsolete equipment and chemicals which were often left in the premises to rot and later replaced with fresh supplies, he said.

The Chinese partners' proposals, he said, were, however, rejected by the British management which led to the decision to close down the mills, he added.

According to Mr. Oshiomhole, the Chinese were reliably understood to have indicated their preparedness to take-over the operations of the mill, after its present liabilities such as payment of full entitlements to the dismissed workers had been settled by the present management.

The union's deputy general secretary further alleged that the group financial adviser to Norspin, Mr. Morfat, was responsible for influencing the management to dismiss the entire workers. He said he suspected that similar fate awaited workers of other textile mills such as Nortex and United Nigeria Textiles in Kaduna, because they were also enjoying the services of Mr. Morfat, as a financial adviser.

The stand of the union as at now he explained, is that they have rejected the management's mass dismissal circular on grounds that each worker was employed on individual basis and given separate appointment letters, and as such their termination should take similar mode instead of a general circular. They were therefore, still staff of the mill legally, he added.

The workers have not been paid their full entitlements, he said, adding that they were also locked out by the management before they were declared redundant, contrary to the existing labour regulations of the country.

LOKOJA DAM TO PRODUCE 2,000 MEGAWATTS

Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 26 Nov 80 p 1

[Text] THE proposed Lokoja dam project will be executed.

The new hydro-electric power station, three times bigger than the Kainji Dam and capable of producing about 2,000 megawatts of electricity, would be in the interest of the country.

The dam would, in conjunction with other NEPA power installations produce more than three quarters of the required electricity supply for the whole country.

These facts were made known by the NEPA Director of Operations for Kainji Region, Mr. Jimo Layode, while addressing a group of journalists currently undertaking a tour of NEPA installations throughout the country.

Mr. Layode explained that the Kainji Dam which is capable of producing 700 megawatts of electricity from eight turbines situated at the dam would, when completed, assist greatly in minimising the rampant power failure in the country.

He said that Federal Government decided not to commission four other power units of the same dam because of the drastic effects of the drought of 1977-78 which, he said, greatly affected the water level of the dam.

He then announced that power-generating stations were also being planned for Sapele, Shiroro and Egbine which is in Lagos State. He said these were all under construction.

He said when all these projects were commissioned in 1985 the stations would be able to cope with the electricity demand of the whole country.

Commenting on the Kainji Dam specifically, Mr. Layode explained that though there were 950 Nigerian members of staff at the project, shortage of spare parts for maintenance purposes had hampered smooth operation of the project.

A group calling itself the Lokoja Indigenous Progressive Union had recently protested against the construction of the dam in Lokoja because it claimed about 17,000 people in the area would be displaced, in addition to depriving the people of fertile land for farming.

ALUMINUM PLANT TO BE ESTABLISHED IN KANO

Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 24 Nov 80 p 11

[Article by Abdulhamid Babatunde]

[Text] A MODERN aluminium manufacturing factory is to be established at Gundawawa in Gezawa Local Government area of Kano State.

The factory will cost 4.8 million Naira and is an expansion of the Kwari Aluminium (Nigeria) Limited established in Kano in 1977 at 2.1 million Naira.

These facts were disclosed at a press conference in Kano during the signing of contract for the construction of the new factory between Kwari Aluminium and Yakamata Construction Company, Kano.

Speaking on the occasion, Alhaji Garba A.D. Inuwa, chairman of the Yakamata Group of Companies revealed that about 1,200 people will be employed in the new factory and 70 per cent of them will come from the local government area. He also announced plans for another 15 million Naira aluminium extension plant expected to be ready in 1982.

The Gundawawa Factory will produce aluminium doors, windows, partitions in addition to furniture and roofing sheets.

The chairman explained that the factory was being sited at a rural area in response to the state government's calls. He assured the public that the products would be of high quality and a five-year rust-free guarantee would be offered.

Alhaji Abdulazeez Ismaila, general manager of Yakamata Construction Company said at the ceremony that the new factory premises would be ready in six months. The Yakamata Group has eight companies dealing in various industrial and commercial ventures with headquarters in Kano.

BRIEFS

SENATOR ASKS 100,000-MAN ARMY--One way to save money is to reduce the present strength of the Nigerian Army to 100,000 men, a Senator has argued. Debating the general principles of revenue allocation, which entered day two on Wednesday, Senator Idrisa Kadi (GNPP, Borno) said the current army strength was too high. Hardly had he finished the sentence that Colonel Ahmadu Ali interposed: "In Nigeria? Then you are not serious". Ignoring the cut-in, Senator Kadi, the former GNPP Senate leader, insisted that a well-trained and equipped small army was better than a large, ill-trained one. He said the Federal Government could further conserve its revenue through a reduction in "political appointments" and stoppage of financial aids to other countries. "Thousands of Nigerians are suffering. The Federal Government should mainly concentrate on our foreign service", he advised. Senator Kadi said Federal authorities should relinguish the agricultural, educational and health sectors to states. He explained that it was his desire that the Federal Government should have enough funds to shoulder its manifold responsibilities. In his mind, he said, the Federal Government deserves 50 per cent from the distributable account states should take 40 per cent and local government 10 per cent. Joining the debate, Senator Victor Akan (NPN, Cross River) said the Revenue Allocation Bill would more than any other single law shape the future of the country and determine the prospects of her stability and peace. NATIONALIST PARTY ENDANGERED BY SCHISM

Old Rivalries and Present Problems

Johannesburg DIE TRANSVALER in Afrikaans 12 Nov 80 p 10

[Article by Willem de Klerk: "Nationalist Party Tensions and Back Stabbing"]

[Text] After all this it must never again be said that newspapers are stirring up tensions in the Nationalist Party (NP).

All the newspapers did but their duty in reporting the upsetting things which Dr Piet Goosen, the member of the Provincial Council for Waterkloof (Pretoria), had to say.

He asserted that the demonstrable underhanded doings in Transvaal's NP are directed against the prime minister's course of policy. He is indignant over the fact that NP representatives are soft-soaping people with a "yes...but" attitude with respect to policy.

Newspapers have also been reporting that Dr A.P. Treurnicht is denying these accusations and that he is demanding to know the reason why they were made.

His strong stand on separate development has also been quoted over and again by the media.

Scheming

Fielding reports undeniably confirm that some candidates, aspiring candidates, officials and representatives are involved in all sorts of policy in-fighting, provincial power considerations, anti-P.W. Botha whisperings and headshaking about some turns in the policy.

Is this an organized plotting and planned strategy to undermine the prime minister's authority?

This question can be answered by the very people involved in this, but there is a difference between suspicions and examples.

The fact that there is talk against the present government from within the NP itself and that seeds of doubt are being sown purposely, cannot be denied.

Thus, for instance, some people are channeling the uneasiness of educators in the direction of making it appear that the prime minister is the fly in the ointment as far as this matter is concerned. Also the fact that Pretoria's MPs are allowing the city council to have its way on all sorts of apartheid enforcements is being interpreted as going along with this local option and this is being used as a cover for assuming a stand.

In some circles and constituencies this has become a sort of mutual interplay...with the voters or the spokesmen from constituencies balking and the representatives fearing the "people's reaction;" this in turn again spurs the representatives to have a say in the matter, but to mute themselves when it comes to having to give reasons for the policy, and to lead the way if it comes down to throwing suspicion on somebody.

This sort of thing has been going on for a long time (and this has been recorded in writing on a number of occasions)...the government is being stabbed in the back by its own people and supporters.

The Cape

Where is the rub?

There is resistance against what is being referred to as the "Cape's domineering trend." Transvaal, its NP leader and the other leaders are thus reportedly being disregarded, taken along by means of steamroller tactics and then left out in the cold, because decisionmaking is left to the inner circles of the Cape (where a "Cape Transvaler" happens to be included at one time or another).

If this were so it would not be unusual...it is the prime minister's prerogative to have trusted people at every intimate level. It may also be that certain Transvalers are not resigning themselves to the fact that the Transvaal NP's power base has weakened.

It is up to the Cape and Transvaal, as provincial parties, not to try to exacerbate and make a mess of their relations. The NP's federal unity must not be damaged and the prime minister should certainly take the lead in not discriminating by not subordinating Transvaal's interests to the Cape's considerations or partialities.

The prayer and necessity of getting rid of provincialism in our politics has not yet allayed the feelings in this matter. There exists a sensitivity which must be recognized by both sides (by the Cape and by Transvaal) and managed correctly. The Cape and Transvaal must gain each other's trust through words and deeds.

The other point of resistance is rooted much deeper. This has to do with the ideological struggle, with the interpretation, contents and particulars of the 12-point plan.

Here the problem cuts across provincial borders, but it is very conspicuous in certain parts of Transvaal. There are different interpretations with respect to the Presidential Council, the elimination of discrimination, such as racial mixing in sports, and with respect to confederation which is now in the process of elaboration.

Objectors are saying the the P.W. Botha leadership represents the "thin side of the wedge," the nation is being softened up for political concessions in all everyday affairs by means of multiracialism; as a result we will be loosing our political voice and be well on the road of power sharing.

To a great extent the NP must blame itself for this, because for years it has been proclaiming that "equality" at a social and economic level will inevitably lead to political integration; also that forms of joint decisionmaking will sound the death knell for whites.

Many people will remember these things and this explains their resistance to todays's developments.

Against the Grain

Dr Andries Treurnicht and others are also constantly reminding the people of the old NP language by means of correct premises such as are now being recalled in reaction to Dr Goosen's statements. However, the other views on the NP's policy are being dispatched lightly. Certainly this fact contributes to further confusion among certain Nationalist Party members.

These other views have to do with such things as:

1. The necessity of eliminating discrimination at many levels for the sake of Christian principles, peaceful coexistence, available jobs, economic development and everyday practical needs. This in itself is going to establish a more comprehensive pattern of mingling.

2. Independent black states and self-administering ones must tackle joint projects which must also be controlled jointly.

3. Constitutional changes must be smooth enough to make it possible for those who share a common fatherland to have joint political structures besides their own political bodies.

A parliamentary institution shall be established next to the existing white parlaiment for the purpose of exercising joint and complete authority in decisionmaking by whites, coloreds and Asians.

In addition, a confederal council must bind black governments, as well as black authorities in urban white centers, with the Republic of South Africa for purposes of joint deliberation.

If anybody disagrees with these three points then he goes against the grain of the P.W. Botha course.

Choice

I am not happy about possible party splits. To be sure I have thrown everything into this column for the purpose of moving our people toward trust, to more balanced choices and to have them look at the reasons for our policy realistically even from the point of view of the above three premises.

I also presume (and there is much to back this up) that of Afrikaners, by a great majority, are going along with this course of policy.

My plea continues to be that we must reason with those who feel threatened, confused or dissatisfied; reason with them through the force of logic... and thus slowly but surely have them come around.

But those who will find this impossible have only one way out and that is to come out and say this openly and to make their choice.

Need for Unity

Johannesburg DIE TRANSVALER in Afrikaans 10 Nov 80 p 8

[Editorial: "Turbulence in the Nationalist Party"]

[Text] The events in the Waterkloof constituency indicate that serious turbulence evidently still exists in the Transvaal Nationalist Party.

In his farewell address as member of the Provincial Council for the divisional board of Waterkloof, Dr Piet Goosen warned about the rightist attack from within the party's own ranks. He lamented the attitude of those politicians who see nothing but the facilities matter of this picture, while it is not just a matter of this. He also lamented the public officials' "yes...but" attitude with respect to Prime Minister P.W. Botha.

He also spoke of intrigues and plottings in Transvaal's NP.

In reply, Dr Treurnicht said that he knew of no NP public official who does not subscribe to the prime minister's 12-point program.

It it true that there are intrigues in Transvaal and Dr Goosen is right: there must be a halt to this, or else the NP will be destroyed.

Dr Treurnicht's position that the 12-point plan is receiving wide support is welcome.

But acceptance of the 12-point plan is not enough.

It is becoming increasingly clear that this has mostly to do with the interpretation and application of this plan...and it is here that differences keep surfacing.

Nationalists must seriously consider acceptance whether or not there should be no problems with the 12-point plan. This is the broadest possible exposition of NP policy and therefore it also serves as an important unifying factor.

The fact that there may well be differences between the Nationalists who accept the plan appears clear from Dr Goosen's statements. But then the question as to whether things such as the Craven Week and open post offices must be raised up to the status of principle in a one-sided emphasis on separateness remains valid.

On the other hand, we must be careful to see to it that the 12-point plan is not used by groups of Nationalists for purposes of glossing over serious differences in the course and direction of the Nationalist Party.

MEETING ON SOWETO ADMINISTRATION TO BE HELD 10 JANUARY

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 15 Dec 80 p

[Text]

CRUCIAL talks about the future administration of Soweto are to be held on January 10 by the chief director of the West Rand Administration Board, Mr C J Bezuidenhout, and the Soweto Residents's Association.

The talks are a sequel to a memorandum sent by Wrab to the Minister of Co-operation and Development, Dr Piet Koornhof, suggesting future administration for Soweto as a Black city.

At the moment it is difficult to differentiate between functions of Wrab and those of the Soweto Council.

Mr Albert Mhlungu, chairman of the SRA, says his committee feels all administrative functions for the area should be in the hands of Blacks.

His committee is also critical of the present legislation governing the functioning of community councils, which require the councils to be responsible to the Minister.

The SRA has suggestions on how Soweto could raise its own revenue to be financially self-sufficient.

The Louis Rive scheme of spending over R150-million on the electrification of Soweto, presently underway, is being criticised by some Soweto leaders.

Many feel that the provision of accommodation for homeless residents should have priority.

Soweto leaders are also critical of the 99-year lease scheme, which they say has put many families into long periods of debt.

Some leaseholders have had to borrow money from their employers to raise the initial deposit to qualify for a loan from building societies.

The repayment of both loans is said to have left some leaseholders with very little to meet their family commitments.

Lack of funds, according to Soweto leaders, has compelled many leaseholders not to pay their service charges.

MULDER'S RIGHTIST PARTY CANNOT COUNT ON AFRIKANER CULTURE

Johannesburg DIE TRANSVALER in Afrikaans 8 Nov 80 p 6

[Editorial: "Political Gloating"]

[Text] The Connie Mulder people's political frustration and attending gloating is driving them to new extremes. Thus this week during their uninspiring annual congress they revealed that they want to hold a (separate) Paardekraal-Majuba Feast. They also want to hold a "national congress" at the Voortrekker Monument.

We, therefore, see here a transparent effort at filching the Afrikaner's traditional cultural activities and cultural wealth for political gain.

It may be that the NKP is having less success with feasts of its own, due to the fact that there are also other right and far-right groups which will be drawing a kind of self-aggrandizement from such activities.

We can, however, tell them in advance that such measures can only have temporary success, because by far the great majority of well thinking Afrikaners will not allow their cultural achievements to be watered down by such naked political aims.

To be sure it is more likely that this NKP is going to stir up more displeasure among Afrikaner ranks as a result of its most recent objectives.

If Dr Mulder wants to save his languishing political party by having the other rightist groups join with it, as he himself is proposing, he has the fullest right to do so.

But it is another matter if he and his party want to attain this objective by trying to sidetrack the Afrikaner's cultural occasions to his advantage.

HORWOOD REPORTS ON VISIT TO ISRAEL, CREDIT AGREEMENT

Horwood Statement

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 19 Dec 80 p 19

[Article by Jack Verblow]

[Text]

EXTENDED credit will enable South Africa to finance R125-million worth of exports to Israel for another three-year term, which is a significant increase over the current amount, said the Minister of Finance, Senator Owen Horwood.

Speaking on the return of his successful trip to Israel, the Minister said co-operation between the two countries was further shown by South Africa's renewal of the agreement to sell Israeli bonds valued at R20-million over another three year term.

Conditions, he said, would be attached to the bonds to increase their attraction for South African purchasers, though they would remain subject to exchange control regulations.

Agreements between Israel and South Africa on approved investments were also renewed for another three years although the maximum amount has been raised to R45-million and the categories included in the agreement widened.

To expand the strong links between the two countries a standing committee of senior officials from both nations has been established. It is scheduled to meet annually although they will consult more regularly if necessary.

The commission's immediate task will be to review the progress made by South Africa's coal exports with a view to making still more coal available.

While this promises to increase the already smooth economic and financial relations between the two countries the figures show that there has already been a substantial rise in South Africa's trade with Israel; from US$40-million in 1975 to US$115-million in the first 10 months of 1980.

Senator Horwood expressed confidence that with both countries having relatively small domestic markets, they should complement each other very well.

'THE CITIZEN' Comment

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 19 Dec 80 p 6

[Editorial: "Israel Links"]

[Text]

PERHAPS too little has been made of the successful visit to Israel of the Minister of Finance, Senator Horwood.

The reason probably is that the ties between the two countries are taken for granted.

We know Israel helps us in ways that are never publicised; we, in turn, help Israel in ways that are also not always disclosed.

And together we face a hostile world, two members of the Club of the Untouchables who have had to face threats of sanctions and other punitive actions that are completely unjustified.

It is not a coincidence that the General Assembly of the United Nations has once again condemned both Israel and South Africa.

In our case, it has endorsed 18 resolutions intended to isolate South Africa, deny it international trade and cultural contact, cut off the country's oil supplies and foment internal revolution.

Hypocritical

In the case of Israel, the General Assembly has demanded its complete and unconditional withdrawal from all Palestinian and other Arab territories occupied since the 1967 Middle East War. It has also disapproved of Israel's peace accords with Egypt.

Israel does not agree with apartheid, but it knows that South Africa is trying to resolve its problems — and that many who condemn us are hypocritical, being guilty of far worse assaults on human dignity and denial of rights than we could ever be accused of.

The same applies to Israel, the accusers of which see Israel and Zionism as a threat to world peace when it is the very countries which plot to overthrow the Jewish State that threaten peace.

Yes, there is much that can be said in the two countries' defence, each being a target for the calumnies of others which do not deserve to be mentioned in the same breath as they.

Nevertheless, the ties between the two countries are not just based on their being, each in its own way, General Assembly outcasts.

Identification

The bond is there because of common interests, ranging from the Afrikaner's belief in the Bible and love of the Holy Land, to cultural and scientific exchanges, and the way in which each bravely faces a total onslaught.

Indeed, it is in the parallels that can be seen between the two countries, despite their disparate backgrounds, that we find the closest identification between South Africa and Israel.

And so these two nations, in friendship and mutual respect, are able to foster each other's interests.

In the latest agreements made by Senator Horwood, South Africa has undertaken to provide a three-year line of easy credit worth R125-million to help Israel import South African goods; the approved investment ceiling has been raised from R37,5-million to R45-million; Israel will be able to sell Israeli Government Bonds in South Africa up to a limit of R20-million; and South Africa will establish a R45-million fund in Israel for research and development in medicine, solar energy and electronics.

It might seem that South Africa has been somewhat generous, but never forget the hidden factors which make our links with Israel so important.

When the story of our times is written, it will be seen that Israel played an important role in helping us to survive.

SPEECHES ON COVENANT DAY EMPHASIZE UNITY

Viljoen Speech

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 17 Dec 80 p 10

[Excerpts]

PAARDEKRAAL. — There would always be differences between people and groups, but seen in perspective they could and would have to be resolved to make it possible to stand shoulder to shoulder against threatening forces, the State President, Mr Marais Viljoen, said at Paardekraal yesterday.

Speaking at a gathering marking the Paardekraal centenary, Mr Viljoen said the main lesson to be learned from that period in history was the absolute necessity to achieve unity of purpose.

South Africa's salvation was to be found in the peaceful co-existence of all its peoples. It was of fundamental importance to maintain sound relations.

Every nation had the right to maintain its identity and to achieve its aspirations politically, culturally and economically. This could be achieved only through mutual understanding, respect and trust between the different population groups.

In addition to its strategic position at the southern tip of Africa and its anti-communist policy, South Africa had a particular responsibility in regard to its national safety.

Strength

It had to depend largely on itself for arms because that section of the world community which could benefit from the country's strategic value, did not yet want to acknowledge the fact. The world in which it found itself, was forcing South Africa to rely heavily on its own ingenuity and natural resources.

The unusual struggle in which South Africa found itself and the isolation it brought about, could have its benefits — the motivation for exceptional growth and inner strength.

South Africa was inseparably a part of Africa and shared the continent's experiences, the State President said.

Relations in Southern Africa were important and South Africa was able to promote economic growth and political stability in Africa far beyond its borders.

But it was clear this potential could be put to use only if South Africa's inhabitants of all colour and language groups proved they were able to create harmonious co-existence.

Division in South Africa's diversity of nations was fanned, enlarged and used against the country.

Pressure

"We are justified in asking why South Africans should destroy one another to promote the selfish aims of foreigners," Mr Viljoen said.

"The West's efforts to put pressure on South Africa to make concessions and to move in directions which are more compatible with their interests, has brought this country to the realisation that it would be disastrous to try to satisfy them at any price."

This had led South Africa to a process of self-examination and had created greater realism in regard to its needs and the options opened to it.

South Africa had particular internal circumstances to which all its inhabitants would increasingly have to face up.

Account also had to be taken of the onslaught from abroad, Mr Viljoen said. It was a total struggle which was increasing in intensity and affected everyone. — Sapa.

Voornhof Speech

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 17 Dec 80 p 10

[Text]

HARRISMITH. — Co-operation between White, Black and Coloured in South Africa could ensure a safe place for all and improve the quality of life for everyone, the Minister of Co-operation and Development, Dr Piet Koornhof, said yesterday at Retiefklip near Harrismith.

He was speaking at a function commemorating the centenary of Paardekop and the Day of the Covenant.

It was clear, the Minister said, that the road ahead demanded new initiatives, real reform, agreement and negotiation with the population groups in South Africa.

Threatened

"If we were not, in our common fatherland in which all population groups are threatened by a common enemy, to arrive at a settlement for all its people, White, Black and Coloured, through negotiation with a view to a new dispensation in which all groups would have a voice in a framework of confederation and a constellation of states, the only remaining alternative would be war," Dr Koornhof said.

A Black war of independence at the southern tip of Africa could be averted if the Prime Minister, Mr P W Botha, was given loyalty and support for his efforts in this direction.

Lesson

Earlier, Dr Koornhof said the lesson to be learned from the events at Paardekraal was that internal division had led to weakness and powerlessness which had made it possible for British imperialism to annexe the Transvaal in 1877.

"Internal division within the governing party at a critical period as in the history of the Republic of South Africa, can open the way for Russian imperialism and Africa domination which can bring us under a new domination," he added.

Fighting

White, Black and Coloured were fighting today to escape from their encirclement from Russia and Africa.

"The hourglass is running out fast and we must reflect and examine ourselves and not quarrel about small and personal matters and denigrate our Prime Minister and leaders."

What was needed was to leave lesser things aside and to act positively and in unity to meet the demand of the times. — Sapa.

Heunis Speech

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 17 Dec 80 p 11

[Excerpts]

VEGKOP. — If South Africans, as people of Africa, wished to survive in Africa, they would have to ensure that the politics of negotiation were victorous over violence, the Minister of the Interior, Mr Chris Heunis, said yesterday.

He was the main speaker at the Day of the Covenant celebrations at Vegkop.

He stressed that December 16 should not be regarded only as a day on which military victories of the past were commemorated.

The total onslaught against South Africa was aimed at all its people and against Christian civilisation in Southerns Africa.

"Anyone who fails to realise that the new form of Imperialism facing us today is aimed at Whites, Blacks, Brown and Coloured people is actually living in a fool's paradise."

The total onslaught could be identified in terms of two, modern forms of imperialism.

There was the more subtle and veiled form of Western Imperialism which tried to dictate impractical solutions to problems to South Africa and Africa.

And there was Soviet Imperialism which had no respect for individual freedom and the freedom of nations. This form of Imperialism was busy enslaving and subjecting Africa to tyranny on a scale hitherto unknown in history.

SA had to fight this form of Imperialism with every means at its disposal and had a responsibility to do so for the sake of others in Africa.

"We can only succeed in fighting this Soviet Imperialism if all the people of South and Southern Africa form a united front to do so.

"For this reason we have to get the confidence and co-operation of Coloureds and Blacks and we have to convince them that we have a mutual future in the southern part of Africa.

"For this reason we must give them the freedom and self-determination to which they as responsible nations and groups have a right."

South Africa and its people were however also the victims of a veiled form of Western Imperialism. In more than one way, the West was playing a double role in Africa and especially in South Africa.

Adopted

No-one could deny that the West had always adopted a form of economic Imperialism in Africa.

"It is important that we should realise that this economic Imperialism could be a double-edged sword for us.

"As long as we serve the economic interests of the West, the advantage is ours, but if we no longer do so, the West could be inclined to sacrifice us.

PAPER URGES MILITARY TO STAY OUT OF POLITICS

Capetown THE CAPE TIMES in English 28 Nov 80 p 20

[Editorial: "The Army and Politics"]

[Text] THE NEW CHIEF of the SADF, General Constand Viljoen, is assured of the support of the community in the great responsibilities he has shouldered. So it is a pity that he should jeopardize this support by venturing into controversial areas in his public utterances. It is a sound convention of parliamentary government that civil service and military chiefs should scrupulously avoid involvement in controversy. Such men are there to serve the government of the day, irrespective of politics, and it is not a good thing when they thrust themselves into the hurly-burly and, in consequence, find themselves under criticism.

The unhealthy trend towards military involvement in controversy has been apparent since the arrival on the scene of the so-called total onslaught and its counter, the so-called total strategy. Questions of military strategy and politics are closely intertwined in modern conditions. It is unwise and imprudent for military officers to make a habit of delivering public exhortations on current topics, as seems to be increasingly the custom. It is not the function of military chiefs to motivate and exhort the public. These are political functions and are best left to politicians. At worst, there have been some glaring instances of gratuitous military interference in politics. In the interests of maintaining public confidence, General Viljoen and his colleagues would be advised to avoid a repetition. The greatest threats to South Africa's security are Nationalist race policies which sow dissent and resentment in the population. As a national threat, the "communist expansionism" we are told so much about is secondary.

EDUCATION MINISTER INTERVIEWED ON INTERNAL NATIONAL POLICY

Johannesburg DIE TRANSVALER in Afrikaans 19 Nov 80 p 11

[Article by Anne Marie Mischke: "Separation Is Not the Solution for Everything--Viljoen"]

[Text] Dr Gerrit Viljoen has been a prominent leader for many years in such things as education and culture and he is also a political thinker. Now after an absence of nearly a year, during which time he was administrator general of Southwest Africa, he is back as a cabinet member and is being looked upon with special interest. In this interview he presents his views especially with respect to the policy towards the country's various nations.

Pretoria -- "Ideal and Reality" is the title given by Dr Gerrit Viljoen to a comparatively recent publication of his.

The title also provides an indication of the basis for his political thinking.

There is just as much interest for this thinking as there is for the manner he is going to manage the thorny portfolio of national education.

The simple truth is that reality has demonstrated that all problems simply cannot be resolved by separation and division.

"So then we cannot escape having to find out that reality creates serious problems for the ideal which is implimented in such a naive manner," stated Viljoen.

At the same time he sets limits to the measure in which it is possible to deviate from ideals: division and separation are still a major portion of the answer. You cannot throw away the bath water with the baby in it.

"The ideal still remains the guideline, but we should allow it to simply have its function and to have it assume new directions through reality."

In important and necessary situations there is already a departure from the old ideal of complete separation.

Thus a decision has been made to share power with the coloreds and Asians along with self-determination over one's own affairs, a full voice over local matters for the blacks in white areas and proposed passport regulations to make it possible for citizens of independent black states to also obtain passports in South Africa.

Even the part on facilities is an unexpected departure from the old ideal of separateness.

In connection with this, Dr Viljoen said that, on the one hand, the mortifying and offensive apartheid measures must be eliminated in accordance with the 12-point plan, however, this implies that there are also measures involving separation which are neither offensive nor mortifying.

In practice, what this means is that certain facilities and places will be opened to all races.

This has to take into account that there is an urgent (and reasonable) requirement for facilities and places of relaxation for the blacks who live and work in white areas.

But this must take place in a background in which the whites will have the right of reserving certain facilities for themselves in their own residential area and of doing so without any apologies.

Not everything ought to be closed, in the same manner that not everything ought to be open. Skill in subdividing these things is the watchword.

Southwest Africa

Yet in Southwest Africa, where all apartheid measures have been abolished, there are but few problems and Dr Viljoen took this occasion to say that this has not led to large-scale intermingling.

He said that things in the Southwest are different. Nowhere is there the kind of population concentration as in the case of South Africa; the preponderant agricultural type of society has the effect of lessening racial tensions to a great degree; moreover, the natural ethnical ties of the people are very strong.

Leaving out the extremists on both sides there is still a special goodwill between all the population groups in the Southwest.

Insecurity

Now with respect to this goodwill, when it comes to South Africa's whites, and especially the Afrikaner, whom he knows so well from within, this is a question which Dr Viljoen must answer carefully.

The most painful thing among the whites is that some of them feel insecure. They no longer know exactly where they are going.

Answering this question must be done against a background of radical developments involving the whites and the Afrikaners in the course of the past 6 years or so.

As meaningless as these might appear to foreigners abroad, internally these have been dramatic changes.

Dr Viljoen readily admits that insecurity and the accompanying resistance could put a halt to the necessary developments.

To be sure they have already done so, he stated. The essential problem demands that political leaders explain these things to their people with great difficulty and patience.

The problem is that this does not have to do simply with intellectual insight. Now the people will have to adapt themselves emotionally to a new situation in which there can be no easy solution...and even less permanent guarantees.

Those who want a permanent guarantee must seek it in the hereafter, because that is the only place where it can be found, according to Dr Viljoen.

Education

In his opinion, education has a great role to play in this respect. One of the lessons learned during the Soweto disturbances of 1976 is that we have reached such a point in separateness that we have gotten so far apart that we really no longer know each other.

He believes that education must be intranationally bound, but that under the leadership of responsible educators an element can be built into education to render the multinational situation in everyday life manageable for the adults of tomorrow.

If this is not done, children will be going into the future with their hands cut off. They must be prepared for a life which will not be just for the Afrikaners or for the whites.

But what about contact with black children, for example in such instances as the sports field and [words missing]?

"At this stage I don't think I would recommend one or the other. This is the very point in which there exists a deep-rooted anxiety over the possibility that separateness in schools will be sacrificed.

"I think that the highest priority is to have people realize that there is only one workable school system and that is to have one's own schools. There should not be any fears in this respect.

"Educators must themselves consider ways and means of making it possible for children to get along with people of other races in a responsible manner while retaining the ties with their own people."

And what about Orania, the white homeland sought by the SABRA [South African Bureau for Racial Affairs] people? This was the final question which was insistently put to Dr Viljoen, himself a former chairman of SABRA.

Remember that after all this would not actually be a white homeland, he warned. This would be the core of a white country in which there would be no nonwhite labor.

"But this is not the crux of our problem. Our problem lies in the fact that we must find political solutions to the questions which have not yet been resolved: those questions having to do with the coloreds and the Asians, the political accommodations for the black man outside the homelands and the elimination of those difficulties which the homelanders see in the way of independence.

"This does not mean that there cannot be cores of white areas which could be used as places for refuge for mustering new forces.

"But," stated Dr Vijoen, "if the scheme results in the dedication of our best brains to this, instead of finding a solution to our problems, then this will be to our detriment."

VAUSE RAW STATES NRP NRP POLICY ON LAND CONSOLIDATION

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 20 Dec 80 p 12

[Text]

DURBAN. — Replying to an enquiry from the Border Regional Council of the New Republic Party, the leader of the party, Mr Vause Raw, yesterday summarised the policy of the NRP towards land purchase for consolidation into Black homelands.

He said the NRP was committed to a confederal relationship between a federal common area of South Africa and the self-governing homelands, as well as any independent neighbouring states which may apply for membership and be accepted.

It saw two of the essential elements of such a confederation as a common federal citizenship and a single economy to which all would have access by agreement. This would include defined open industrial and commercial areas in all states which would be open to all members of all communities for ownership and employment without discrimination — subject only to essential socio-economic requirements (i e community services, housing etc).

It would encourage the acceptance by organised agriculture of the principle of freehold ownership of agricultural land in all areas by any person of any race who was financially and agriculturally qualified to farm efficiently — as was now the case with Coloured and Indian farmers accepted by local farmers associations.

"We believe that this policy will defuse the pressures for the alienation of land for the sole purpose of providing for uneconomic and non-viable peasant subsistence occupation and avoid never-ending future demands for more land with all the resultant uncertainty," said Mr Raw.

The NRP was committed to the 1936 land settlement agreement and believed this "quota land" should be transferred immediately from State and other land already available.

Where additional land or population movement was necessary for administrative or socio-economic reasons to provide for more viable self-administration, this would be supported in principle on the merits of each case.

"Against this positive background, we reject radical and disruptive transfer of land or people merely for the political and ideological purpose of establishing independent states. We believe that the multi-million rand expenditure needed should rather be devoted to building up an economic infrastructure and furthering modern and productive agricultural and other developments in the homelands."

In a confederation, full economic opportunity and development would become the criterion and not merely land for the sake of surface area to accommodate workless people.

"Insofar as the Government goes ahead with its present policies we demand:

- That all land demarcated for purchase under the 1975 plan must be purchased without any further delay to eliminate the economic stagnation, uncertainty and financial losses to affected owners, and that they be adequately compensated for all losses."
- "Land already acquired by the Trust should be handed over for re-settlement immediately and not be left idle and unproductive — ideally for free-hold ownership and productive exploitation.
- "All land bought should be paid for at the ruling market value prior to its demarcation, plus a proper allowance for subsequent general land price inflation.
- "Owners awaiting purchase and Border farmers should be compensated for losses including special fencing and security expenditure etc on a basis established by an independent commission on which organised agriculture should be represented. — Sapa.

INDEPENDENT AMERICAN DEVELOPMENT PLAN FOR TOWN CAUSES SURPRISE

Johannesburg DIE TRANSVALER in Afrikaans 17 Nov 80 p 8

[Article by Bert Ferreira: "A Surprise Plan for Alexandra"]

[Text] A 400-million-rand development plan for Alexandra, which, according to reports, is being studied by a large American bank, caused a great surprise last week.

One of the authorities which had no knowledge of this was the West Rand Administrative Council. Apparently this plan does not call for inclusion into an entire development plan for the town which has already been tabled.

The latter plan, which has been drafted by a technical planning committee consisting of Alexandra's liaison committee, the West Rand Administrative Council, government departments and other organizations, has already gone through the government mills. Among other things, this has set afoot requests for 90 million rand in government loans for providing low cost housing.

According to reports the American plan does not envisage subeconomy housing and it sets full ownership rights as a condition and is also completely independent of any government support.

Therefore, this all sounds more like an elite extension of the existing Alexandra than a redesigning of the town. Perhaps this is being considered for the additional land which is now being sought for the expansion.

There are even whispers and actual rumors that the plan had its origin in Sandton where the incorporation of Alexandra has been discussed from time to time. It is being said that Sandton's people have nothing against incorporation as long as Alexandra is changed into an area of prestige and nobody will have to be ashamed of it.

According to these underhanded rumors, a cheaper alternative would be the rezoning of Morningside for black and white housing, but as far as is known such a proposal has not yet been made.

The new liaison and negotiating machinery with the Indians and the coloreds, which was held out as a prospect following a meeting with Minister Chris Heunis, must be instituted very soon because the task ahead is great.

As in the case of the black communities, there is also a great source of goodwill among Indian and colored ranks, however, the opinion is that this sometimes exists despite, and not because of, prevailing conditions.

Let us just take the case of Lenasia where there is a great requirement for land needed for expansion; a large area has been designated for this purpose, but it takes years to get it incorporated. In the meantime, the existing properties become more and more expensive and business lots are going at much higher prices than a similar lot would cost in Johannesburg.

Despite the housing efforts there are families which have been on the waiting list for as long as 10 years.

In the meantime, demolishment at Pageview still goes merrily along and fears are again rising that the proclamation of the existing business sections near the center of the town as open business areas will mean that the more or less 15,000 Indians who live there are also going to be pushed out.

Then, on another point of the scale, there are the headaches which the average people have to deal with on a daily basis. Just the other day one of Lenasis's community leaders was relating about the great amount of money it has cost him and 2 years of suffering just to correct the name on his identity document which an official had entered incorrectly.

But that is nothing said another respected man, his daughter's surname on her identification card was spelled out so incorrectly that it had no resemblance at all to her own and after 5 years she was still unable to have it corrected.

When she married, she and everybody uttered a sigh of relief, because the ridiculous name would now at last disappear...until she received new documents and the strange name surely ended up being coupled to her marriage surname.

URBAN COUNCIL'S PRESIDENT CRITICIZES DRAFT BILLS

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 22 Dec 80 p 2

[Text]

THE Urban Councils Association of South Africa is to hold a special meeting in Bloemfontein on January 9 and 10 to consider three new Draft Bills dealing with urban Blacks, the president, Mr Steve Kgame, announced in Johannesburg yesterday.

"We were looking forward to a new deal for urban Blacks and this hope was raised by statements by both the Prime Minister, Mr P W Botha, and the Minister of Co-operation and Development, Dr Piet Koornhof," said Mr Kgame, whose organisation represents the country's community councils.

"But the proposed bills are not in accordance with the philosophy of what we were made to believe was the aim — to make life better and easier for urban Blacks, and having the whole political spectrum change for the better".

While proposed changes to Section 10 of the Black (urban areas) Consolidation Act might improve mobility for urban Blacks, Mr Kgame said, most of the proposed changes are "totally unacceptable".

The rights of Blacks to live and work in urban areas if they had served one employer for 10 years or had resided in the area for 15 years was being "completely taken away" in the proposed legislation.

The right of the courts to exercise discretion on dealing with so-called offenders was also circumscribed.

"What we would have liked to see was that in dealing with the new legislation, the rights of urban Blacks should be enhanced rather than taken away".

UCASA would try to make a meaningful contribution towards the amendment of the Draft Bills, Mr Kgame said.

"It must become clear to the Government that proposed legislation aimed at bettering the conditions of the urban Black should be acceptable to the people for whom it is intended". — Sapa.

OIL FROM COAL, OIL PROSPECTING MUST CONTINUE

Johannesburg DIE TRANSVALER in Afrikaans 6 Nov 80 p 5

[Article by Gus Cluver: "We Must Continue With Oil Exploration"]

[Text] Pretoria -- The construction of additional oil-from-coal projects must be supported, but at the same time the pursuit and even the expansion of South Africa's oil-prospecting campaign must also continue, stated Dr Franz Quass, the former executive director of SOEKOR [Southern Oil Exploration Corporation].

Dr Quass, who is now energy consultant for one South African and two American companies, referred to a front-page article in yesterday's TRANSVALER. The article asks whether, in consideration of the millions of rand which are being sunk in the oil exploration effort which has not produced anything, it would not be more advantageous to invest this money in more SASOL [South African Coal, Oil and Gas Corporation] plants.

"A small oilfield would be enough to bring great relief while an average large one would be able to supply about half of our present oil requirements...and let us not scorn our gas sources," stated Dr Quass.

SASOL

He referred to the recent Pretoria conference on transportation where Dr J.F. Kemp, the deputy president of the WNNR [Council for Scientific and Industrial Research] stated that the two new SASOL plants are going to cost 6 billion rand and complete energy independence an additional 10 billions, or 400 rand per capita of the population.

In a report presented in the same conference, Dr Quass said that SOEKOR drilled seven bores in the sea in 1979 at a cost of 50 million rand. SOEKOR's total investment in the past 15 years comes to about 250 million rand and it will take many years before it will have invested 1 million rand. Dr Quass said that it is wrong to assert that oil prosepcting has not produced anything. Two commercially viable gas sources have already been found at sea.

The United States is now laying gigantic pipelines along a 5,000 mile route to bring gas from Alaska to its own industrial areas. The day will come when South Africa's gas will also be put to use. Hopefully, more discoveries having greater reserves will be found.

It takes a great deal of time and money to find oil. Even before the oil crisis, the United States drilled 26,000 bores on land and sea during 1973. During that year the rest of the world collectively drilled 6,500 bores. In 1978, the United States drilled no less than 50,000 bores, 15,000 of which turned out to be dry.

"Today everybody is trying even harder to find oil. The Americans expect to invest $30 million for their sea oil prospecting this year."

Todays consumption of the various energy sources in the world appears to be as follows: petroleum (oil) 50 percent, natural gas 20 percent, coal 25 percent and other sources 5 percent.

Dr Quass said that in South Africa oil-from-coal projects and prospecting for oil are twin undertakings and for many years he has advocated the promotion and expansion of both of them.

'NEW CROSSROADS' CONSTRUCTION--the first 106 of 1,731 houses have been completed in Phase One of "New Crossroads," the R14 million township being built near Nyanga mainly to rehouse the residents of the Crossroads shanty town on the Cape Flats. The first movement of people from the old to the new Crossroads will take place tomorrow. Of the 106 completed houses, 67 had three bedrooms, 11 had two bedrooms and 28 one bedroom. Phase One of the New Crossroads scheme was scheduled to be completed by the end of next year, and Phase Two, now being planned and which would be about the same size as Phase One, would probably be ready in 1982. The total scheme would comprise about 3,000 houses. Mr Bezuidenhoud said the first of two primary schools for Phase One would be ready in January, and a secondary school would be completed by mid-1981. Official figures show that there are 4,800 families, or 23,460 people, living at Crossroads. The Minister of Co-operation and Development, Dr Piet Koornhof, has said he is not prepared to accept a figure of 40,000 people that has been given as an estimate in evidence before a magistrate. Dr Koornhof said the figure his department was working on had been produced in a socio-economic survey conducted by the Western Cape Administration Board in conjunction with the Crossroads Executive Committee. BLACK LABOR ADMINISTRATION--The labour bureaux of the administration boards will, with the exception of Johannesburg, deal from the beginning of next year both with applications and the payments to Black men and women of benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act, the Deputy Director-General of the Department of Manpower Utilisation, Dr P J Van der Merwe, said in Pretoria yesterday. This will give effect to one of the recommendations of the Riekert Commission on Legislation affecting the use of manpower. From January 1, the 365 labour bureaux controlled by the 14 administration boards will act as agents for the Unemployment Insurance Fund. In areas where there are no labour bureaux, Blacks will continue to lodge their applications at the office of the nearest magistrate or commissioner. Dr Van der Merwe said it had been decided for administrative reasons that in Johannesburg the Department of Manpower Utilisation would continue to deal with applications for benefits by Black men and women who registered for employment at the labour bureaux at New Canada and Polly Street. Benefits should be applied for at the department's office in Market Street, Ferreirasdorp. [Text] [Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 19 Dec 80 p 3]

WHEAT CROP ESTIMATE--The fourth official estimate of South Africa's 1980/81 wheat crop was revised upwards to 1,57-million tons from the third estimate of 1,55-million tons, the Agriculture Department said yesterday. The estimate is still sharply below the actual 1979/80 output of 2,09-million tons, due to a severe drought in main growing areas, it said. The fourth estimate is based on end-November conditions. Earlier this month Wheat Board manager Denis van Aarde said South Africa would import 200 000 tons of wheat in 1981, due to the drought which has damaged the 1980/81 crop. South Africa last imported wheat in 1970/71 when a shortfall seemed possible, but the last time imports were essential was in 1967. The wheat season officially runs from October 1 to September 30, but is complicated by different growing seasons in various regions. RAILWAY MARSHALING YARD PLANNED AT MOZAMBIQUE BORDER

Mbabane THE TIMES OF SWAZILAND in English 16 Dec 80 p 4

[Text]

THE Swaziland Railway is planning an Exchange Yard at the Mozambique Border, beyond Mlawula. At present Mozambican crews bring trains through to Sidvokodvo and are lodged there until time to do the return run to Maputo. Once the new Yard is completed, rolling stock will be 'exchanged' at the border and Swaziland Railway crews will operate all trains within Swaziland.

This new arrangement will have many benefits for Swaziland. Firstly it will re-absorb those members of staff which were rendered redundant when the iron ore mine ceased to function and rail traffic was reduced by +-60%. It will also save on expenditure, and make the Swaziland Railway less dependant on other Railways for their internal operations. The Yard will have seven 'roads' where rolling stock is marshalled, and a small operations building, much the same as there is at Lavumisa. As the Yard will be on National Trust land, it has been decided to provide the necessary housing for married staff at Mlawula.

The prospects for the building of the Northern extension from Mpaka on the existing line, to Komatipoort are bright. This extension would be of enormous value to the country. Its first effect would be to make Swaziland Railway more viable.

Also, of course, it would provide job opportunities, as well as opening up north eastern Swaziland for the mining of the rich coal reserves. It would also be of benefit to agriculture and create considerable revenue from through-traffic. Trains would be worked with Swazi staff from Komatipoort through to Goiela. The principal marshalling depot would be moved to Mpaka which is roughly half way in railway kilometres between the north and south borders.

Crews would work trains from Mpaka to Komatipoort and back, and to Goiela and back. Such round trips will take about eight hours including the exchange of loads at the two terminal yards.

With Mpaka becoming the main operational centre, it would be necessary to move certain staff from Sidvokodvo, which will then become of secondary importance.

Asked about a passenger service in the future, a spokesman for Swaziland Railway simply said 'Never'. The line is too far from large population centres, but apart from this, it is said that nowhere in the world is there a profitable passenger service. Some individual routes may make money, but never a whole service. Another reason for not wanting to take passenger services is that by doing so the livelyhood of many bus owners will be placed in jeopardy.

Mlawula is the station for Simunye. The sugar is road-hauled there then railed to Maputo. Along with sugar, petrol, oil and lubricants the railway's main cargoes are pulp and coal; fertilisers, chemicals and general goods are also carried.

The map illustrates the proposed northern extensions to the Swaziland Railways.

GENERAL MIBENGE: MILITARY DISCIPLINE LOW

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 13 Dec 80 p 1

[Text] APATHY and indifference coupled with lack of support for people charged with enforcement of discipline have largely contributed to declining standards of discipline in the armed forces.

Former commander of the now dissolved Zambia National Defence Force, Lieutenant-General Benjamin Mibenge said this yesterday at his farewell parade at Arrachan Barracks in Lusaka.

Addressing the parade after a march past, Gen Mibenge said a defence force without discipline was lost.

He regretted that efforts made in the past 17 years by the military leadership to keep discipline within all ranks had not really born fruit because to a great extent discipline had declined.

Demoralised

He said some officers had not treated with respect the uniform of honour and trust that they wore and had instead indulged in criminal activities — tarnishing the good name of the defence force.

"Causes for this trend are varied and known, but among these are indifference and lack of self-discipline," he said.

To correct the situation, there was need for all those entrusted with the responsibility to enforce discipline to get out of their apathetic indifference towards wrongdoers, he said.

It was wrong to leave the enforcement of regulations to a few who, for lack of support, had been demoralised and in turn overlooked obvious cases of indiscipline.

Exist

Gen Mibenge said farming in the defence force was welcome to supplement the national effort in food production. But this should only be done without impairing the combat capacity.

"The fact that the prime role of the defence force is fighting must not be lost because the very purpose for which armies exist would be compromised," he said.

Earlier, Commander Lieutenant-General Malimba Masheke said the army was not only losing an officer and commander in Gen Mibenge, but a wealth of military experience and knowledge both in administration and operational command.

SCANDAL AT NAMBOARD UNCOVERED

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 11 Dec 80 p 1

[Text] A NAMBOARD annual report has unearthed a financial scandal involving thousands of bags of maize worth more than K1 million.

The scandal involved false entries of bags of maize into record books.

As a result of differences between physical quantities on hand and records of stock, the company's auditors have been unable to satisfy themselves on the amount of K32,573,597 included in the accounts as maize stocks for 1978.

According to the Namboard 1978 report — which has been delayed for several months for unknown reasons — and released in Lusaka this week, the auditors have said:

"The physical count of maize stocks conducted by the board by use of the standard formular-at the year ended disclosed material differences between physical quantities on hand and the book records of stock quantities."

Citing examples of the differences, the auditors say the physical quantities counted and the related book records of maize stocks showed that certain depots had total stocks of 1,615,350 bags compared with 1,023,738 physically counted.

The differences resulted in a total deficit of 591,612 bags valued at K3,608,678 the auditors observe .

"Other depots showed, on the same basis, total book stocks of 1,650,447 bags compared with 2,072,863 physically counted, showing a surplus of 422,416 bags valued at K2,640,100," they pointed out.

The auditors add that the explanations given by Namboard for the differences were not satisfactory and accordingly, they were unable to satisfy themselves on the amount of K32,573,597 included in the accounts as maize stocks at December 31, 1978.

They were not satisfied that the accounts showed a true and fair view of the state of the board's affairs as at December, 31, 1978 and its deficit.

The auditors have noted that the books of accounts have not been maintained in accordance with terms of section 21 (1) (2) and (3) ad section 24 (3) of the National Agricultural Marketing Board Act.

The sections require the maintenance of separate accounts and the equilisation of funds for certain products.

The report says the amount for the unaccounted bags of maize was K1,058,478.

In March this year, Namboard sources urged the Government to smash a highly-organised theft ring which was allegedly swindling the company out of thousands of Kwacha.

Failed

The sources disclosed then that police had failed to smash the ring which comprised workers from the bottom to different levels of top management.

The sources cited an example of last year's theft of 2,500 bags of soya beans worth K73,750 charging that it was not a one-man job.

They spoke of junior workers in the company who earned "peanuts" but owned "mansions" and lots of property because of their dealings.

This year's report of the committee on parastatal bodies tabled in Parliament this month strongly urged Namboard management to make concerted efforts to minimise cases of pilfering and misappropriation of funds.

The report recommended that the audit department be free from any management interference when dealing with investigations.

It suggested that an officer who was transferred from the head office in Lusaka as a result of exposing malpractices be reinstated in his former capacity as coordinating officer for provinces at the head office to help with the investigations.

The unnamed officer had reported the loss of fertiliser worth K100,000 in transit from Balaka, Malawi to Zambia.

ZNS TEAM LEARNS 'LIMA' TECHNIQUES IN GDR

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 9 Dec 80 p 5

[Text] A 15-MAN Zambia National Service team which went for a three-month course in agriculture in the German Democratic Republic (GDR) returned yesterday with a pledge to apply the knowledge acquired.

Leader of the team, Lieutenant-Colonel Nicholas Zulu, said on arrival at Lusaka airport his team was more geared for the 'lima' and the 'operation food production' programmes.

He said the course was successful "and as we come back home, we are more geared for the agricultural programmes".

Lt-Col Zulu, who was replying to remarks by GDR commercial counsellor, Mr Dieter Kulaszewski, looked forward to enjoying further cooperation with that country

Earlier, Mr Kulaszewski in his welcome remarks expressed gratitude for the team's successfully completing the course in Zaschopau.

He said they had returned at the right time when the 'lima' and "operation food production" programmes were taking off.

Mr Kulaszewski hoped that the group would tour various parts of the country where the programmes were being undertaken.

He commended ZNS for playing an important role in the agricultural development programmes aimed at producing more food for the nation.

Zambia recently ordered 254 GDR-manufactured tractors in preparation for the "operation food production" programme. About 132 of these arrived in September.

Ten of the tractors had been assigned for use at an experimental farm near Lusaka International Airport, according to President Kaunda's announcement when he inspected the tractors at the ZNS camp in Chamba valley on September 23.

COMMITTEE REPORT CALLS FOR REVIEW PASSPORTS POLICY

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 8 Dec 80 p 5

[Text] THE parliamentary committee on foreign affairs has recommended a review of regulations governing the issue and retention of diplomatic passports.

It has recommended that there should be three types of passports to avoid confusion.

These are passports for diplomats only who are entitled to diplomatic immunities and privileges, passports for senior Party and Government officials entitled to VIP treatment and ordinary passports.

The committee, chaired by Chisamba MP Mr Saul Chipwaya observed with "great concern" the lack of a clear policy regarding the issue and retention of diplomatic passports.

The report says Government officials and businessmen were issued with diplomatic passports which they were not entitled to while former diplomats continued to hold diplomatic passports.

"It is the view of the committee that this is tantamount to abuse of diplomatic immunities and privileges and it is not in the interest of the nation for people not entitled to these passports to continue using them.

"We therefore strongly feel that the current arrangements related to the issue and retention of these passports should be reviewed," the report says.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs was urged to speed up the formation of a career diplomatic service.

The call was made by the parliamentary committee on Government assurances in its report just released in Lusaka.

The committee was unhappy at the delay in implementing the service whose idea was first mooted in 1976, but still remained in the "doldrums."

It was disappointed that the ministry had failed to produce a draft of the revised foreign service regulations.

To improve the efficiency of the country's missions abroad and its international image, there was need for trained diplomats, the report says.

It regrets that although former Foreign Affairs minister, now Defence Minister Mr Wilson Chakulya, made assurances in Parliament in January last year and February this year nothing had taken place.

"This state of affairs does not speak well of efficiency in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs," the report adds.

The committee invited two ministry officials to give reasons for the delay in establishing the service and they confirmed that a draft report, which included revised foreign service regulations was completed in December last year.

The committee was informed that the ministry would study the documents and then a memorandum would be drawn and be presented to the Cabinet Office for consideration before Parliament made it law.

While the committee appreciated the procedures involved, it was worried about the speed at which things were going and "urged the appropriate authorities to expeditiously finalise" the establishment of the service.

The committee should be informed about progress made and it appealed to the ministry for copies of the revised regulations.

- The Party and its Government has been urged to legalise traditional healing in the public service.

The call is contained in the report of the parliamentary committee on Government assurances.

Traditional healing had cultural and medicinal values which should not go to waste and the Ministry of Health should finalise collecting information on introducing the practice, the report says.

GOVERNMENT ANNOUNCES FAR-REACHING STEPS TO IMPROVE AGRICULTURE

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 10 Dec 80 p 1

[Text] THE Government yesterday announced far-reaching measures to boost agriculture.

According to Minister of State for Agriculture and Water Development, Mr Justin Mukando, the measures include adopting irrigation as a policy, equipping the Land Development Services Unit (LDSU) with additional machinery and decentralising its operations.

Mr Mukando said in an interview yesterday the Government would mechanise small-scale farming from next season.

The minister said once the irrigation policy was adopted, the massive cheap electricity would be used for the scheme instead of diesel engines.

He added: "We want to embark on a national irrigation programme to cover all suitable areas of the country."

The programme would start as soon as possible and his Minister, Mr Unia Mwila, was now out of the country to scout for financial assistance

The Party and its Government, meanwhile, has started an agricultural project known as the "Tinkabi" in Mazabuka to find solutions to small-scale farmers' problems.

The Tinkabi project had been designed to serve groups of about 15,000 small-scale farmers.

Mr Mukando also said that recently a smaller tractor introduced by Power Equipment and Soraj Industrial Distributors had passed Government tests and would usher in a new era in the rural small-scale farming sector next season.

• A team of Japanese agricultural experts arrived in the North-Western Province to inspect 40,000 hectares of land which has been chosen for State farms in Kasempa and Solwezi districts.

The Japanese team was yesterday scheduled to have their first round of talks with the under-secretary for the province, Mr John Kazhila.

Speaking in an interview before the Japanese arrived, Mr Kazhila said the Ministry of Agriculture and Water Development had made progress with survey work on the selected sites for the farms.

He would not say how much the Japanese would be involved in the schemes as it was up to them to determine after they had assessed the project's potential.

One site is a few kilometres west of Solwezi while the other is 12 kilometres north of Kasempa. Each has 20,000 hectares.

GDR EXPERTS TO RUN MODEL ARMY FARM

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 11 Dec 80 p 1

[Text] A NUMBER of German Democratic Republic (GDR) agricultural experts will come to help run the Airport farm about 20 kilometres east of Lusaka, President Kaunda was informed yesterday.

Zambia National Service Commandant, Brigadier-General Thomas Fara, told the President — who with the entire Central Committee, several Cabinet ministers, permanent secretaries and other Party and Government officials toured the 1,564-hectare farm — that at present officials were sampling soils to determine which was suitable for maize and wheat growing.

He said 60 hectares would be for growing rain-fed wheat and 27 hectares for maize.

General Fara did not indicate when the experts would be coming, but sources in the German technical team which is already here to train Zambians handle equipment, said they would arrive as soon as the Zambian Government was ready to receive them.

"We are waiting for the Ministry of Defence to ask our government. Our experts are ready and can come at any time," said one official.

The sources said the Germans would build a dam at a site to be chosen to help irrigate the farm.

Meanwhile, President Kaunda has praised Tanzania for making tremendous achievements in the field of development despite economic difficulties.

He said this in a message to President Julius Nyerere on the occasion of his country's 19th independence day.

Dr Kaunda said: "I wish on behalf of the Party and its Government, the people of Zambia and indeed on my own behalf, to convey to Your Excellency and through you to the people of Tanzania, our heartfelt and fraternal congratulations."

He said the economic difficulties Tanzania was facing were not only the result of world-wide recession but also the justifiable war which kicked out dictator Idi Amin from Uganda.

Dr Kaunda said all these achievements which were for the well-being of Tanzanian citizens were possible only under Dr Nyerere's leadership and that his country would continue to prosper in all directions of development.

"It is our earnest wish that the very warm relations that so happily exist between our two sister countries will continue to grow. I wish you personal good health and all the best for the future," President Kaunda added.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS ROP TO BUY LOCAL VEGETABLE OIL

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 8 Dec 80 p 5

[Text] PARLIAMENT has been told that the Government ordered ROP to buy raw materials for cooking oil from within the country instead of America at a cheaper price.

Chairman of the parliamentary committee on parastatal bodies, Mr Titus Mukupo told Parliament in his report that the Government ordered ROP to buy crude vegetable oil from Namboard at K1,800 per tonne instead of importing the commodity from America at K1,200.

Mr Mukupo, who is Member of Parliament for Kawambwa, said the Government's decision to order ROP to buy crude vegetable oil from Namboard was aimed at encouraging local farmers to grow more food and sell the surplus to local firms that were engaged in food processing.

He submitted that since the Government encouraged ROP to buy expensive locally-produced raw materials rather than cheaper imported ones, it should help Namboard to overcome its present financial and liquidity problems.

Initiated

He however, urged the company to be more diligent when dealing with commercial transactions.

He cited as an example the transaction between the former general manager of the company who initiated the sale and bought the K41,277 candle making machine together with its K17,000 raw materials.

He cited another example of a transaction between ROP and South African company involving K149,000.

Mr Mukupo said investigations were in progress by appropriate authorities and that the purchasing manager was on suspension although he noted with dismay that the suspended officer was allowed to use a company vehicle at the expense of ROP.

The general manager of ROP travelled from Kitwe to Ndola everyday for work as the house meant for him was still being occupied by the former general manager, Mr Mukupo said. — Zana.

ZCTU BACKS MUZ STAND ON SACKINGS

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 10 Dec 80 p 5

[Text] THE Zambia Congress of Trade Unions has defended the Mineworkers Union of Zambia stand over the sacking of shop stewards who participated in the Party ward elections for the decentralised system.

ZCTU general secretary Mr Newstead Zimba said in Kitwe yesterday MUZ should not be treated unfairly for implementing a resolution which was passed by its bi-annual conference.

Mr Zimba, who was commenting on Prime Minister Lisulo's remarks during a television interview last Sunday that MUZ officials would be disciplined for refusing to reinstate the sacked shop stewards, said the union had made the resolution in the belief that the new system was going to lower its membership.

Integration

He said the labour movement thought the integration of the mine townships with those run by local authorities would take away the membership of MUZ through the transfer of workers in the community development services section.

It was felt that the privileges, miners enjoyed would be withdrawn and it was in this light that the labour movement viewed the matter.

Mr Zimba hoped that the matter would be amicably resolved when the Bill becomes law.

He said every new issue had its problems and in this case the matter needed full understanding by everyone to interpret it properly.

Mr Zimba said President Kaunda explained the issue in full during the last National Council and there was no need for threats without considering the circumstances which were prevailing at the time.

LISULO: DEFIANT MUZ WILL BE PUNISHED

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 9 Dec 80 p 1

[Text] PRIME Minister Lisulo has said Mineworkers Union of Zambia officials will be disciplined for refusing to reinstate sacked shop stewards who took part in the recent Party elections.

The MUZ officials had acted contrary to the recent UNIP National Council meeting which resolved that the sacked stewards be reinstated

Mr Lisulo said this in a Television Zambia "Sunday Interview" when asked to comment on the failure by MUZ to reinstate the 16 shop stewards who were sacked for contesting Party elections.

He said although he did not have adequate information on the matter because it had been referred to former Copperbelt Member of the Central Committee, Mr Shadreck Soko, he felt MUZ was wrong.

Obeyed

Mr Lisulo said as a matter of principle, MUZ officials, who are UNIP members, should have obeyed the decision of the supreme body of the Party.

MUZ leaders had defied the constitution of the Party and therefore a prima facie case against them had been established, he added.

The union's refusal to reinstate the sacked men was announced in Chililabombwe last month by its vice-chairman Mr Timothy Walamba.

Mr Walamba said the union could not reinstate the stewards because the decision to sack them was reached at a bi-annual conference.

He said then that as far as he was concerned, the stewards were no longer union leaders, and: "We are prepared to be locked up for our stand".

On the Local Government Administration Bill which was passed in Parliament during the last session after some opposition from backbenchers, Mr Lisulo said the opposition to it had been "exaggerated" by the Press.

He said although the labour movement had opposed the Bill, the Party advised the Government to go ahead with it because people consulted at district level had no opposition.

Mr Lisulo said the labour movement was in the minority, so the majority had to be obeyed in order to avoid "minority dictatorship".

He allayed fears that the Bill would bring problems and said in the past, many important decisions could not be taken on the pretext that instructions had to come from Lusaka.

Mr Lisulo said people who thought district governors were unqualified to head the district councils were wrong. He said what was important was the office and not an individual governor.

ZNFU THREATENS TO HALT PRODUCTION

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 15 Dec 80 p 1

[Article by Enockngosa and Remmy Kabali]

[Text] THE agriculture industry yesterday received a bashing when the Zambia National Farmers Union threatened to instruct its members to stop production if they do not receive loans from the Agricultural Finance Company at the end of this month.

Livingstone farmers also said their future was bleak when Mobil Oil and Shell and BP stop delivering fuel to them at the end of this month and African Farmers Machinery stops supplying spare parts and servicing their tractors.

The "strike" threat from the farmers' union was issued in Kabwe yesterday by ZNUF chairman, Mr David Mazimba, and is a continuing wrangle between farmers and AFC which started last week when more than 100 farmers from Mumbwa, Chongwe and Lusaka protested outside AFC offices against delays in receiving their approved loans.

Mr Mazimba warned that unless the Government reorganised the AFC, the agricultural programme would not succeed.

He said his members were "completely fed up" with the alleged delaying tactics of the AFC in giving out loans and accused the organisation of breach of contract by not paying farmers wages which were included in the loan agreements.

Under the agreement the AFC was supposed to give farmers money for seed and fertiliser, sprays, labour, fuel, oil and maintenance, tractor or ox-hire, transport, packing material, lime, insurance and contingency.

This was the amount of money shown as owing by the farmer on stop orders sent to Namboard.

"But when it comes to payment of the loans, AFC does not include labour wages and yet they are counted as part of the farmer's loan. How can it be a loan when it is not given?" he asked.

He warned that if farmers did not get this money by the end of this month, "the union will resort to the law of the jungle."

Asked to elaborate, Mr Mazimba said: "Stopping to grow. You should remember that most of my members are well educated and only went into farming for the love of it. It is easy for them to go back to their previous jobs."

According to a loan agreement signed on October 8 between Mr Mazimba and AFC in Kabwe, Mr Mazimba was promised K4,320 as labour wages which he has not received.

"When the Government and AFC say farmers are not paying back their loans, they mean labour wages which we never get," he said.

But he added that only farmers with between five to ten hectares were included in the labour wages agreement.

He accused AFC officials, particularly those in Kabwe of being "personally responsible" for the farmers' failure to repay loans because in most cases, they dished them out late.

When farmers needed money for agricultural inputs, they waited for too long and by the time the money was given "and in small amounts" it was already too late for certain crops.

"Now where does the farmer get the money to repay the loan when he did not grow everything at the right time?" Mr Mazimba asked and appealed to AFC officials "and Government ministers not to provoke us by saying we fail to repay the loans."

In Gwembe, governor Reverend Philemon Chipeso accused AFC's machanised tractor service of failing to provide badly-needed services to farmers.

He urged the organisation to establish an office in the district and complained that farmers in his area travelled many kilometres to Monze, Mazabuka and Choma for loans.

"If we had lending institutions in the district, farmers would not have been travelling for such long distances," he said.

Last Thursday, Minister of State for Agriculture Mr Justin Mukando said delays in releasing loans to farmers were caused by lack of funds.

He said the Government had now released K30 million in addition to the K20 million which had already been exhausted.

The minister said this after meeting AFC officials led by Rural Development Corporation managing director, Mr Hosea Ng'wane following the farmers' protest.

In Livingstone, a tobacco farmer, Mr Edward Hockly, said Shell and BP and Mobil Oil companies had told farmers they would stop delivering fuel to them by the end of this month.

Mr Hockly informed acting governor, Mr Chisanga Mpepo that this had put farmers in a quandary because they did not know what to do next.

All along the two companies supplied farmers with fuel in drums, but now they had been told to find their own means of getting oil from the depot in Livingstone.

Mr Hockly said the oil companies had told farmers it was too expensive to continue delivering fuel to them directly.

Apart from oil companies' intention to stop delivering fuel to them, the African Farmers Machinery has said it would no longer deliver spares or service their tractors because farmers were getting few.

He urged the Government to reintroduce police patrols in the farming areas to stop thefts of crops and animals.

FARMERS CALL FOR AFC REORGANIZATION

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 11 Dec 80 p 1

[Text] MORE than 100 farmers from Mumbwa, Chongwe, Lusaka and Kabwe converged on the Agriculture Finance Company (AFC) offices in Lusaka yesterday, demanding payment of loans.

The angry farmers demanded a shake-up of the organisation, saying it had failed them. They warned that unless the procedure of loan payments was streamlined success of the "lima" programme would remain a pipedream.

One of the farmers, Mr Dick Situmbeko from Mungule in Lusaka Rural, said farmers in the area were "terribly behind time" in planting, there was only one week left before the SR 52 maize seed could be planted.

"But there is no money to buy the seeds or fertiliser, let alone to transport the items or pay labourers," he said.

He said farmers recalled President Kaunda promising the nation that farmers should be given loans before June, but these loans were only approved on paper as late as November and in some cases December.

"We have just been given the papers indicating how much we shall get for given items, but the money is not forthcoming. Some of us have been coming here for three weeks now, but all we are told is to come back tomorrow. This tomorrow does not seem to come," Mr Situmbeko said.

Mr Anderson Mukubwe of Lusaka West said transporters were reluctant to carry fertiliser for farmers because there was no money to pay them and they were not prepared to wait.

Mr Jonathan Chilonda of Mwachisompola farm in Keembe said there was no fertiliser in all depots in the area, no diesel and no tractors for hire.

Asked to comment, Rural Development Corporation managing director Mr Hosea Ng'wane said, "there is nothing to say," through his secretary.

Meanwhile, some farmers in Luapula and Copperbelt provinces are evading repaying AFC loans by using relatives' names when getting payment for their produce.

AFC provincial manager for the Copperbelt, Mr Mathew Chimangeni, and acting provincial manager for Luapula, Mr Aloysius Nkhoma, confirmed in separate interviews that farmers owing AFC thousands of Kwacha were becoming increasingly tricky and erratic.

The present arrangement on the Copperbelt is that when Namboard pays farmers for their produce, they deduct money owed by the farmers on behalf of the AFC.

Mr Chimangeni said some farmers registered their produce under relatives or friends whose names did not appear on the stop-order schedules being kept by Namboard.

At Mansa, Mr Nkhoma said: "We really have problems with some farmers."

STARVATION TO END, BRIDGE TO SPEED RELIEF SUPPLIES

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 12 Dec 80 p 1

[Text] STARVATION among villagers in the Imasho area of Sesheke district is expected to end soon with the commissioning of a new 45-tonne pontoon at Kalongola.

Secretary to the Cabinet Mr Evans Willima announced yesterday that the pontoon was already operational and that this would speed up the delivery of relief supplies to famine stricken areas in the Western Province.

Mr Willima was commenting on reports that 15 people died from starvation in Imasho last month and that more would die if there was no meaningful relief operation.

Mr Willima said in a statement that the Party and its Government had so far spent K637,000 on famine relief in Senanga and Sesheke districts.

On Tuesday, his deputy Mr Francis Walusiku said although there were thousands of bags of maize and several other relief supplies at Senanga, they could not be distributed to Imasho in large quantities because there was no pontoon.

He said the Government had engaged itself in a costly exercise of transporting some of the supplies to the affected areas by helicopter, but that was not adequate.

The report of dying villagers was made to Sesheke district governor Mr Boniface Mapani by the district health inspector Mr B.N. Mwanamambo who visited the area recently.

MAHEBA LANDMINES CLEARED, AREA DECLARED SAFE

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 12 Dec 80 p 5

[Text] ZAMBIAN security forces have declared the area around Maheba camp, in North-Western Province, formerly occupied by Zimbabwean refugees as safe from landmines.

North-Western Province police chief Mr Adam Siyanda said the detonation exercise mounted by military experts who moved into the area shortly after the refugees were repatriated to Zimbabwe more than three months ago, had been completed.

The landmines were planted by former rebel Rhodesian soldiers during the liberation war which claimed thousands of lives.

Soon after the camp was vacated a boy was killed when a grenade he picked from the site exploded in his hands.

Detonate

It was then that security forces moved in the area to locate and detonate the landmines.

Yesterday police said so far the area was safe from landmines and people were allowed to move freely.

Mr Siyanda reported that authorities were still battling to secure the release of the Danish volunteer, Mr Peter Holm Gregersen, who was arrested by Angolan immigration officials after allegedly crossing the border illegally at Chingi in the Chavuma area on November 29. He was working in Lusaka.

"We haven't heard anything from the area yet. We are still waiting for a report from officers who rushed there last week," he said. They were led by Zambezi governor, Mr Edward Limande.

KOBE STEEL-INDECO SIGN BUILDING CONTRACT

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 6 Dec 80 p 5

[Text] INDECO and Kobe Steel of Japan yesterday signed a K17.5 million contract to build a sulphuric acid plant at Kafue.

The contract followed the signing of a government-to-government loan agreement between Zambia and Japan on November 25 to help Zambia implement the sulphuric acid plant project.

The successful conclusion of the government-to-government loan meant that implementation of the project would start soon. It would be repayable in 30 years with a ten-year period of grace.

The construction contract between Indeco limited and Kobe Steel was signed by Indeco managing director, Mr Lishomwa Muuka and the general manager of Kobe Steel (international operations), Mr Shorijo Higashi.

Work on the project would take 27 months to complete.

This loan would cover the foreign currency portion of the whole construction cost while the local currency portion of the cost which amounts to K4.38 million would be borne by Indeco and the Zambian Government.

The plant which will have an annual capacity of 60,000 tonnes of sulphuric acid, will obtain its raw materials — pyrite — from Nampundwe mine, Mr Muuka said.

Priority

The Party and its Government had given high priority to the sulphuric acid project to ensure constant availability of the chemical needed in the production of fertilisers by Nitrogen Chemicals of Zambia.

The plant was of major importance especially since in the "operation food production programme" launched by President Kaunda, emphasis was on Zambia's agricultural development and self-sufficiency in food by the end of this decade.

The sulphuric acid plant will save the country millions of Kwacha in foreign exchange and create employment for more than 100 Zambians.

BRIEFS

CASH POSITION SOUND--The Party and its Government has allowed Zambia run as a free society and no information has been kept from the public to which it (public) is entitled, a Freedom House spokesman said last night. The spokesman was reacting to the Opinion which appeared in this newspaper yesterday in which it was stated that the Bank of Zambia and the Central Committee would rapidly lose the nation's confidence if they remained tightlipped on the country's position regarding foreign exchange. The spokesman said the Government had never made its borrowings secret. "As a matter of fact, every loan agreement has been publicly signed and the amount revealed. At no time has the minister of finance refused to answer a question in Parliament regarding Zambia's foreign exchange situation. The spokesman said the Central Committee should not be expected to develop a dialogue with the Press: "It is up to members of the Press to gather information for themselves from the appropriate channels." On Zambia's credit worthness, the spokesman said to the contrary, as evidenced by recent loan agreements, Zambia's standing in the world money market was still very good and the country had so far honoured her international obligations by making timely payments. "Zambia's financial position is sound," he added. [Excerpt] [Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 11 Dec 80 p 1]

IAN SMITH COMMENTS ON OBLIGATIONS OF FARMERS

'People Dying of Starvation'

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 18 Dec 80 pp 13, 12

[Text] ZIMBABWE'S farmers have an obligation to open up new land and grow food crops to help feed Africa's starving people, Mr Ian Smith, former Prime Minister, said in an interview at his farm near Selukwe this week.

"I have always been deeply conscious that we live, not only in a world that is short of food, but in a continent where people die of starvation in large numbers each year," he said.

Mr Smith has always been a cattle producer, growing maize for his cattle, with nothing over to sell.

Responding to an appeal to farmers to grow more food, he decided to build a second dam on his farm which will irrigate about 50 ha of maize, and 12 ha of fertilised pastures, adjacent to the dam.

"Building the dam was always one of my dreams. A few years ago, I started planning it and I had a few sites investigated, and trial pits dug.

"Now the dream has become reality and the surplus maize will make a small contribution towards helping the country become self-sufficient in maize, and perhaps an exporter.

"We don't want to put ourselves in the position of having to import maize, when we were exporters for so long," he said.

The new dam, on a tributary of the Gwenoro river, will hold about 4 500 million litres, double the capacity of the first dam which was built more than 20 years ago.

In building it, Mr Smith believes it indicates his confidence in the country's future, "even in the troubled political times we are living through".

"Occasionally, one's confidence receives a jolt but, nevertheless, one has to be positive. While we are here, we must get on and build and face the future."

He said many people had read into the recent transfer of his farm to Gwenoro Farm (Pvt) Ltd, that he was selling because he wanted to leave the country.

"With a person in my position, people jump to conclusions without adequate evidence.

"All I did was to transfer the various sections of the farm to a private company to enable me to give my family and children a material interest."

When a reporter visited the farm, the earthmoving machines were idle, unable to enter the dam site because of heavy rains the previous night.

Mr Smith said if the weather stays fine, the dam will be completed this week — in time for most of the heavy rains.

Mr Smith is, perhaps, better known as a cattle breeder than a maize grower. Many years ago he ran Hereford and Afrikaners and later crossed them to improve the quality of his commercial beef.

Six years ago he brought in Brahmen bulls and crossed them with the Hereford/Afrikaner breed, giving him a still greater beef yield.

From his pedigree Brahman herd, he produces about 25 bulls a year, all of which are sold, and this enterprise provides the major part of his turnover.

Another Brahman herd, purebred but not registered, also gives him about 25 bulls a year. Mr Smith said there was a good demand for this type of bull and he could not produce enough of them.

The farm of 2 430 ha was bought by Mr Smith soon after he returned from the Second World War.

"It was in rough country, there were squatters and it had been abused. People in Selukwe advised me not to buy it, but having travelled over most of the countryside around here when I was a boy, I saw its tremendous water resources.

"The squatters had ploughed some sections without protecting the land, and when they had ruined one section they moved on to another."

Mr Smith, whose heart has always been in farming, said his present stay at the farm will be the longest in 17 years.

"All the time I was Prime Minister I used to get down here for a weekend every month.

"Now I am gradually spending more time. With a unit this size, and all the work I am doing, I need to if I am to farm successfully," he said.

Smith Stand Praised

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 18 Dec 80 p 12

[Editorial: "Meeting a Need"]

[Text] IN an ideal Zimbabwe, all farmers would make a good living every year, the people would get adequate food cheaply, and there would be a surplus for export to help those in less favoured countries and to earn valuable foreign currency.

Conditions in Zimbabwe are not ideal, but in good years some of these requirements are fulfilled. Now that there are more mouths to feed, and more people with more money to spend on food, there must be greater efforts to meet the demand and strive for the ideal.

What Mr Ian Smith says politically seldom finds favour with new Zimbabweans. But few will disagree with his view that Zimbabwe farmers have an obligation to farm new land and grow more food crops. He is setting a good example.

Also setting a good example is the group of peasant farmers at Mrewa who have adopted the collective system. By moving as a group from one farm to another at crucial times they are giving their individual members a chance of better returns.

In other cases, commercial farmers are helping peasant farmers with expertise and equipment.

These examples of self-help, communal help and good neighbourliness must be encouraged at every opportunity if Zimbabwe is to provide the basics needed for the country to prosper.

TEKERE CASE: SWAN SONG FOR 1975 INDEMNITY ACT

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 15 Dec 80 p 4

[Text]

THE majority verdict acquittal in the High Court last Monday of the Minister of Manpower Planning and Development, Mr Edgar Tekere and seven of his bodyguards on murder charges, was probably the last case to reach the courts under the Indemnity and Compensation Act (1975).

The Act was repealed in November after being promulgated five years ago to provide indemnity for the Government and its employees — including members of the security forces — against civil or criminal prosecution for acting in good faith while suppressing terrorism.

DISABLEMENT

The new Act covering compensation for war victims was passed in November and contains no indemnity clauses for people acting to suppress terrorism, although it does not take away existing indemnities.

The War Victims' Compensation Act 1980 deals with procedures for claims against the Government for disablement and death during the war.

The new Act does, however, preserve the indemnity in respect of acts committed in good faith in the suppression of terrorism before November 14 1980, when the War Victims' Compensation Act came into effect.

A clause in the new Act prevents certificates of indemnity from being lifted by reason of the repeal of the old Act.

The Indemnity and Compensation Act had a stormy passage through the Rhodesian Parliament in 1975. Its introduction by the then Minister of Justice and of Law and Order, Mr Desmond Lardner-Burke, prompted widespread criticism from the clergy and pressure groups.

Despite the opposition the Bill was passed "in the national interest". The indemnity clause was retrospective to the start of the war in 1972.

The passing of the Act had the immediate effect of blocking demands from various groups in the country who had been pressing the Minister to investigate allegations of brutality by members of the security forces and the police.

Some complainants had already instituted actions against the State.

For several months before the Act was passed the Catholic Justice and Peace Commission had campaigned for a commission to be set up to investigate alleged brutalities by the security forces. These allegations were outlined in a document circulated throughout the world.

CRITICS

One of the hardest-hitting critics of the Act was the former Federal Chief Justice, the late Sir Robert Tredgold.

Sir Robert said the Bill had not been clearly drawn and had been too hurriedly introduced.

He dismissed arguments that there had been precedents in other countries, saying that in only a single exception had the indemnity been introduced during the hostilities and not later.

The exception he referred to was indemnity legislation passed in South Africa during 1961.

Sir Robert said the two laws — the South African statute and the Rhodesian Act—were an outrage to the rule of law and a blow at the very roots of democracy.

He said the Act was another step in the assimilation of Rhodesian laws to the draconian legislation that South Africa needed to support apartheid.

One of his main criticisms was the Cabinet's executive power to be able to define what had been done "in good faith for and in connection" with the suppression of terrorism.

He said these were nebulous terms and their application would be left entirely to the Cabinet's discretion and could not be questioned in court.

Another major reservation for one of the clauses in the Bill was the fact that the Minister of Law and Order could issue a certificate saying that an act has been done for the suppression of terrorism and the certificate was considered to be conclusive proof that the act had been so done. So, strictly speaking, the Minister could make the decision without consulting his Cabinet colleagues.

RIGHTS

Opposition MPs in the House of Assembly bitterly opposed the Bill, and in the Upper House the Senate's Legal Committee decided that the Act would be inconsistent with the Declaration of Rights.

Support for the Act came from within the Government's own ranks. Two of the most prominent supporters of the legislation were Rhodesian Front MPs Mr Chris Andersen and Mr Hilary Squires.

Mr Squires admitted that in anticipating arguments against the introduction of the Act it could be generally accepted that indemnity Acts did legalise illegality. He qualified this by quoting legal and constitutional authorities who said that in certain conditions of war or internal disorder acts of indemnity could be regarded by judges and academic constitutional lawyers as not only unavoidable but necessary.

The Bill was finally pushed through both Houses of Parliament—more on the strength of its importance to the "national interest" than through any convincing legal argument.

In summing up the debate on the Second Reading of the Bill, Mr Lardner-Burke admitted that in his capacity as Minister of Law and Order he was in the process of being sued "because some individual is alleged to have acted wrongly in the police or the other security forces".

Although one other case, besides that of Mr Tekere, did reach the courts under the Indemnity Act, it is not publicly known how many indemnity certificates were issued by previous Governments.

CHITUNGWIZA SEEKS MUNICIPAL STATUS

Third Largest Urban Center

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 21 Dec 80 p 4

[Text]

THE first business of the next council of Chitungwiza immediately after being elected will be to ask for municipal status, the Chief Executive of Chitungwiza, Mr Reuben Jamela, and the council chairman, Mr Jethro Nyarota Makoni, said last week.

The next thing after Chitungwiza was granted municipal status would be to ask for city status, the two Chitungwiza top executives said.

In an interview, they said the application for municipal status and, subsequently, city status, was part and parcel of Chitungwiza's five-year development plan estimated to cost about $5 million.

Why Chitungziza would ask for both municipal and city status, they said, was, first, that in terms of population, Chitungwiza was the third largest urban centre after Salisbury and Bulawayo.

Second, it was independent of Salisbury and was financially viable, which they say is an important aspect when the application is lodged.

They said that without municipal status it would be difficult, if not impossible to attract industry, and without industry, development was difficult and costly.

"At present we are having to depend on industry in Salisbury, yet we have lots and lots of land which is lying idle while we also have thousands of unemployed people because of lack of industry," they said.

They added: "After we attain municipal status we will then own land which we can lease or sell to industrialists.

"Even the Minister of Local Government and Housing, Mr Eddison Zvobgo, addressing our council meeting in July, said that because our affairs are so well run, he was expecting a petition from us very soon for municipal status."

Outlining Chitungwiza's five-year development plan, Mr Jamela said:

"Every year we review the priorities of our capital development over a five-year period.

"In that exercise we list our projects in accordance with their urgency and our ability financially. We also include our methods of raising the required funds. Then we spread the list over the planned five-year period."

Mr Jamela said a project rated for the 1981-82 financial year, for instance, could be relegated to the next year's review or vice-versa, depending on the prevailing circumstances.

Explaining the 1980-81 phase of the five-year development plan, he said the council wanted to provide two beerhalls, one in area L and the other in area N of Seke.

They also plan to build a huge civic centre, to cost $550 000. The civic centre will include a town house, administrative offices, a huge modern shopping complex and other facilities such as cinemas and other recreational fields.

They will also extend some St Mary's houses at a cost of about $50 000 or more.

A clinic is already under construction in Zengeza which will cost at least $243 800. In addition, they plan to build and equip a fire station.

A plan to erect 16 additional tower lights in St Marys will cost the council another $50 000, while a reconstruction of Chaminuka and Chiratidzo Roads will cost $140 000.

Mr Jamela said houses in Zengeza 2 would be electrified during this phase at a cost of $200 000 to the council.

The money is already available," he said. "The delay is with the Electricity Supply Commission which has said it has a shortage of skilled labour."

Sections A, D and F in Seke would also be electrified at a cost of $15 000. The council planned to buy a plant, machinery, vehicles and equipment to the value of $200 000 to carry out this development.

The present administrative offices are being extended and the total cost will be $120 000.

Mr Jamela said the second stage of the development of the Seke Stadium would also be started in the present phase.

Asked about the last four phases of the five-year plan, he said they were very much the same as the projects outlined for phase one.

"We review our projects each year to determine their urgency, so that the other phases are in fact similar to those described for Phase one.

"I can only add that we plan to sell more stands at designated shopping centres for individual developers to provide greater shopping facilities for our growing population."

Pros and Cons Discussed

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 22 Dec 80 p 14

[Editorial: "Good Neighbours"]

[Text] CHITUNGWIZA'S desire to attain municipal and eventually city status is understandable. It is the third largest urban centre in the country and its development plans could be the envy of many established municipalities.

But what makes it different, and what could therefore cause problems, is its nearness to Salisbury. Here there is a parallel, on a much smaller scale, with Que Que and Redcliff which operate successfully as separate entities.

But whereas Redcliff's residents work there, vast numbers of Chitungwiza's residents work in Salisbury, so the parallel is not exact.

Chitungwiza wants to attract industry, but there must not be too much duplication with what exists in Salisbury.

It would be natural for the two centres to merge physically in due course, with development spreading along the transport routes between them. But it is generally agreed that Salisbury has sprawled far enough, and the same might apply to its neighbour.

There must obviously be the closest contacts between the councils and officials of both centres to provide co-operation where it is needed and to ensure that healthy rivalry does not develop to the detriment of one or the other.

When Salisbury's new council eventually takes office one of its early tasks must be to meet Chitungwiza's so that close neighbours can be good neighbours.

LABOR MOVEMENT DISUNITY, POWER STRUGGLE DESCRIBED

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 21 Dec 80 p 6

[Article by Nigel Adlam]

[Text] Karl Marx implored in 1848: "Workers of the world unite--you have only your chains to lose, a world to win."

But this impassioned entreaty during that year of revolution seems to have fallen on very deaf ears in the new Zimbabwe--for the trade union movement is in a disunited, petty-minded mess.

Even veteran union-watchers are baffled by the internecine squabbling which has split the movement in two.

Mr Phineas Sithole, general secretary of the United Textile Workers' Union which has suffered more internal disruption than most, once said: "Only the bosses gain from our disunity."

Joe Public--the average man in the street--is no doubt totally befuddled by the struggle behind the union initials.

But the scrap goes something like this...

Last year, the TUCA, ZFL, ATUC and NATUC began merging to become the UTUZ. The odd man out was the recently-formed ZTUC.

Then Labour Minister Kumbiral Kangai suddenly announced the setting up of the ACTU. Two ZTUC officials got top posts.

Simple.

Or, put another way, Mr Kangai--not seeming to recognise the moves towards unity made by the United Trades Unions of Zimbabwe--stepped in and ordered the setting up of the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions.

His brief to the ACTU was simply: "Unite the workers."

The Minister said he interfered because the labour movement had been partly "hijacked by unscrupulous employers who had bought their way" into some unions.

But many union leaders claim he intervened because it looked as though the unregistered Zimbabwe Trade Union Congress--which they accuse of being the industrial arm of ZANU (PF)--was in danger of being left on the shelf. Powerless.

ZTUC general secretary Alfred Makwarimba was made chairman of the interim ZCTU and another ZTUC man, Webetser Gwekwerere, was given the key post of organising secretary.

Both are ZANU (PF) activists.

Mr Gwekwerere this year returned to Zimbabwe after spending 14 years in Britain.

ZANU chairman Mr Sithole was made vice-chairman--but he quit after just six weeks, claiming the whole labour movement was being hijacked by ZANU (PF).

Fired

ZCTU publicity secretary Elphegio Soko--who was fired from Mr Sithole's union executive last week--said the formation of the ZCTU was an end to the split in the workers' movement.

He could not have been more wrong.

For since the setting up of the ZCTU in the winter the whole movement has been rent assunder.

A string of rival splinter groups have been set up to challenge the long-established unions and "poach" members.

Relations between the various trade union federations have been marked by accusations of intimidation, mud-slinging and back-biting.

Admittedly there have been a couple of mergers between rival unions under the guidance of the ZCTU--but generally there is all-out union warfare on the shop-floor.

Anyone can announce the formation of a new union, claim so many members after a few weeks and start attacking established groups.

There is no way of checking on their strength because they are not registered with the Ministry of Labour.

There are now two unions each for the mining, engineering, car-making, textile and postal industries.

And the ZCTU was told by Mr Kangai to unite the workers!

The Government has strongly denied that it is trying to turn the labour movement into a ZANU (PF) "puppet."

"Trade unionists should keep out of politics," Mr Kangai has said.

But there are precedents for trade union congresses to be firmly linked with leftwing parties.

Britain's 12 million-strong TUC--the only union federation in the country--is attached to the Labour Party.

In fact the Labour Party was set up by the TUC at the beginning of this century as the workers' political voice.

And in France, the General Workers' Confederation (CGT) is the industrial wing of the country's big Communist Party.

But Mr Sithole--and many other union leaders--believe the unions should be free of party political domination.

Miners' leader, Howard Bloomfield--whose own union is being attacked by a rival headed by Mr Gwekwerere--said party politics were the curse of unions.

"God knows, we've enough problems to cope with already," he said.

Mr Gwekwerere also denies that he is trying to shepherd unions into the ZANU (PF) fold.

But he claims that veteran union leaders are often totally ineffective with small memberships. There is a need for new blood, a new grassroots democracy, he argues.

But he does not deny that there is a power struggle raging in the labour movement--and the prize is the very heart and soul of trade unionism.

If Karl Marx had ever heard of Zimbabwe he might have said instead: "Workers of the world unite--you have only your union initials to lose, a new nation to win.

GOVERNMENT COMMITMENT TO SOCIALISM STRESSED

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 21 Dec 80 p 1

[Text]

THE Government was committed to the introduction of Zimbabwe's own unique brand of socialism that placed more emphasis on collective productivity, the Minister of Information and Tourism, Dr Nathan Shamuyarira, said yesterday.

He said experiments at establishing socialism had been suggested and tried in many independent African states, but these had failed because they were based largely on "collective consumption of goods produced by capitalism".

Dr Shamuyarira said the Government was determined to ensure that Zimbabwe did not become just another consumer African country dependent on goods produced by other nations.

"What Africa needs is a socialist system of collective production and consumption with more emphasis on production," he said.

Speaking at a ceremony where he officially opened a new Salisbury tyre retreading factory, the Minister said the production of large quantities of goods locally and by Zimbabweans themselves would strengthen the country's economy and guarantee national independence.

Dr Shamuyarira, who was accompanied by Senator Joseph Culverwell, said that with the coming of independence and the attainment of black majority rule, doors were now open for black Zimbabweans to launch new ventures and contribute to the development of the country.

He said that while in the colonial past the horizons for economic advancement for Africans had been limited, "the situation has been reversed and will continue to be reversed to accord black Zimbabweans opportunities to own the means of production and not be just job-takers".

People should not look to the Government alone to provide them with white-collar jobs, "but rather they should be proud to be their own masters in the new Zimbabwe by owning the "means of production".

Zimbabweans who had acquired specialised skills should use them to create new units of production in the form of factories and commercial undertakings.

Dr Shamuyarira pointed out that through hard work and self-sacrifice, the country would avoid becoming embroiled in debts which could seriously undermine the country's independence.

Some countries, he said, had allowed themselves to fall into debts from which they were finding it difficult to extricate themselves because their non-productive economies had forced them to seek help from organisations like the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank.

"We do not want that to happen to Zimbabwe," the Minister declared.

Dr Shamuyarira commended Mr Rudolf Chitsonzo, proprietor of the new factory, for leading the way in the participation of black Zimbabweans in the formerly predominantly white industrial and commercial sector.

"We need more Zimbabweans like him if our desired goals of economic independence are to become a reality," he said.

GOVERNMENT BORROWING, OVERSPENDING SOURCE OF WORRY

Salisbury BUSINESS HERALD in English 18 Dec 80 p 1

[Text]

THE swollen money supply in Zimbabwe is now proving to be extremely worrying for the Government and the money market, with the supply at more than 40 percent over the beginning of the year. Two of the most important reasons have become clear — Government borrowing and overexpenditure by ministries.

Coup with the recent 6c a litre oil price increase it now seems certain Zimbabwe is facing a year of sharply increased inflation, with forecasts ranging from 14 percent to as high as 20 percent.

An indication of Government borrowing is given by the weekly tender for Treasury Bills, which is now for $16 million. Two years ago it was $10 million and four years ago it was $4 million.

A Government official told Business Herald: "We can only wait for the supplementary estimates to be put before Parliament early next year, but all the signs are that they will be hefty. There is increasing official worry about the money supply and its causes."

At the same time gold and foreign reserves have fallen to the $170 million mark, but this in itself is not cause for concern.

The Reserve Bank economic review says that net foreign assets rose by $50 million in the first quarter of the year. When figures on gold and foreign currency were first published in April this year, the total stood at $198 million of which gold accounted for $42 million.

Since then the price of gold has dropped, but it is not known what proportion it makes of total assets.

In fact this fall has to some extent lessened the impact of the increased volume of money as it effectively means an outflow of funds from the country.

The public debt has increased by almost $400 million in the last year, which is a 30 percent growth. Total holdings of Treasury Bills are now more than $200 million, a record.

However, interest rates have not risen in line with Government borrowing and for Treasury Bills are still very low as are other short term rates. But at the long end of the market they are approaching 10 percent. Yields on 25-year Government stock and 15-year local authority stock are now significantly above dividend yields on the stock exchange.

In the commercial banking sector demand deposits are at a record $400 million while their balances with the Reserve Bank are at $43 million.

Ironically, Zimbabwe is in the same position as Britain where Mrs Thatcher has rested much of her hopes on controlling Government spending.

Latest results there show that the money supply has got out of hand because of Government borrowing, despite the Conservative Party's attempts to chop it. Sterling has been growing at a yearly rate of 20 percent.

British Government borrowing last month was £2 000 million ($3 800 million). And it seems to be increasing.

LABOR MINISTER VISITS CUBA, CRITICIZES SOUTH AFRICA

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 20 Dec 80 p 2

[Text] THE Minister of Labour and Social Services, Mr Kumbirai Kangai, said in Havana, Cuba, yesterday that South Africa had chosen to make itself the aggressor in Southern Africa and was daily promoting subversion in independent states in the region.

"South Africa is firmly entrenched on a course to destabilise our country and region," said Mr Kangai, who is representing Zimbabwe at the Second Congress of the Communist Party of Cuba which ends today.

In his speech, released in Salisbury, Mr Kangai said South Africa's hostile activities would not deter ZANU (PF) or the Government from working for the independence of Namibia and the freedom of oppressed South Africans.

Zimbabwe demands and hopes that the proposed conference on Namibia be held, recognising SWAPO as the sole and authentic representative of the people of that country.

"If the conference can lead to the attainment of genuine independence by Namibia, then the progressive community will be left with only South Africa as its main concern in Southern Africa," said the Minister.

Mr Kangai told the Congress, which re-elected President Fidel Castro as the Cuban Communist Party's leader, that Zimbabwe wanted economic links with Cuba.

"Our friendly political and diplomatic relations can only be consolidated through closer economic ties.

"Political and diplomatic relations alone, no matter how friendly, will not survive the challenges of our epoch. They need to breed and feed on solid bilateral economic relations," Mr Kangai said.

He also told his audience of Zimbabwe's concept of reconciliation through which the country was establishing a new political order based on democracy and majority rule.

"It is on the foundation of this principle that we are finding it possible to transform groupist objectives and inclinations into collectivist, popular and socialist objectives and aspirations," he said.

"Our people as a whole are quickly transforming by accepting the principle of unity and reconciliation," he added.

He thanked Cuba for its assistance during Zimbabwe's armed liberation struggle and praised President Castro for the "dynamism he injected into the leadership of the liberation struggle throughout the world".

"We have no doubt in our minds that when the history of decolonisation is finally written, it will record the illustrious and sacrificial role played by Comrade President Castro and the people of Cuba," said Mr Kangai.

Without Cuba's help for Africa's liberation struggles, the continent would not be what it is today.

WHITES ADAPTING TO THEIR NEW SITUATION

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 16 Dec 80 p 2

[Text]

BULAWAYO.

WHITES in Rhodesia were, in the present circumstances, "playing their cards correctly", the former Prime Minister, Mr Ian Smith, said yesterday.

"But make no mistake, they are going through a tough time and there is a limit to the kind of punishment they can stand," he said.

Speaking during an interview at his Umzingwane farm, near Bulawayo, Mr Smith said he was pleased to see that most whites were being reasonable about the overall situation in the country. There had been dramatic, even revolutionary, changes.

"Surprisingly, they have adapted themselves and are trying to make the most of the situation, trying to make things work."

He said the country was losing too many whites. If the health and education standard dropped or the systems were shattered with, then whites would leave at a faster pace.

A breakdown in the confidence of whites, who had the professionalism and skills, would contribute greatly to the collapse of the Rhodesian economy.

"There has been a lot of talk from Government Ministers about reconciliation: how they were going to forget the past, and how they wished to keep the whites.

"While some Ministers are genuine in their intentions in this regard there are clearly some who are not.

"They are undermining whatever good work has been done by the more sensible and responsible ones," he said.

He did not believe the country was being run on the lines of a one-party state yet, although some Ministers had said openly they were in favour of it.

Mr Smith said he could see a few red warning lights flashing on the economic horizon. The financial side was the hardest to manage and the Government was not well served with talent in this field.

Whites, he said, were prepared to accept some kind of socialism but not marxism, and a rise in the living standard of living was always accepted by them. The problem was money.

"It now looks as if there is an attempt to do this at a pace quicker than the economy can stand."

Mr Smith said a complete take-over of the mass media would be a suppression of the freedom of expression.

He had always been opposed to Voice of Zimbabwe Freedom but had never interfered with it.

"We are supposed to be at peace, yet there is more Government control over the mass media than there was when the RF was in power," he said.

EX-MP, THREE ZANLA MEN JOIN NFZ

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 21 Dec 80 p 5

[Text]

A FORMER UANC Member of Parliament in Bishop Abel Muzorewa's government, Mr John Nyawhata, and three former guerillas in ZANLA, Elias Hondo, Joseph Chimurenga and Fani Nenji, have joined the National Front for Zimbabwe (NFZ).

The four were among nearly 30 people who officially signed on as NFZ members at a brief ceremony at a house in Avenue, Salisbury, on Friday.

The three former guerillas were among the 71 who returned to Zimbabwe at the beginning of this year after being detained for nearly three years by the Mozambique authorities on the instructions of ZANU (PF).

Mr Nyawhata said the role of opposition parties was not merely being antagonistic towards the Government or promoting anarchy in the country, but to act as a watchdog to ensure that the ruling authority did not renege on its responsibilities to the people.

He deplored the tendency among some people in Government to regard opposition political parties as mischief-makers, bent on orchestrating anarchy and lawlessness.

Welcoming the new members, NFZ president Mr Peter Mandaza said that although Zimbabwe had attained independence and a black majority Government, people were still not quite free to go about their affairs because of the unfavourable security situation.

Because the Government had failed to fulfill its promises to pay the former guerillas an allowance of $100 a month, some had resorted to "extorting" from the ordinary people their "reward" for sacrificing their lives during the liberation struggle.

FORMER OFFICIAL CLAIMS TO BE VICTIM OF HARASSMENT

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 21 Dec 80 p 2

[Text]

A FORMER Cabinet Minister in the transitional government, Mr Gibson Magaramombe, believes he is the target of a hate-campaign directed at leaders of opposition political parties.

A distraught Mr Magaramombe alleged a "vicious and calculated plot to destroy me and my family".

He complained that from the time he was publicly assaulted in a central Salisbury street last August, it appeared a systematic campaign to demoralise and terrorise him and his family had become the "pre-occupation of some people in high places".

"I seriously want to protest about this persecution because like any other Zimbabwean I feel I am also entitled to the peace that has come with our independence." he said.

He claimed a number of "comrades" had visited his home while he was not there and had asked questions about himself and members of his family.

A police spokesman declined to comment on the matter last week saying he would investigate.

But an angry Mr Magaramombe declared he was "sick and tired" of being harassed and terrorised because of his political views.

Mr Magaramombe, a former co-Minister of Health, Social Affairs, Manpower and Education believes he is a victim of political vendetta and wonders what the motives are.

He said he had made numerous reports to the police and that in some instances officers had been assigned to protect him.

Mr Magaramombe appealed to political leaders to restrain party members from taking the law into their own hands and warned that if the situation were unchecked it could develop into anarchy and lawlessness.

"We should be more concerned with rebuilding our economy, not settling worthless political scores," he said.

DETAILS ON NEW CURRENCY GIVEN

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 20 Dec 80 p 3

[Text]

DETAILS of the new designs for Zimbabwe's currency, due to be introduced next April, were announced yesterday. The designs represent features of Zimbabwe.

In a special supplementary Government notice from the Minister of Finance, Senator Enos Nkala, published yesterday, all aspects of the new coins were outlined.

On the obverse side of all coins there will be an impression of the Zimbabwe Bird looking to the left, and around it will be the inscription "ZIMBABWE" with the year of manufacture.

In the case of each newly introduced coin the reverse side will bear the following:

- The 1c coin, the numeral "1" circled by a garland of leaves;
- The 5c coin, an impression of a hare and the numeral "5";
- The 10c coin, an impression of a baobab tree and the numeral "10";
- The 20c coin, an impression of the Birchenough Bridge and the numeral "20";
- The 50c coin, an impression of the rising sun and the numeral "50"; and
- The $1 coin, an impression of the Zimbabwe Ruins and the value inscribed as "$1".

The edges of the 1c and $1 coins will be milled and those of the 5c, 10c, 20c and 50c coins will be smooth.

The standard mass in grams will be as scheduled in the notice: 1c — 3 g; 5c — 2,5 g; 10c — 3,75 g; 20c — 5,5 g; 50c — 7,5 g; and $1 — 10 g.

Besides the coins there will also be new $2, $5 and $10 notes, together with the introduction of a $20 note.

All aspects of the new currency design were considered by a special committee set up in April this year under the chairmanship of the Deputy Minister, Dr Oliver Munyaradzi.

Its decisions were reached after "due attention" had been given to Zimbabwe's financial interests inside and outside the country and to international trends in sizes of currency.

INDUSTRIAL, ECONOMIC BOOM REPORTED

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 21 Dec 80 p 3

[Text]

ZIMBABWE is booming. Industry is on the up and up—which means more jobs for the people and more cash for the nation.

Mr Reg Sampson, president of the Confederation of Zimbabwe Industry, which represents all the top manufacturers, said: "I'm very confident of the future."

The upturn in industry since the end of the war has been impressive.

Statistics in the Reserve Bank's Quarterly Economic Review—the first produced since UDI—tell the cheering story by comparing output in the first six months of this year to the same period in 1979:

- Metal industries, such as engineering, up 17,4 percent.
- Non-metal minerals up 14,2 percent.
- Wood and furniture, which is enjoying a big rise in demand at home and abroad, up 25,4 percent.
- Transport equipment, such as railway rolling stock, up 25,2 percent.
- Chemical and petroleum products up 15,8 percent.
- Drink and tobacco up 25,5 percent.

The overall increase in the manufacturing industry — which makes a quarter of Zimbabwe's gross domestic product—has been 14,3 percent.

And that is in a recession-battered world where most economies are going down.

The review also says that the value of mining production has leapt by 63 percent, mainly because of high gold prices.

CZI chief executive Mr Tony Reed said: "The economy is doing very nicely."

Foreign investment is coming in—and is expected to rise steadily next year. But investment has not been as great as most businessmen expected. Political uncertainty is blamed.

However, local industrialists are pumping fortunes into their firms. "Generally I think industrialists are confident of the future. We have a good local market and lots of export markets have opened up," said Mr Reed.

Businessmen have promised the Government that they will launch a big export drive next year.

"The Prime Minister has made it clear that we must expand our export market away from South Africa," added Mr Reed.

"We'll look to surrounding states: Botswana, which has one of the best balance of payments in Africa, Zambia, Mozambique and Malawi. These are our natural markets. We always used to do a lot of business with Zambia."

Industry's greatest problem is the shortage of foreign currency—which can be a vicious circle.

When businessmen can't get foreign cash, they can't buy raw materials to produce the finished goods to sell abroad to get foreign cash . . .

Many industrialists believe the Government should make foreign exchange available by committing itself to pay in the future. Individual businessmen cannot do this.

Other difficulties facing industry include shortages of skilled workers and strikes.

TOBACCO INDUSTRY ACCEPTS GOVERNMENT TERMS

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 22 Dec 80 p 3

[Text]

THE flue-cured tobacco trade and the Zimbabwe Tobacco Association were obliged to accept all Government terms.

This included the limitation of this year's crop to 70 million kg, said Mr Bertie Palmer, president of the ZTA.

This was because of the acceptance of the Government's help in the intervention exercise to improve tobacco prices on the auction floors six weeks after the start of the selling season, he said.

In a letter to growers throughout the country, Mr Palmer said in July this year the Government, after consultation with trade members, the Tobacco Corporation and the ZTA, imposed a national crop size of 70 million kg maximum.

"The ZTA were required to implement a control scheme on the growers. The method of implementation was up to us, provided the mass sold did not exceed 70 million kg," he said.

"Our association was not in agreement with Government on the crop size. We requested a minimum weight of 85 million kg," he added.

BOOST

He said that at the same time as this was being discussed it was necessary to mount an intervention exercise to boost floor prices.

"Acceptance of Government help in the intervention exercise put an obligation on the trade and ZTA to accept all the Government's terms — including the 70 million kg maximum."

Mr Palmer said this year the association was compelled to accept Government's condition.

"Future negotiations will be between the association and the trade for our crop size, although we will still need Government ratification of our agreement," he added.

SHORTAGES DELAY CAR PRODUCTION

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 20 Dec 80 p 3

[Text]

BULAWAYO.

WORK at Zimbabwe's car assembly plants has been held up by a shortage of components. No new cars are expected on the market before February.

It is understood that two models, comprising more than 500 cars, are involved.

"The car packs arrived without certain components and frantic efforts are being made to obtain them," Mr George Griffin, chairman of the Motor Trade Association of Matabeleland, said in Bulawayo yesterday.

He said there was a "desperate" shortage, overall, of new cars because of the dwindling purchasing power of foreign currency allocations as car prices went up.

"This is having a ripple effect on the availability of good used cars. In fact, Zimbabwe's car fleet is being eroded at the rate of 20 percent a year, through theft, write-offs due to accidents and to the lack of spares for older cars.

"The replacement of new cars into the market is about 5 percent a year, giving a net loss of 15 percent.

He said during the next quota period, January to June, there would probably be fewer new cars available.

The effect on the used car market would be worse than it is now, where stocks held by dealers had dropped by between 50 percent and 90 percent in the past six months.

Mr Griffin said the situation was so bad that many Bulawayo dealers, who normally stocked between 80 and 100 used cars, had fewer than 10 on their stands.

He said the association's national executive had discussed various methods of solving the problem at a meeting in Salisbury this week.

One suggestion had been that a large number of good used cars should be imported.

"The Government is not amenable to this. It believes it would be more economical to bring in new car packs minus certain components, which could be made locally, such as tyres, batteries, glass, seat frames, upholstery and exhausts.

MINERAL PRICE DROP HITS PRODUCERS

Salisbury BUSINESS HERALD in English 18 Dec 80 p 1

[Text] FALLING world commodity prices, especially in minerals, have severely affected Zimbabwe producers but analysts here say prices have reached their lowest levels.

These have tumbled in the last six months with copper staying below $900 a tonne, nickel down and tin severely weakened. Gold has appeared to have settled down.

Common opinion is that this country must await President Reagan's policies. But it appears that he is going to cut down on Government spending and so the United States recession and high interest rates are likely to stay for some time.

Salisbury brokers say that metal prices are low by historic levels. Said one: "Copper producers will cut back production and new mines will not come into production until prices have reached the right levels. There is not a great risk of further falls."

Another broker noted that though there had been a sharp drop in sugar prices, the reason for the original increase in price had been because of speculation buying.

"Its present level is no different from that ruling before the speculators moved in. Now that interest rates in the United States have moved up they have gone into buying money and moved away from commodities.

"Just what will happen in general is hard to fathom. Reagan is talking in terms of high interest rates continuing, which implies a recession, but at the same time is wanting tax cuts which means he wants to stimulate the economy."

All agree that stockpiling is not going to become widespread by producers.

This is because it will cost too much to finance the extra stocks (in other words borrow the money to keep going while holding back on supplies) caused by the high interest rates. The same is likely to happen here.

DISRUPTED

For nickel producers in this country a peculiar situation exists. A review by RAL Merchant Bank shows that marketing is being disrupted throughout the world by contracts between major producers and their larger customers, with the latter being able to get big discounts and favourable credit terms.

This means producers here have to match these low prices. Very little of the international trading is done through the London Metal Exchange.

The LME price was between £2 700 in June and July whereas the Zimbabwe price was only £2 350 a tonne. Exports for 1980 are likely to be higher than previous years however, with the first seven months bringing in $20 million.

On gold most observers say it will vary between U.S.$570 to U.S.$620 an ounce. Central banks and the jewellery industry will become more prominent, again because of high interest rates for money. But no one expects levels to get to the U.S.$760 to U.S.$900 level again.

The RAL analysis says that enormous stockpiles of oil in western countries meant they were not too badly affected by the Middle East conflict, and so it was no huge swing to gold.

The Iraq and Iran war has put conflicting pressures on the gold price. One is that both sides might have to sell gold to pay for the war but this is counterbalanced by the United States possibly having to release Iran's blocked funds, leading to a move out of the U.S. dollar into gold.

Supply will also influence the world market. Russia has reduced its sales to the west in recent years but its poor crop yields this year and an economic downturn in 1981 will make it a more rigorous buyer on commodity markets.

South Africa is in an immensely strong position and is secure enough to withhold sales if it sees prices falling to levels it finds unacceptable.

PRESIDENT LAUNCHES POULTRY FARM PLAN

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 13 Dec 80 p 7

[Article by Mike Overmeyer]

[Text]

WORKING together is the essence of a revolutionary change taking place at State House in Salisbury where the launching of a farming co-operative is involving all on an equal footing.

Four hundred chickens were yesterday moved into a newly-built fowl run.

At the official opening ceremony of the Mushandire Panwe Co-operative in poultry production, President Banana told workers at State House:

"This event constitutes a culmination of the co-operative effort by the workers and inmates of State House to transform the former colonial-type and exclusivist paradise of the elite into a people-centred home and production centre."

All workers at State House will have equal shares in the co-operative.

President Banana said: "As its name denotes, the Mushandire Panwe project eschews the outmoded ideas of individualism and selfishness.

"Its central theme is unity in work regardless of social class. Accordingly the co-operative unites all the people of State House from the gardener to the highest man.

"All members have an equal input and output in the project. The project is still at its infancy but we hope it will expand and become self-supporting in the long run," he said.

The chairman of the co-operative, President Banana expected it to eventually have about 2000 chickens.

Mrs Banana has already embarked on a flower and gardening co-operative scheme to operate on the same level as the poultry production venture.

One of the major motivating factors of starting such co-operatives was the need to inspire others to follow suit.

"In particular we hope this modest project will help to encourage all our people to develop a strong sense of responsibility towards work so that Zimbabwe can become a self-reliant and self-sufficient country," he said.

"Rather than indulge in futile and divisive activities all our people should seek to participate in the productive process."

He said a strong and sound economic structure was a prerequisite for a stable political system.

It was also expected that more use would be made of wasted space on the State House plot. But this would happen as production developed on the first stage of the poultry project.

PLUMTREE LAND-SHARING PROJECT FAILS

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 16 Dec 80 p 3

[Text]

THE Plumtree plan for commercial cattlemen to share their grazing land with tribal farmers has fallen flat.

Commercial and peasant farmers in the Plumtree district launched a "good neighbour scheme" in October.

It was agreed that TTL farmers could graze their cattle on land belonging to commercial farmers until the rains fell and improved TTL grazelands.

The Minister of Home Affairs, Dr Joshua Nkomo, chaired the meeting to help solve the twin problems of shortage of TTL grazing land and the move [illegible] to commercial land by peasant farmers.

But it was claimed yesterday that nothing came of the meeting.

Problems facing commercial farmers included veld fires, drought and TTL farmers who had already moved on to the land.

The District Commissioner of Plumtree, Mr Dale Curtis, said no further official agreements were reached after the October meeting.

He said: "Some farmers whose land adjoined TTL took it upon themselves to help out and they offered grazing land to peasant farmers.

"But many other farmers, who would have helped were unable to do so because of veld fires and drought.

"The situation has been helped now by the rains. The reason behind the scheme originally was to help the TTL farmers graze their cattle until the rains could improve their lands.

"I wouldn't say the scheme has failed totally because some commercial farmers did help of their own accord.

"From what I've seen in the district, the early rains have had a good effect on the TTL lands and I now doubt whether the scheme is needed," said Mr Curtis.

A similar "grazing co-operation" scheme operating at Gwanda has met with success.

The District Commissioner for the area, Mr Ian Mathews, said yesterday: "There have been some problems, but on the whole the scheme has been a success.

"A total of 30 000 cattle have been grazed by TTL farmers on land belonging to commercial farmers.

"The scheme has undoubtedly saved the lives of very many cattle and done a tremendous amount to promote goodwill between everyone."

RECORD MAIZE HARVEST FORECAST

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 21 Dec 80 p 1

[Text]

ZIMBABWE is set to reap its biggest yet maize harvest. There could be more than one million tonnes to export at the end of the season.

And the markets are on our doorstep — Zambia, Angola, Mozambique . . .

"It's a beautiful agricultural scene," said David Spain, president of the Commercial Farmers' Union.

He said the number of hectares under maize had jumped from 225 000 to more than 300 000 this season.

He gave three main reasons for the big rise:

- The end of the war.
- The Government's "bold" policy in upping the guaranteed price.
- The drop in tobacco-growing which has led to more maize.

The total maize crop in Rhodesia could be between 1,8 and 2 million tonnes.

"That would be our biggest crop yet," said Mr Spain.

Rhodesia's home needs are about 500 000 tonnes, which would leave between 800 000 and 1 million tonnes for export.

"That would be our biggest export of maize so far," added Mr Spain.

But he cautioned: "There's a long way to go yet before reaping.

"The weather has to be kind to us before these great things can happen. We could suffer a drought — but the rains have got off to a reasonably good start, except in the north of the country."

He said the possible massive maize production underlined the crucial role of farming in Rhodesia and the prediction by the Minister of Agriculture, Senator Denis Norman: "Food will become more powerful than oil."

Mr Spain said travelling through the nation's farming areas today was a joy.

"I've never seen the crops so magnificent. They're fantastic. They're healthy and growing well," he said. "You can go to Hartley, Rushat, Gwelo, Odzi, Enterprise, anywhere . . . it's the same."

Farmers also hope for a bumper wheat harvest next winter with production increased by up to 50 percent.

But wheat is a costly crop to grow and the farmers want the $300 a tonne price for the 1981 harvest. Wheat imports could cost $320 a tonne.

Mr Spain said that less than half of Rhodesia's 400 wheat producers have grown the crop consistently for the past three years.

"We must encourage them all into production," he said.

The beef industry is still struggling to get out of the doldrums.

Mr Spain praised the Ministry of Lands for setting up an inquiry into the industry.

"These problems — the reduction of the national herd through bad pricing policies in the past, the war, theft and disease — can't be overcome overnight," he added.

The farmers' leader said beef shortages could become more regular and severe if cattle ranchers are not given greater incentives, such as bonuses for each calf born.

An estimated 200 more commercial farmers have started work on the land since independence, bringing the total CFU number to 5 000.

Some are young men going into the industry for the first time, but most are farmers returning to land they evacuated during the war.

And a much greater hostelage exodus is being said.

Mr Spain said that in his own area, Shamva, there was a string of empty farms at the end of last season—today there is only one.

But he added that so many commercial farmers had left some areas during the war — such as Mtoko and Mount Darwin — that the others would not return. They would feel too socially isolated.

Talks?

The CFU is negotiating with the Government to turn such areas into resettlement schemes.

Mr Spain said the remaining farmers should be bought out at realistic prices or transferred to other areas.

He said the country's farmers were generally confident of the future.

But he added: "I don't want to make everything out as rosy — it's certainly not."

Mr Spain said farmers were still hit by stock and fencing theft and squatters.

And there was a certain amount of apprehension about the political future.

"But the Prime Minister and several of his Ministers have done their best to reassure us," he said.

"In proportion to their numbers, fewer farmers have left this country than members of other sectors of the community."

Mr Spain added: "The farmer is very adaptable, probably more adaptable than most."

REVITALIZATION OF COTTON INDUSTRY REPORTED

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 18 Dec 80 p 3

[Text]

GOKWE'S blossoming cotton industry is back on the road to success.

The Cotton Marketing Board is building a new depot to handle the expected increase in cotton yields and good early rains have boosted hopes.

Gokwe can account for more than half of the country's cotton harvest from tribal trust lands, and over 12 percent of the national output.

The district last year reaped $2,5 million from the sale of its cotton and next year's harvest could show an increase of more than 40 percent.

The United Nations High Commission for Refugees boosted the district's efforts to rebuild its cotton industry with the free distribution of seed packs.

More than 5 000 packs were sent out, with each pack capable of planting half a hectare of cotton.

Mr Derek Bates, the regional agricultural officer for the district, said yesterday that an air of enthusiasm filled Gokwe because of the expected good cotton harvest.

Mr Bates, from the Department of Agricultural Development said: "Everyone is enthusiastic and happy because of the way things have been going.

"During the war, farmers here were warned by guerillas to stop farming and the cotton business suffered quite badly.

"But since the end of the war things have changed. The original farmers have begun planting again and many people in the area are planting and harvesting cotton for the first time.

"The UNHCR has helped tremendously with the free distribution of seed packs, which is another reason for the expected boom.

"Gokwe is full of expectation and hope for the harvest next year. We have even had good early rains and if all goes well, it could lead to much prosperity for the region.

"The Cotton Marketing Board is already building a new depot here to handle the increase. The depot will have room for expansion and will have all facilities for grading and packing," said Mr Bates.

Devog first began helping the cotton farmers in the early 1980s with advice and maintained a skeleton staff there during the war years.

MOVE FREELY

Their officers have been able to move and help freely since the end of the war, Mr Bates said.

The District Commissioner for Gokwe, Mr Dave Bertram, said yesterday that cotton was the most important single cash crop for the district.

He said: "It could be a record-breaking year for us if all goes well. Everyone is hoping and praying for the right weather.

"More than 300 000 people live in this region and about one third of the land is suitable for cotton farming. There is more than enough room for expansion of the industry."

The commissioner said 1977 was the last time the area was able to reap a highly profitable harvest.

The intervening war years saw farmers too frightened by threats from guerillas to farm normally, he said.

NKOMO CRITICIZES BULAWAYO CURFEW

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 18 Dec 80 p 1

[Text]

BULAWAYO.

ZIPRA men are not contemplating any violence, and there is "absolutely no need" for the curfew in Bulawayo, Dr Joshua Nkomo, Minister of Home Affairs, said yesterday.

Rumour-mongers should shut their mouths, he said. He was speaking in an interview at the farm college he has established on the Umguza River near Bulawayo for refugee students.

"Those who talk about expecting an outbreak of violence are sponsoring it," he said.

"I can tell the people here that they can rest assured that ZIPRA and ZAPU are not contemplating violence against anybody. If people who talk of an outbreak of violence would shut their mouths they would do the entire population of this country a very good service."

It was "the nonsense statement of the year" to say that the police in Bulawayo and the security forces and some of the people wanted the curfew, he said.

"Nobody wants the curfew. What for? Why curb the free life of the people? I cannot understand why it is there. My house is right inside the curfew area. I do not see why the damned thing (the curfew) should be there. We did have a problem once here, but where has there not been a problem?"

The problem — the recent unrest — in Bulawayo had been triggered by "the big talkers", he said.

"Bulawayo was one of the most peaceful towns until these people held a two-day rally. I have never seen a rally that goes on for two days unless it is to stir up trouble."

People who "speak — about a tribal language" and fostered tribal allegiances were fomenting trouble, he said.

"They want our people to be divided on tribal lines. That is the worst thing any tribal leader can want. Some of us have worked hard to see our people living as one people."

Tribal division was as evil as racial division, he said.

"We would like to see people of all colours and ethnic backgrounds forming the Zimbabwe nation. That's what some of us have suffered for for all these years. That is why I hate to see people promoting tribal division."

Asked if he had information on when nine Patriotic Front officials held in detention would be released, Dr Nkomo said he had none, and did not yet know why his party officials had been detained.

"I think the 90 days are about over," he said. "And the sooner they are out the better for everybody. Are we not the people who were talking about detention without trial? Why must it be so easy for us to run around and detain people?" he asked.

PLAN TO BUILD NATIONAL SPORTS STADIUM REPORTED

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 16 Dec 80 p 1

[Text]

BUILDING of a 100 000-seat national sports stadium — financed by a country yet to be named — is to go ahead in Salisbury next year and should be completed by the end of 1982.

The instigator of the stadium, the Mayor of Salisbury, Councillor Jack Whiting, said yesterday that agreement on finance had been provisionally made with the country concerned.

"We have got agreement in principle that we're going to build," he said. "It is now up to the Government to reach final agreement.

"I have done the preliminary work as an individual, not as the Mayor, to get the project off the ground. Now it's going to be over to the Government and the sporting bodies concerned."

The Mayor said two pieces of land had been earmarked for Government use to build a stadium.

One is in the Waterfalls area, just off the Beatrice Road, and the other is the vacant land at Ardendale, between Kambanma and Mabelreign.

"No choice has yet been made," said the Mayor. "These are both central points in high density [illegible] areas, which have adequate road transport, domestic light and water available."

He believes it will take about another three months to complete detailed planning and that building of the stadium will start within a year.

The main stadium will include a soccer field, surrounded by a synthetic athletics track, to include sophisticated timing equipment.

Within the structure there will be an indoor hall for such sports as basketball and volleyball.

"At the same time there is a requirement for an Olympic swimming pool and diving tower," said the Mayor, "and this might go in this stadium.

"This country is probably one of the most sport conscious on the continent," he said yesterday. "and it now gives me great pleasure to report that I have received the green light to go ahead with plans to build a stadium which will not only cater for soccer, but other sports as well.

"I have the support of the Prime Minister, the Minister of Local Government and Housing and the Minister of Sport for the project.

"This objective could not have been achieved without the full support of the Government and I would like to publicly thank them for their enthusiasm when they have so many other priorities to deal with."

The Mayor said the Minister of Sport had rightly taken a keen interest, but issued a word of warning.

"Let sport not involve themselves directly with the domestic running and organisation of the various sporting bodies to the point that sport loses its individuality and becomes State controlled."

Councillor Whiting will now endeavour to get the municipality to develop sports fields and facilities within the city "so that the ordinary man can play sport at a reasonable cost."

NURSING SCHOOL DIRECTIVES ANNOUNCED

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 20 Dec 80 p 1

[Text]

THE Minister of Health, Dr Herbert Ushewokunze, yesterday announced that he had issued a directive that "half of the white girls at any nursing school must go to Mpilo or Harare Hospitals for their training because there must be one common school for all nurses".

The Minister was addressing a staff meeting at Bulawayo's Central Hospital.

He said: "Another directive is that no nurse should be made to resign from her training until she gets to her finals, which she will be allowed to attempt twice.

"Should she fail, I shall find something for her in the Zimbabwe health services."

Amid thunderous applause, Dr Ushewokunze said he was changing "the practice of the past where no white nurse could be transferred to Mpilo unless she was going there as matron or unless there was some occasional special class".

Dr Ushewokunze said it was necessary that staff attitudes towards one another and the Government should change.

"There are people in Zimbabwe today who refer to the Government as your Government' and to Ministers as 'your Ministers' as if they themselves did not belong to Zimbabwe," he said.

"When the RF was in office, I used to refer to its services as 'Government services' although I did not support it. We are all Zimbabweans, and unless one belongs to a migrant labourers' group, one cannot refer to the Government as 'your Government' and to the Ministers as 'your Ministers'."

Dr Ushewokunze invited what he called "those who resist change to accept change and the aspirations of the majority".

He said it was not his intention to legislate against racist attitudes, but to bring about change by appealing to those practising them to change.

"Negative attitudes impinge on the effective delivery of the service to patients, resulting in lack of unity among staff members of all races, lack of trust, a feeling of lack of promotion opportunities by African staff and junior sisters," he said.

Talking about medical staff members' attitudes towards patients, the Minister said: "There is a tendency to forget that the patient is the focus and VIP of hospital activity, and not a means to realising career goals and acquiring status."

He said he would change the practice under which specialist nurses were assigned to departments having nothing to do with their training.

ESC SPARKLES WITH RECORD SALES

Salisbury BUSINESS HERALD in English 18 Dec 80 p 1

[Text]

THE Electricity Supply Commission has announced an operating profit of $5,4m. for the year ended June 30, 1980.

In its annual report, the ESC announced that electricity sales for the year rose to 4 738,6 million kwh, representing an increase of 14,8 percent on sales for the previous year. This was also the highest annual sales figure recorded since the inception of the commission in 1950.

Record sales were achieved in the mining, industrial, municipal and domestic categories, with consumption increasing by 22,5 percent in the industrial sector to 2 575 million kwh. This increase was mainly due to improved production in the ferrochrome smelting industry.

The mining industry was the second largest consumer of power, at 1 947 million kwh and satisfactory increases were also recorded in municipal and domestic consumption.

Small decreases were recorded in the commercial and farming sectors, however, farming sales being dependent on rainfall, which affected the level of irrigation pumping.

Revenue from electricity sales increased by 19,8 percent to $66,8 million, although retail tariffs remained unaltered throughout the year, despite CAPCO increasing its bulk supply tariff to the commission by 8 percent as from January 1, 1980. The average price paid to the commission by consumers decreased, however, from 1,260c in 1978/1979 to 1,267c in 1979/80.

Expenditure rose by 16,4 percent to $55,7 million, resulting in an overall surplus of $5,4 million, which was transferred into the General Reserve Fund.

This fund is used for the development of the commission's supply system throughout the country, with the construction of a new thermal power station at Wankie being the largest single project it is presently engaged in.

The first stage of the Wankie power station will include the installation of four 120 mw generators, and together with all ancilliary transmission and civil works, is expected to cost about $300 million. Stage 1 of the project is well under way and the first generator should be in operation by the end of 1982.

In his annual review, the general manager of the commission, Mr D. R. Irvine, said that the commission had experienced a highly successful year, despite a continuing shortage of qualified staff.

The record sales figure was particularly important, he said, as it showed that the commission was able to meet the upsurge in the country's economy.

OFFICIAL CLAIMS SUCCESS OF FREE HEALTH PROGRAM

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 15 Dec 80 p 2

[Text]

THE Government's programme to offer free health care to people earning less than $150 a month had been so successful that the rate at which the service was being used had doubled — in some cases actually tripled — since its introduction in September, the Deputy Minister of Health, Dr Simon Mazorodze, said yesterday.

This meant the Government had removed the financial barrier to health care in a situation where, according to a Ministry study, only 2.2 percent of Zimbabwe's rural population earned more than $150 a month, he said.

Dr Mazorodze, addressing Salisbury health authorities in Mutare, also predicted Zimbabwe would achieve its goal of health for all by 2000 instead of by 2050, by instituting the concept of primary health care.

At last week's World Health Organisation symposium in Salisbury, he said, the director-general of W.H.O., Dr Matthew Mahler, had advocated primary health care as the means of achieving health for all by 2000.

He and the Minister, Dr Herbert Ushewokunze, had agreed that to achieve that goal by 1990 would mean that national health development would have to be restructured by diverting more health resources to the rural areas.

And that goal could be achieved with the support of all health workers, the communities and the Government.

Dr Mazorodze said the implementation of primary health care would require a new approach to training health personnel and organising delivery systems.

Essentially, the idea would be to promote health within the community on a continuing basis rather than imposing it from the top.

For this reason, Zimbabwe, like other countries, has identified the need to develop a community - based, extended worker, namely, the village health worker.

HEALTH, EDUCATION APPOINTMENTS ANNOUNCED

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 18 Dec 80 p 1

[Text]

IMPORTANT posts have been filled in the Ministries of Health and Education and Culture, including the appointment of a Doctor of Education to the post of Secretary for Education and Culture.

Dr Nicholas G. Mahuro's appointment as Secretary for Education and Culture is effective from December 1. Born in Gutu and educated at Simato Secondary School in the Victoria Province, Dr Mahuro attended the Dadaya Teacher Training College between 1956 and 1957.

He received his M.A. in educational administration and supervision at Roosevelt University of Chicago, and read for his doctorate from 1970-1973 at the University of Illinois, where he was also a lecturer with a desegregation training institute.

The Ministry of Education and Culture has also announced the appointment of a further 28 education officers.

Health Minister Dr Herbert Ushewokunze yesterday announced 29 new appointments in his Ministry, in line with the Presidential directive on African advancement.

"An approximate 75 percent of these are new posts," Dr Ushewokunze said. "The remaining 25 percent are the replacements of people who have left the Ministry."

The Minister emphasised that some of the appointments had resulted from the dismissal of staff.

INVOLVED

Among those appointed is a former ZANLA medic, Dr J. Muvuti, who has recently been involved in the rehabilitation of amputees in Zimbabwe.

He will be one of three new deputy secretaries in the Ministry to join a fourth, Dr Louisa Westwater, who has served with the Ministry for 27 years. She is the first woman in Zimbabwe to attain this position in the Ministry of Health.

The other two deputies will be: Dr D. Hellander, currently working in England, who will join the Ministry as soon as possible; and Dr D. Makuto, Provincial Medical Officer of Health in the Midlands, who will be transferred to Salisbury soon.

BRIEFS

ZANU(PF) MEETING WITH PF--About 60 members of the central committee of both ZANU(PF) and the Patriotic Front yesterday held a four-hour meeting in Salisbury to discuss relations between the two parties. The joint meeting, which was headed by the Prime Minister, Mr Robert Mugabe, and the Minister of Home Affairs, Dr Joshua Nkomo, was held at the Harry Margolis Hall. At the end of the meeting the two parties issued a joint statement which said: "The joint meeting recognised the tension which recently has characterised the relations between the two political parties. The meeting considered and identified some of the causes of the conflict. The meeting deplored the incidents that have been taking place in various parts of the country, disturbing the peace and claiming lives unjustifiably. It called upon all the supporters of ZANU(PF) and the PF to work together peacefully. The joint meeting set up a committee to identify further the areas that give rise to the conflict and to recommend methods of removing those causes." The meeting was originally due to start at 10 a.m., but it was not until 11.30 that all the 30 members from each side sat down to discuss their parties' relations. Some of the members present at the meeting said it had been delayed by 1-1/2 hours in order to allow the Prime Minister to rest Ropa Nhongo, Minister of Youth, Sport and Recreation; Mr Emmerson Munangagwa, Minister of State in the Prime Minister's Office; Mr Edgar Tekere, Minister of Manpower Planning and Development; Mr Simon Muzenda, Deputy Prime Minister; Mr Enos Nkala, Minister of Foreign Affairs; Mr Josiah Chinamano; Mr Willie Musarurwa; Mr Cephas Msipa; and Mr Joseph Msika. ZCTU LABOR UNITY ROLE--The Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions must force splinter unions to rejoin their mother bodies to forge unity in the country's labour movement, a union leader said yesterday. The president of the General Engineering and Metalworkers' Union, Mr Clever Zemba, was speaking in Salisbury after officials of the rival Zimbabwe Engineering and Iron Workers' Union failed to attend a meeting in Salisbury yesterday morning where differences between the two organisations were to have been discussed. Mr Zemba also complained about the failure of the ZCTU to attend the meeting despite its assurances that it would be represented. Mr Zemba's union claims it is the legitimate representative of workers in the engineering industry, saying the other union is an "unregistered" and splinter body. He said the door was still open for Mr Elias Chikomo, president of the rival union, to disband it and come back to the "mother body." The ZCTU should assist in bringing about the reunion by closing down the offices of Mr Chikomo's union, he said. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 15 Dec 80 p 5]

SINGLE UNION URGED--The Railways Associated Workers' Union passed a resolution at its annual congress in Salisbury at the weekend supporting the Government's call for a single trade union centre in Zimbabwe. The union's general secretary, Mr Anderson Mhungu, yesterday said delegates from throughout the country were unanimous on the issue. "All the delegates felt there was need to establish such a centre in Zimbabwe as soon as possible. This will alleviate more splits in the trade union movement." He also said the establishment of such a centre would make trade unions more powerful and speak with one voice in dealing with the workers' problems. He added that the centre's main task should be solely to solve the workers' problems. "Without such a centre, it will be very difficult for trade unions to achieve their objective. We must work together in order to be more effective." Mr Mhungu urged rival trade unions not to rush to the Press and issue statements condemning each other. He said this was very destructive and should be stopped. "We must always try and solve our differences without going to the Press. Rushing to the Press is not helpful at all." He said the congress also passed a resolution that all railway employees in Grades 12 and 11 be promoted to Grade 10 and that all extraneous employees be put on permanent employment after six months. RIO TINTO CONTROL--Rio Tinto has had an almost 100 percent acceptance of its offer to buy out the remaining shareholding of Rio Trust and Empress Nickel. It already owns a controlling interest. The company now has 20 300 000 shares in issue, giving it a total market capitalisation of more than $60 million. The organisation is moving towards acquiring the remaining 2 percent of the shares it does not hold. Acceptance has been received from shareholders with 2 705 382 shares in Empress, which is 97,6 percent, and 1 302 091 in Rio-trust, 98,1 percent. Rio Tinto has issued 2 118 025 new shares to the shareholders for the two companies which had accepted the offers. Empress had an after-tax profit of $865 000 for the first nine months of the current year. Shareholding in Empress will involve the refinery at Eiffel Flats, the gold mining operations at Patchway and Brompton mines and dumps at the old Cam and Motor mine, Sandawana emerald mine near Belingwe and a pilot ferrochrome plant and a number of chrome mines currently dormant pending improvement in world ferrochrome markets. A new project is under way at Renco near Fort Victoria where expansions will cost $17 000 000, bringing in an output worth $16 million a year at current gold prices. LAMONT TO LEAVE--The Roman Catholic Bishop of Umtali, the Rt Rev. Donal Lamont, is to leave his post and Zimbabwe when a replacement is found by the Pope. The bishop said it was not up to him to find a successor. "It's not unusual to ask for a replacement at my age and there's no question of my being forced to resign. No bishop is ever asked to resign--he's entitled to serve for as long as he likes. It's only right for me to ask to be relieved of office when I've been so long on the job," Bishop Lamont said yesterday. He has been serving in Zimbabwe since 1946. FERTILIZER FROM JAPAN--Japan plans to give Zimbabwe more than half a million dollars worth of fertiliser, a spokesman for the Japanese Charge d'Affaires said in Salisbury yesterday. This boost to the country's agricultural programme would be formalised with the signing of a commodity grant agreement between Japanese and Zimbabwean officials "as soon as possible." The spokesman noted that Japan had already provided Zimbabwe with reconstruction aid to the value of about U.S.$1 million in the form of roadbuilding equipment. On future trade between the two countries the spokesman said: "Japan is attracted to the prospect of increasing and consolidating its links with Zimbabwe because of the growing stability of the country." FARMERS LEAVE DEBTS--The Agricultural Finance Corporation is owned $651 000 by farmers who have left Zimbabwe leaving behind unsettled debts. The matter has been placed in the hands of the lawyers who are tracing the 16 people involved. "The corporation takes tracing and legal action in order to recover monies owing to it by those farmers who leave the country without making arrangements for the repayment of outstanding loans," an AFC spokesman said. The spokesman said most of the corporation's clients who left the country had, where applicable, made proper arrangements for repayment of their debts. The Corporation had auctioned off some farms whose owners had left the country. Other farmers had been hit by drought and were not able to meet their loan repayments. The money would, however, be recovered when they had better results, the spokesman said. [Text] [Salisbury BUSINESS HERALD in English 18 Dec 80 p 1]

MILITARY PLANE DITCHES--An Air Force of Zimbabwe Dakota carrying two sick men was last week forced to make an emergency landing..in the middle of a dam. The three-man crew and two ill servicemen were rescued by a farmer in a small boat. The crew were unhurt. The transport plane stayed afloat on Glenisla Farm dam, near Marandellas, for nearly an hour before sinking. Only the tail fin was above water yesterday. Observers believe all five men are lucky to be alive because of the rocky terrain surrounding the dam. The Dakota had to make a forced landing on Thursday when one engine cut out. The plane was carrying the sick men from Umtali to hospital in Salisbury. The Air Force is expected to try to salvage the Dakota tomorrow by floating it to the surface with air bags. They will then dismantle it and transport it to an airbase for reassembly and repairs. The plane is believed not to be badly damaged. Dakotas served as the workhorses of the Rhodesian Security Forces during the war, transporting equipment and paratroopers. [Text] [Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 21 Dec 80 p 1]

MINISTER INSPECTS TRACTORS--The Deputy Minister of Lands, Resettlement and Rural Development, Mr Moven Mahachi, yesterday inspected a consignment of 57 tractors at the Central Mechanical Engineering Department in Workington Industrial Area. The white "Torredo" tractors which have been sent to the Central Mechanical Department to await distribution to the rural areas, arrived from Yugoslavia this month. "Our aim is to get about five tractors for each of about 52 districts around the country," Mr Mahachi said. So far, the country had received about 160 tractors from foreign donors. COUNCIL CANDIDATES--Bulawayo.--Nineteen Patriotic Front candidates were unopposed in the elections for Bubie District Council on Wednesday, but there will be a contest in the two remaining single-seat wards. The Provincial Commissioner for Matabeleland North, Mr Trevor Hemans, said the four candidates for the two seats were all Patriotic Front members. In the Wange District council elections in Wankie on Monday, five candidates contested three seats. Those elected were Mr F. S. Dube (Independent) with 431 votes; Mr M. C. Munzabwa (Indn) 324 votes; and Mr S. B. Mandawu (PF) 247 votes. When the nominations closed earlier this month 12 Patriotic Front candidates were unopposed. The council has 15 seats. ZANLA SOLDIER KILLED--Bulawayo--The man found stabbed to death in a ditch at Entumbane on Thursday afternoon was yesterday identified as Denford Gurupira, a ZANLA soldier, a Bulawayo police spokesman said. The dead man was based at Camp Two in Entumbane. After the killing police arrested 30 people. Five were released but the rest were still being questioned by police investigating the death and an outbreak of street fighting. It is not clear whether the man was killed during or after the street fighting. But sources said a group of about 20 ZANLA men were making their way back to Camp Two from a beer hall at Ncube when they were attacked and stoned. Earlier, it is understood, there had been fighting at the beer hall. It was during the fighting near Camp Two that Mr Gurupira died, sources said. A police spokesman appealed for witnesses or "anyone who feels they may be of assistance" to contact the CID law and order section on 72515, ext 369. A ZANLA commander at Camp Two said yesterday: "Gurupira had been at Camp Two for about three weeks. Prior to that he was at assembly point X-ray at Mtoko. He was off duty when the incident occurred." DRIVE TO HOUSE SOLDIERS--The National Army is understood to have launched a big barrack-building programme to house thousands of soldiers. Seven battalions of 1 000 men each are under canvas waiting to move into the new buildings as soon as they are finished. The integration of ZIPRA, ZANLA and the former security forces is going ahead at full speed. British advisers originally said a 10 000-strong army was big enough for Zimbabwe, but with 37 000 guerrillas and an estimated 18 900 in the former security forces the figure could be much higher. Many of the guerrillas will be absorbed into Operation Seed. There are fewer than 10 000 men taking part in the operation but the force is expected to be boosted soon by several thousand, even though the project has not been a total success. A heavy work burden has fallen on the shoulders of army officers because of the small number of trained men in charge of ordinary ranks. Several members of the 130-strong British Military Advisory and Training Team are understood to have grumbled about their Christmas leave being cancelled because of the workload. But a spokesman for the team said he knew nothing about this. "Our men are supposed to be taking the same leave as the units to which they are attached," he said. BOOK ON AGRICULTURE, ECONOMY--The scope of a book reviewing the Zimbabwe agricultural scene has now been expanded to include an economic review of the country, said a spokesman for the Commercial Farmers' Union yesterday. The book was to have been titled, Zimbabwe Agricultural Review 1980, but will now be called The Zimbabwe Agricultural and Economic Review 1981/82. At a meeting last Friday, attended by the Minister of Agriculture, Senator Denis Norman, the president of the CFU, Mr David Spain, and the Director of Information, Mr Justin Nyoka, it was decided to expand the scope of the book to include all aspects of the country's economy. This move had been taken to provide prospective foreign investors with an in-depth view of the country's economy and not just the agricultural scene. Modern Farming Publications, the publicity arm of the CFU, intends releasing about 20 000 copies of the book towards the end of next year. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 22 Dec 80 p 3]

ETHIOPIA'S MENGISTU, ANGOLAN DEFENSE MINISTER HOLD TALKS

LD271932 Addis Ababa Radio in English to neighboring countries 1530 GMT 27 Dec 80 EA

[Text] Comrade Chairman Mengistu Haile Mariam, chairman of the Provisional Military Administrative Council and of Commission for Organizing the Party of the Workers of Ethiopia and commander in chief of the revolutionary army, today met and held talks on bilateral relations with Comrade Col Pedro Maria Tonha, Politburo member of the Workers' Party of the Angolan People's Liberation Movement and minister of defense.

Comrade Col Pedro Maria conveyed on the occasion the comradely greetings of his excellency President Jose Eduardo dos Santos of Angola to the PMAC, the Ethiopian people and the comrade chairman. He stated that the working visit of the delegation would contribute towards the strengthening of the friendly ties between the two fraternal countries. The communist leader, Comrade Chairman Mengistu, said in reply that since unity is the main weapon of struggle for Africans, it should be further strengthened to ensure genuine independence of the African peoples.

Last night, Ethiopia's minister of national defense, Comrade Brig Gen Tesfaye Gebre Kidan, said the struggle of the heroic peoples of Angola and Ethiopia for the cause of Africa will come out victorious. The defense minister, who is also member of the Standing Committee of the PMAC and COPWE Executive Committee member, was speaking at a dinner he gave in Addis Ababa in honor of the high-level Angolan delegation led by Comrade Col Pedro Maria.

The minister described the Angolan struggle as Africa's symbol of progressiveness which genuine revolutionaries should support in the spirit of proletarian internationalism. The two countries, said the minister, have common similarities and could benefit from exchanges of experiences.

Comrade Col Pedro Maria, the leader of the Angolan delegation, said on his part the two peoples of revolutionary Ethiopia and Angola have an important role to play in the struggle against the archenemy, South Africa.

GUINEA-BISSAU-CAPE VERDE RELATIONS WORSENING

Cape Verde 'Bitter'

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 28 Nov 80 p 10

[Text] Cidade da Praia, 27 Nov--Cape Verde reacted yesterday with "sarcasm and bitterness" to the Bissau Revolutionary Council's decision to try President Aristides Pereira for having been chief of information services of the PAIGC, while the new Bissau regime, which has already been recognized by the USSR, declares it is "certain" there was a plan to assassinate Bernardo Vieira ("Nino").

Commenting on the press conference held in Bissau with the Revolutionary Council, in power since the 14 November coup, the Cape Verdian radio justified the "sarcasm," saying: "It would not enter the head of any minimally sane individual to attempt to try the chief of state of a foreign country.

"This is a monstrosity in the area of international jurisprudence and a demonstration of total ignorance and disregard of the elementary international standards that govern relations between states," the radio declared.

"We are bitter," the radio said, because the members of the Revolutionary Council "present a base image of themselves, while they present a degrading picture of the freedom fighters of Guinea-Bissau and Cape Verde and of the victorious armed struggle for national liberation, led by the PAIGC."

In view of this situation, the Praia radio broadcast posed two questions: "Incompetence or betrayal? And to what length can the Bissau Revolutionary Council go?"

The new authorities in Bissau declare that the plans to eliminate Bernardo Vieira, plans said to be authored by Luis Cabral and what is described as "his gang," were to have been carried out on the night before the 14 November coup d'etat, and are now being divulged in detail by sources connected with the new government.

These revelations are seen as a way of giving credibility to recent statements by the new leader, according to which one of his reasons for leading the coup was that his life was in danger.

According to the new Bissau authorities, Umaru Djalo, former defense minister and chief of the Armed Forces General Staff, was given the assignment of assassinating "Nino."

Meanwhile, according to ANOP [Portuguese News Agency], the USSR has recognized the new government in Bissau. According to ANOP, the Soviet gesture was communicated to Comrade Bernardo Vieira today by the Soviet ambassador in Lisbon.

Communicating his government's decision, Soviet Ambassador Lev Krilov requested an audience with the new Guinea-Bissau leader. The embassy described the meeting as "very warm."

According to the Portuguese news agency, Guinea-Bissau, which had requested emergency food aid from the United States, is now studying economic measures pertaining to the agriculture sector.

Well-informed sources said today that 4,000 tons of rice are expected in aid, and that 500 tons of sorghum and 4,000 tons of rice should arrive in Bissau in the next 2 weeks, representing a donation within the normal framework of U.S. aid to Guinea-Bissau.

From Praia it is reported that life has returned to normal and that the electoral campaign is already in progress for the 63 candidates for deputy to the National People's Assembly, to be elected by 22 "circulos" on 7 December.

At the same time, the Revolutionary Council confirmed that an investigation of the People's Stores is in progress, to "redefine the goals" of the enterprise.

Reports that the new government in Guinea-Bissau intends to try the highest leader of the PAIGC and president of Cape Verde were circulated by FRANCE PRESSE.

The Revolutionary Council's denial appeared in a communique in which it was also noted that comments on the situation in Guinea-Bissau have never been objective and unbiased.

TANZANIAN GOVERNMENT STATEMENT ON RUSTLERS KILLED IN KENYA

LD271900 Dar es Salaam Radio in English to East Africa 1600 GMT 27 Dec 80 EA

[Text] Dar es Salaam--The government today confirmed that the 22 people killed last Monday by Kenyan police at Talek along the Tanzania-Kenya border were its nationals. The people, armed with arrows, bows and guns, were killed after they had crossed into Kenya to steal cattle.

A government statement issued in Dar es Salaam today said that those who were involved in the incident were not members of the Tanzania armed forces. They were Tanzanians living along the border in Mara region. The statement said the government has strongly condemned the act of crossing the border into a neighboring state to steal cattle as an act of lawlessness.

Following the government's announcement, Kenya has been asked to return the bodies of the 22 Tanzanians for burial by their relatives. The statement said since Kenya announced the killing of the Tanzanians last Tuesday, the government has been making thorough investigations and has confirmed that its nationals had been slain.

The statement explained that a gang of cattle rustlers entered Kenya and stole 400 head of cattle. As they were driving the animals to Tanzania, they were interrupted by Kenyan police and game scouts, resulting in the killing of the 22 people in a skirmish that ensued.

The government said two of the cattle thieves who managed to flee back to Tanzania have been identified, and one of them is helping the police in their investigations. It said the long-standing problem of cattle rustling along the Tanzania-Kenya border was known to authorities of the two states, and many people have lost their lives in skirmishes which often occurred during cattle raids on both sides of the border. The statement added that this is the first time a large number of people have been killed in a single incident.

PLANNING OFFICIAL COMMENTS ON EXTRAORDINARY CONGRESS' AIMS

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 4 Dec 80 p 4

[Text] Comrade Roberto de Almeida, Central Committee secretary for economic development and planning granted an important interview a few days ago to Angola's People's Television, in which he commented on a number of issues in today's economic life of Angola in light of the forthcoming Extraordinary Congress of the MPLA-Labor Party. In answer to a question on the work carried out by the preparatory socioeconomic committee of the First Extraordinary Congress of which he is a member, Comrade Roberto de Almeida said that the analysis of the various documents prepared by work groups constituted by multi-level elements--and specifically those documents related to agriculture, industry, civil construction, domestic trade, transports and communications, oil, electric power, health, social affairs and education--has been completed. The reports on culture and sports are now in the process of being analyzed. Finally, the preparatory committee will review the sociopolitical sectors (justice and cooperation), as well as economic subjects such as planning, finance and banking.

Roberto de Almeida noted that "during this phase, we have attempted to analyze the degree of implementation of the directives issued by the 1977 congress, and we have tried to ferret out the reasons for failing to achieve the goals set by the plans which were prepared at that time. We have also sought to outline prospects for the orientation to be followed during the next 5 years, from 1981 to 1985.

"Obviously, this has not been an easy task, but we have been fortunate to have received excellent cooperation from most of the ministries and state secretariats."

In answer to a question on the methods to be followed for the preparation of the Extraordinary Congress, as well as on its objectives, Roberto de Almeida said that the congress will seek to improve national life in every field. The congress will issue clear and precise directives for economic development up to 1985; all the militants should be aware that increased efforts will be demanded during the next 5 years and past errors should serve as lessons to achieve a more rigorous implementation of the directives issued by the party. On the study by the militant masses of these economic directives, Comrade Roberto de Almeida said:

"I believe that the militants must understand that all the documents to be presented to the congress, which will be first discussed at the grassroots level, can only be discussed in a spirit of positive criticism. I would also like to say that in some instances the straight-forwardness of these documents may induce discouragement among some militants.

"Obviously, these documents will be reviewed and studied with due respect to our present realities, to our situation today in regard to the political-military problems we must face, which constitute a deviation of our orientation in the economic field, since a very large proportion of human and material resources must be devoted to them. It is possible that some of the directives issued by the 1977 congress may have been tinged with exaggerated optimism, and may not have taken into account the situation created by our neighbors, and in particular by South Africa's aggressive policy. We should also not forget that the very year proclaimed by our Political Bureau as the "Year of Agriculture" was unsuccessful due to, among other reasons, climatic conditions such as poor rainfall which contributed toward the failure to reach our objectives."

Additionally, there are other factors which should be considered: the lack of experience in many fields, the still poor economic coordination, inexperience in planning and spotty control in a number of sectors, as Comrade Roberto de Almeida stressed in the course of the interview granted to Angola's People's Television.

This official also noted that the kind of system that can exercise control at the level of our economy must necessarily receive the cooperation of all organisms and it should not be expected that control be exercised only by the Ministry of Planning or the Ministry of Finance. This control must exist within the units of production themselves, within all enterprises, all manufacturing units and within agricultural centers and cooperatives. In other words, control must be exercised at every level: only thus will it be possible to foster the gradual development of Angolan economic life.

A Change in Methods, Not in Economic Policy

The Central Committee secretary for economic development and planning was able to clarify a question regarding the prospects for economic development during the next 5-year period. In answer to a question on whether the congress may adopt a new economic policy for the country, he said that the main lines of our development represent a political choice made on the night of 11 November 1975; this choice is abundantly clear and has determined that scientific socialism is the strategic objective of our revolution, setting, by its very existence, a certain definitive policy for economic development which is able to establish the material bases of such a political option.

Roberto de Almeida stressed that "we cannot speak of a new economic policy, for the simple reason that this would entail a change in our political option, and this is unthinkable."

"There will be, of course, a change in methods. There will be new control systems which will be implanted throughout the country and at the level of all national economic centers so as to ensure that the implementation of all directives be more efficient, and, above all, to guarantee that such implementation be a constant matter of concern to those structures which must coordinate and audit it.

"We have witnessed so far a degree of 'laissez-faire,' a certain liberalism within these organisms; this situation must naturally be conclusively dealt with. We would be unable, otherwise, to carry out the directives which the congress will issue.

"Evidently, this is only possible if each militant will become fully conscious that he is an active element of the party, an element who must do his part so that this control and this review become increasingly more rigorous and efficient."

Increased Responsibilities

Asked whether the congress may adopt a set of directives aimed at eliminating the obstacles to the implementation of the economic orientations, Comrade Roberto de Almeida said that the congress will, of course, provide the orientation for the economic policy that our country will follow from now on. It will certainly also formulate a method providing for better linkage between all these organisms so as to attain more efficient coordination, something that has not been achieved so far.

He added that the congress will seek to define more concretely the duties of the various sectors and, above all, will attribute full responsibility to each sector for the achievement of the tasks assigned to it.

According to Comrade Roberto de Almeida, it is also possible to state at this time that the implantation of the people's power will provide considerable support for the implementation of the directives to be issued by the congress, given the fact that all organisms at a truly national level (provinces, municipalities, communes) will be receiving these directives in a more direct manner.

Restructuring the State Apparatus

"I must say," Roberto de Almeida added further on in answer to a question on the eventual modification of the structures of the state apparatus within the framework of the congress' decisions, "that, in accordance to a decision made at last month's meeting of the Central Committee on economic issues, a commission was formed to study the restructuring of the state apparatus in order to render it more efficient and better coordinated; thus, we shall be able to provide for better interconnections and increasingly direct relations between all these organisms, consequently achieving a more integrated operation. This commission has not yet completed its task, but I can state that it is working hard, and it will of course present concrete proposals for the restructuring of the state apparatus."

The next question asked by Angola's People's Television was on the subject of whether exaggerated optimism prevailed in the formulation of economic plans or whether these were inadequately implemented. The party's Central Committee official replied:

"I suppose you can say it was both. However, we must also keep in mind that the available economic data in 1977, only 2 years after independence, were not solid enough and could not be unquestioningly trusted. Moreover, one must think of the situation that prevailed in our country in the pre-independence and post-independence periods, generating a certain instability in the labor field, indiscipline in work places and a large rate of absenteeism in our units of production aggravated by difficulties in the means of transportation, in the acquisition of foodstuffs, in equipment, etc. Naturally, all these conditions prevented us from coming even close to the objectives set by the First Congress.

"When I previously referred to exaggerated optimism, I did it with full cognizance that these directives were outlined in a manner perhaps entirely based on facts in relation to some sectors. In this respect, however, we must emphasize the deficiencies present in some organisms that prevent the implementation of these directives for various reasons. It also happens that sometimes the orientations provided by the First Congress were wrongly interpreted.

"In the course of our work, we found out that there was an incorrect interpretation of the directives of the 1977 First Congress in a number of sectors. It appears from this that the organisms did not carry out the congress' orientations because they understood them differently."

Some Difficulties Are Understandable

The next question was: "But how can this be so after 3 years?"

"This can only be explained because no control was exercised in the course of the implementation of the directives. We have had regular reviews, and there is even a resolution ordering the sectors to prepare monthly reports to be presented to the comrade president; but unfortunately, these directives are not always faithfully executed. Therefore, a number of problems crop up which can only be detected when a general and more exhaustive review of the entire procedure has been made."

In answer to the question of whether political factors can or cannot influence economic matters, such as the problems of lack of authority and discipline, Comrade Roberto de Almeida noted that the deficiencies of a structural nature present at the moment are natural. He referred also to the fact that a number of laws must still be approved which will greatly influence Angolan economic life, such as the law on labor justice and the laws regarding work tribunals. "These are essential mechanisms through which economic activity can be controlled and properly assisted, and we do not possess them at this time. This explains why, for the most part, a number of failures and various unacceptable errors still exist.

"Evidently, following the Extraordinary Congress, the party will have the necessary mechanisms that will enable it to exercise greater authority over the implementation of its directives. We are already aware that, unfortunately, this is not always the case, because quite often, a spirit of 'laissez-faire' can be noted and many times directives and guidelines are incorrectly applied. Of course, the party and Central Committee departments should then act more timely in order to prevent an aggravation of the situation."

In conclusion, Roberto de Almeida said: "I can state that the need for improved coordination among all sectors is one of the problems that will be clearly defined during the congress because a lack of coordination can still be noted during the implementation phase of the activities of various sectors. A satisfactory degree of inter-connection and good cooperation among all the organisms do not as yet exist; it will, therefore, be necessary to mandate this kind of cooperation so that the problems deriving from the carelessness of certain given sectors not seriously affect all the others."

LUANDA PORT CONGESTION--Luanda, Dec 21 (AFP)--Merchandise is piling up again at Luanda Port, causing serious congestion, because of poor administrative control, bureaucratic obstruction and absenteeism, Angola's state-run labor federation said today. The National Union of Angolan Workers said a delegation led by transport and communications minister Fautino Muteka had recently visited the port and found problems almost identical to those that existed in May when President Jose Eduardo Dos Santos made an inspection visit. The union said goods that had been unloaded were piling up in warehouses, and that something had to be done about the developing congestion. After his visit, Mr Dos Santos had denounced administrative failures and saboteurs of the revolutionary process. Such people have come in for much criticism at the special congress of the ruling popular movement for the liberation of Angola that is in session here now. GOUKOUNI CALLED AL-QADHDHAFI'S 'PUPPET'--Yaounde, 27 Dec (AFP)--The Libyan intervention in Chad makes the president of the Transitional National Union Government (GUNT), Mr Goukouni Oueddei, look like a puppet in Al-Qadhdhafi's hands, the daily newspaper CAMEROON TRIBUNE indicates. In a long analysis of the Chad situation made by its assistant director, Henri Bandolo, the CAMEROON TRIBUNE asserts that with the victory not assuring us that the war has ended, the new turn that President Goukouni has given to events--which henceforth make him look like a puppet in Al-Qadhdhafi's hands--does not enhance his remarkable image. For the CAMEROON TRIBUNE, many Chad nationalists are now ready to take up their weapons again and fight Libyan occupation. Under these conditions, the paper continues, the occupation constitutes a valid argument giving their war legitimacy, an argument that is bound to be supported by a section of the international community which opposes all forms of foreign military occupation. On the attitude of France in this conflict, the paper says that it was equivocal and that this can give a certain credence to rumors of a secret agreement between France and Libya to share Chad. One wonders if the Libyan army did not penetrate into Chad thinking seriously that the French Army could intervene, the CAMEROON TRIBUNE writes. It then explains. But one has not forgotten [word indistinct] that Libya is a great producer of oil and a great customer of French firms. [Text] [AB271313 Paris AFP in French 1039 GMT 27 Dec 80]

ERITREAN ADMINISTRATORS VISIT SUDAN—A high-level delegation from northern Ethiopia led by Comrade Fikru Wolde Tinsaye, regional administrator of Eritrea, returned to Asmara the day before yesterday after a week-long official tour of eastern Sudan. This was in line with the recent Ethio-Sudanese agreement to further strengthen their friendly relations through such appropriate periodic measures. During its stay in eastern Sudan, the Ethiopian delegation held lengthy and fruitful talks on bilateral relations with the Sudanese Socialist Union [SSU] representatives of the Eastern Province headed by H. E. (Sa'id Abdurahman Sulayman), commissioner of the Red Sea Province and the provincial secretary general of the SSU. At the end of the talks a draft resolution was ratified and endorsed by the delegations. On the recommendation of the political and military affairs committees of the two countries, both have agreed to curtail all illegal movements at the border of the two regions. Talks were also held on cooperation in economic construction and trade exchange between the two countries and on ways of repatriating refugees. ELF MOVEMENT 'DISINTEGRATING'--A former key operative of the so-called ELF [Eritrean Liberation Front] seccessionists says that the bandit gang is fast disintegrating and demoralized as more and more of its members abandon it. Twenty-year-old Abel Gebre Mikael, former field commander and cadre of the Eritrean separatist band, said after giving himself up to a unit of the Second Revolutionary Liberation Army recently that today more than ever before, people who had been recruited into the ELF and several of its ranks [as heard] are realizing the bankruptcy of the entire seccessionist movement and that they are taking every opportunity of decamping and resuming normal life. He pointed out that large numbers of people who had been misguided into joining the separatist gang are ready to hand themselves over to security forces on the Eritrean-Tigre fronts in full realization that the Ethiopian revolution is genuine and the struggle of the Ethiopian broad masses intrinsically socialist. He also stated that the normalization of relations between Ethiopia and the Sudan has had a most demoralizing and crippling effect on the entire seccessionist movement. CONSTITUTION MODIFICATION--Banjul, 22 Dec (AFP)--Gambia's constitution will be modified after the congress of the Ruling Progressive People's Party [PPP], which is due next May, President Dawda Jawara indicated during a meeting in Banjul on Sunday. Sir Dawda, who is the PPP secretary general, did not give details of the manner in which the constitution will be modified, but observers think that the change will bring about a decentralization of power, with, in particular, the creation of a Prime Ministry. During this meeting, President Jawara called the PPP a socialist party. It is the first time, it is noted, that he gives the designation to his party. During the same meeting, he also declared that the PPP is seeking membership in the Socialist International and the Socialist Interafrican to be created in the future. According to observers, these changes are not unrelated to the fears of trouble during last October in the Gambian capital and which entailed both the severing of diplomatic ties with Libya and the intervention of Senegalese troops at the request of the Gambian Government. Gambia is already practicing a multi-party policy (the opposing National Congress Party has 5 seats in parliament as against 29 for the ruling party) and if she also opts for a Socialist Party, the PPP will meet the conditions for adhering to the Socialist International, observers point out. The ruling Socialist Party in Senegal, a country which completely surrounds Gambia, is member of the International and Mr Leopold Sedar Senghor, the Senegalese President, is one of the founders of the Socialist International. The PPP is also member of the committee in charge of the preliminary work of the constitutive congress of the Inter-African Socialist, scheduled to take place in Tunis next February. PRESIDENT SPEAKS ON SINGLE-PARTY SYSTEMS

AB221250 Paris AFP in English 1033 GMT 22 Dec 80

[Text] Dakar, Senegal, Dec 22 (AFP)--President Ahmed Sekou Toure, who has ruled Guinea as a one-party state for 22 years, says he still believes single-party systems give the best government in Africa but that they are not without problems.

Mr Sekou Toure's comments came in a speech to university graduates in Conakry that was broadcast on Guinean radio and monitored here.

He said the one-party system gives total power to the action of each people on itself, on the environment and on its relations with other peoples.

But, he said, such systems present dangers, as well.

Egoism, incompetence or treachery (of party leaders) can block the advance of the movement, compromise the free play of democratic forces and prevent free expression of members, in the egotistical goal of self-maintenance or of profiting from collective gains, Mr Sekou Toure said.

Multi-party arrangements, he said, often represented a hypocritical dispersion of the organization of the ruling class, especially in the bourgeois system. And he criticized African politicians who want to implant in their countries political or trade union blueprints from Europe, America or elsewhere.

The Guinean leader added: neither a multiplicity of political parties nor a single political option is a sure sign of the decree of democracy in a country.

Mr Sekou Toure, who rules through the Guinea Democratic Party, has often been accused of repression and of holding prisoner those who disagree with his regime.

Africa wide, there are about 20 countries with one-party systems, many of them French or Portuguese-speaking states. Several of the former British territories, however, including Zimbabwe, Botswana, Uganda, Ghana, Nigeria and Gambia, have multi-party parliamentary arrangements, as do Senegal and Morocco, former French colonies, and white-ruled South Africa.

Other states such as Niger, Chad, Mauritania and Ethiopia have no parties at all, although Ethiopia is in the process of organizing a Marxist party and Mauritania has announced a return to democratic institutions. Upper Volta had one of the most active political party systems on the continent until the military coup last month.

LIBYAN WITHDRAWAL FROM CHAD DISCUSSED

AB231751 Abidjan FRATERNITE MATIN in French 23 Dec 80 p 31

[Editorial by A. Bassole: "The Essential Point"]

[Text] It is still too early to rejoice about total peace. The meeting of the Organization of African Unity which opens in Lagos, Nigeria, this morning, as member of observers have put it, could take place in the greatest confusion.

In fact, contradictory information is circulating about the agenda of the meeting. A great part ~~of African~~ public opinion already wonders what topics the participants in the Lagos conference will discuss when no guideline has yet been established.

But this is not all. One of the main actors--and not the least important one--Mr Goukouni Oueddei, president of the transitional National Union Government, GUNT, has been repeating and repeating since Sunday that he will not go to Lagos. From his own point of view, the civil war is now over to the advantage of the governmental coalition, and it is therefore, in his opinion, no longer necessary to return to the Lome agreement. For him, the matter is closed, the more so since Hissein Habre's group, which is considered the splinter group, has been defeated.

It is obvious that the GUNT president's attitude is that of the winner. It is easy to understand: the comparative strength of forces is in his favor, and he is determined to behave according to the famous maxim that the strongest man is always right.

However, since this victory was achieved thanks to the help of Libyan troops, some of the countries neighboring Chad are of the opinion that there is still a problem. The primary problem, according to them, is Tripoli's interference in the domestic affairs of a sovereign country in violation of the OAU charter. The second problem is the threat of destabilization which stems from this foreign presence on their borders.

As a matter of fact, everybody knows that Al-Qadhdhafi secretly dreams of one day successfully creating what he himself calls the "Islamic Federation

South of the Sahara." Since he proved in Ndjamena that he has one of the more powerful armies on the continent, on top of his petrodollars--which he does not yet know how to make good use of--it is anybody's guess how far the man of Islamization to the bitter end could go if nothing is done to stop him.

In light of the preceding remarks, one can say that in Lagos, the African heads of state will attempt to publicize the thesis of the necessity that Libyan troops be withdrawn from Chad. The serenity of the deliberations will in fact depend on this solution. If that is not achieved, meetings will follow meetings without settling the problem.

TANZANIAN CATTLE RAIDERS SHOT--Twenty-two Tanzanian cattle raiders were shot dead inside the Masai-Mara Game Reserve when they were intercepted by a joint patrol of the Kenya police and the anti-poaching unit of the game rangers. A police report said that the incident happened yesterday afternoon when a gang of about 30 armed Tanzanians, some of them in military uniform, were sighed at Talek, on the Mara River inside the Masai-Mara Game Reserve. The police report says the Tanzanian raiders had earlier stolen 400 head of cattle from the Manyattas of Ole Neaibon and Ole Londo.

In a bid to recover the cattle, the report says, a fierce battle erupted between the raiders and the Kenya police. The battle, estimated to have lasted 2 hours, left 22 Tanzanians killed. No casualties were suffered by the Kenya police. A police patrol recovered all the stolen cattle, three automatic rifles, two rounds of ammunition and several bows and arrows. Other raiders fled back to Tanzania and the Kenya police had to abandon the chase. The police report says the area is being patrolled heavily. The recovered stolen cattle have already been returned to the owners. [Text] [LD231904 Nairobi Domestic Service in English 1800 GMT 23 Dec 80 EA]

UGANDANS WARNED--His Excellency President Daniel Arap Moi today issued a nononsense warning to Ugandan nationals living in Kenya to refrain from issuing attacks on the new Ugandan Government of President Milton Obote from Kenyan soil. President Moi urged Ugandans to join hands with their brothers and sisters to build a stable and prosperous new Ugandan nation. The Kenyan leader said the Kenyan Government would do all in its powers to ensure that Kenya is not used as base for individuals or newspapers to launch attacks on Uganda. President Moi recalled that he had congratulated Dr Obote for his victory at the polls and this, he said, indicated that the Kenyan Government was anxious to ensure that there is law and order in Uganda, which was vital for reconstruction and reconciliation in keeping with the true spirit of Nyayo [footsteps]. President Moi stressed that since there was now an elected government in Uganda, smuggling along the common Kenya-Uganda border will be effectively controlled. His Excellency expressed his satisfaction at the efforts being made by the police in cooperation with officials of the ruling Kenya African National Union, KANU, in preventing the illegal movement of essential commodities and urged them to continue with this spirit in order to eradicate the evils. FINANCE MINISTER SAYS DEBT RESTRUCTURING WON

[Text] Paris, Dec 21 (AFP)--Liberia, its economic afflicted by oil import costs and post-coup problems, has won agreement in principle from eight industrial countries for a restructuring of 34.4 million dollars in debt, the Liberian finance minister said here this weekend.

The minister, Major Perry Zulu, told Agence France-Presse that the accord had been reached Thursday and Friday at a meeting of the Paris Club. In attendance were representatives of the United States, Britain, France, West Germany, Italy, Japan, Belgium and Sweden.

Major Zulu said, however, that his country's ruling military council--which took power in April in a coup that killed President William Tolbert--had wanted a restructuring of 50 million dollars in debt.

The French Economics Ministry said the representatives would recommend to their governments that Liberia be allowed four years to take care of payments on debt due between July 1, 1980, and December 31, 1981.

The ministry also said Liberia's creditors had taken into account an economic recovery program the West African State has drawn up based on an accord with the International Monetary Fund. Major Zulu said the Washington-based IMF would furnish Liberia the equivalent of 91 million dollars over the next two fiscal years.

On Thursday in Monrovia, acting finance minister Rudolph Johnson and U.S. Ambassador Robert Smith signed an agreement whereby the United States will give Liberia 7 million dollars for reconstruction in the fields of agriculture, [word indistinct] health and public works. Mr. Smith said U.S. authorities hoped to be granting another 5 million this week to import rice.

Liberia was also to get U.S. bank loans equivalent to about half its 11-million-dollar oil debt to Saudi Arabia, U.S. officials said.

In Paris, Major Zulu said the country's total oil debt, before the price hikes announced last week at the OPEC meeting in Bali, was 40 million dollars.

The U.S. announced on December 1 that the grants to Liberia were upcoming, after the Liberians apparently had decided to turn to Libya for financial help.

Richard Moose, assistant secretary of state for African affairs in the outgoing Carter administration, made a flying visit to Monrovia, conferred with head of state Samuel Doe, and said afterward that Master Sergeant Doe understands that it is not necessary (for the Liberians) to obligate themselves to the Libyans to deal with their financial problems.

Sergeant Doe, who had been planning a visit to Libya, then put it off. But the Liberians sent Foreign Minister Gabriel Baccus Matthews and Economics Minister Togba Nah Tipoteh to Tripoli anyway on December 4.

1981 BUDGET DETAILS--Bamako, 26 Dec (AFP)--Mali's 1981 draft budget, adopted on 24 December and the final figure for which will be set by the country's National Assembly, recorded an increase of 4.5 percent in revenue and 1.6 percent in expenditure as compared with the 1980 budget (77.8 billion Malian francs), Radio Mali announced on Friday. The tendency towards a freeze on expenditure in favor of revenue, the radio continues, shows the authorities' willingness to outline a budget policy in 1981 which aims at reflecting the realities of the country, in the words of the finance and trade minister, Mr Drissa Keita. In 1981, the sale of the export products (cotton, peanuts), continues the radio, will not cover our import needs of basic necessities. In the face of such an imbalance, it continues, the state accepts to reduce its development intentions in all sectors except that of health. According to the radio, the head of state, Gen Moussa Traore, who presided over the session of the leadership of the Democratic Union of Malian People's Party and of government, after adopting the proposals, stressed the two main features of the 1981 budget proposals: the worsening of workers' purchasing power and the financing of the budget deficit from abroad. FOREIGN MINISTER ON SANCTIONS AGAINST SOUTH AFRICA

[Report on press conference with Joaquim Chissano, foreign affairs minister of Mozambique, date and place not given]

> [Text] Joaquim Chissano, Mozambique's foreign affairs minister, led the Mozambican delegation to SADCC-2. Chissano held a press conference with foreign newsmen who were covering the proceedings. In his brief meeting with the journalists, the Mozambican diplomatic chief responded to some questions, most of which pertained to the full application of economic sanctions against racist South Africa. Following are some excerpts from his remarks.

1. On Mozambique's Position Regarding the Lome Convention

[Chissano] Regarding the Lome Convention, our position is that Mozambique needs more time to be sure of the advantages of adhering to this convention. Still, Mozambique feels there are many ways of cooperating with the EEC and its member countries. The fact that the Lome Convention has had to be revised twice is an indication that it is still not a fully formed institution, such that it could coordinate economic relations among nations, so we need to think about more suitable forms of cooperation with the EEC and its member countries. This is our position.

2. On Sanctions Against South Africa

[Chissano] The purpose of this conference was to reduce our economic dependence on South Africa. In other words, it is a matter of a struggle for greater freedom. In this struggle, it must be understood that we will always have to make sacrifices. We still have ties with South Africa, and these ties were imposed upon us. There are still European countries with ties to South Africa. Now, the question is whether or not to cut those ties. In the case of our countries, countries like Mozambique, the ties are physical and geographical. In the case of the other countries, the European countries, the ties are more of a political and economic nature. Thus the latter countries have a stronger possibility of giving them up than we do; for us, the sacrifice is like cutting off some parts of our body, while for the Europeans countries it means changing the system of economic relations with South Africa or establishing priorities for the geographic areas or countries where they should be investing. Sweden set an example, and we sincerely hope that others will follow. We cannot expect that all the EEC members will make such a decision immediately and jointly, but we feel that if we want to see effective sanctions applied against South Africa, the countries with economic power in South Africa will have to be the ones to take the initiative in applying sanctions. We know there are countries that are afraid to do anything, but in the name of peace, freedom and cooperation, they must take such action.

3. On the Relationship Between Sanctions Against South Africa and the Nine Countries of Southern Africa

[Chissano] From the speech I heard and the conversations I had an opportunity to hold with the chairman of the conference, and from what I later learned from some delegations regarding his statements on the matter, it was clear to me that the chairman felt precisely as we do in Mozambique, that the sanctions must be effective. The Front Line countries do not want to declare they are going to apply sanctions against South Africa if our application of such sanctions will not have the desired effect. We would like to see such action by those countries whose application of sanctions would have positive results. We did this with Zimbabwe. Mozambique applied sanctions when we were sure they would be effective, and they were. Meanwhile, there are many circumstances in South Africa that would allow us to apply sanctions against it, not ruling out the possibility that we could apply sanctions even if other countries do not. When we do, however, there will be internal or regional factors justifying application of sanctions by the nine countries of the SADCC.

4. On Measures South Africa Might Take

[Chissano] I doubt that South Africa would take measures against our country, provoking the European countries or economic organizations to apply sanctions against it. I do not know what South Africa would gain by this, because we believe South Africa would also have something to lose if it took measures against Mozambique. Since South Africa stands to lose if France or the FRG, the United States, Great Britain, Holland and others apply sanctions, and would lose by retaliating in any way against Mozambique, I do not see how it would do so. It would lose on one side, and we would lose on the other.

5. On Mozambique's Possible Participation in War Against South Africa

[Chissano] We were asked this question in 1961, before FRELIMO was founded from the resistance movements that existed then. They asked if we would take up arms against Portuguese colonialism. We answered: "If we are forced to." We were forced to, and we took up arms. Now they ask if we would join in an armed struggle against South Africa. The answer is the same: If we are forced to. We are a peaceful country, with a peaceful people, but if we were forced to fight, we would fight.

6. On Mozambique's Membership in CEMA

[Chissano] We have not yet concluded our study of this issue, but we feel there are many possibilities of joining CEMA, because we think we will be dealing directly with the socialist countries that are CEMA members, and we will be members and will take part in the decisions of this organization.

7. On Conflicting Statements of Botswana and Mozambique Regarding Sanctions Against South Africa

[Chissano] There is no inconsistency between my statements and those of the chairman of the conference. The sanctions against Rhodesia were effective when they were applied fully and successfully by Mozambique, as an independent country. They were not effective as they were "applied" by the Portuguese and British governments, because they were not fully applied; there was no determination on the part of those countries to apply sanctions.

Owing to Mozambique's decision, complementing a decision already made by Zambia, the sanctions became effective.

8. On Transfer of Western Oil to South Africa Through Mozambique

[Chissano] Mozambique must be involved but Mozambique does not bring the petroleum from Holland or other supplying areas to Maputo. Mozambique would not like to sacrifice its ports in favor of other ports in receiving this oil from Holland or any other country. If the petroleum is going to South Africa, why not through Maputo, if it cannot go anywhere else? It is Holland's responsibility if it ships petroleum to South Africa through the port of Maputo, and we cannot conceal the fact that Mozambique's ports are still open to South Africa.

9. On Relationship Between Maputo Conference and Sanctions Against South Africa

[Chissano] As the chairman said here, the conference did not deal with questions linked to sanctions. This conference dealt with development; that is, the means to reduce our independence on South Africa.

JOINT RESOLUTION PUBLISHED ON MACHEL VISIT TO USSR

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 5 Dec 80 p 3

[Text] I

On 1 December 1980, the Political Standing Committee of the FRELIMO [Mozambique Liberation Front] Party's Central Committee, the Standing Commission of the People's Assembly and the Council of Ministers of the People's Republic of Mozambique assessed the significance and the results of the visit paid from 17 to 22 November 1980 to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics by a high-ranking party and state delegation, headed by the president of the FRELIMO Party, Samora Moises Machel, at the invitation of Leonid Ilyich Brezhnev, secretary-general of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and chairman of the Presidium of the USSR Supreme Soviet.

II

Having thoroughly analyzed the report of the delegation and the documents signed during the visit, these entities noted with pleasure that:

1. The visit, and the discussions that took place, led to an intensification of the mutual understanding of the revolutionary process in the two countries, and a desire for greater cooperation in all areas. This caused a qualitative improvement in the fraternal relations between the two peoples, parties and states, acting on behalf of increased friendship between both peoples and on behalf of the cause of peace and socialism.

2. The Order of People's Friendship conferred upon Comrade President Samora Moises Machel was highly esteemed because it reflects the high regard and admiration that the USSR has for the Mozambican people and their supreme leader.

This action, which was and is extensively appreciated by both peoples, the Soviet and Mozambican, has fostered the strengthening of our friendship and solidarity with the peoples of the world, and our practice of proletarian internationalism.

3. The great mass demonstrations that surrounded our delegation, especially in Moscow, Fruntze and Tashkent, the warm expressions of Mozambican-Soviet friendship at meetings held in the capitals of the Kirghiz Soviet Socialist Republic and the Uzbekh Soviet Socialist Republic, and the affection shown by the people, the Soviet Communists and the party and state leaders expressed the deep sentiments of friendship and brotherhood toward our people, and the high esteeem for the measures carried out by our party and state for the construction of the socialist society and the valuable contribution made to the cause of the national liberation of peoples and to the cause of peace.

4. The talks took place in a warm atmosphere of socialist brotherhood and full mutual understanding, with identical views concerning bilateral relations and the international situation.

This atmosphere and these identical views are a result of the firm foundation underlying the relations between the two parties and states, based on the principles of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism. In this way, the unity of views and mutual positions were consolidated.

5. Owing to the many contacts and discussions that were held, the visit made it possible to intensify the deepseated relations of friendship and brotherhood between the leaders of the two parties and states, and particularly between Comrades Samora Moises Machel and Leonid Ilyich Brezhnev; which contributed to the fostering of relations between the two peoples, parties and states.

III

The joint session cited with particular consideration the essential importance of the agreement for cooperation between the FRELIMO Party and the Communist Party of the Soviet Union which was signed by the supreme leaders of both parties.

This agreement, based on the mutual desire to develop and intensify the fraternal cooperation between both parties, in accordance with the principles of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism, and in the interests of the universal struggle for peace, national liberation, democracy and socialism, constituted a major impetus for Mozambican-Soviet relations.

Similarly, the joint Mozambican-Soviet Declaration signed by Samora Moises Machel and Leonid Ilyich Brezhnev, in addition to expressing ideological and political agreement and unity of views and positions, demonstrates in a steadfast manner the mutual desire for developing the relations in all sectors, in the interests of both peoples as well as the cause of peace and socialism.

The Declaration is in the spirit of the Treaty of Friendship and Cooperation concluded by both parties on 31 March 1977, and calls for new accomplishments.

Owing to its significance in increasing relations between the two peoples, the joint session expressed high regard for the agreement between the Mozambican Youth Organization and the Soviet Communist Youth organization (KOMSOMOL), which will enable the young Mozambican and Soviet internationalists to work side by side for the development of the People's Republic of Mozambique.

This agreement should inspire the mass social organizations of both countries to engage in joint activities, which will intensify the friendship between the two peoples.

IV

An assessment was made of the progress in economic, cultural and scientific cooperation and in the trade relations between the two countries, as well as of the new prospects that will be opening up for multilateral and long-term cooperation, as a result of the agreements that have been signed.

The joint session expressed high regard for these documents, because:

1. They constitute a practical example of the relations that should prevail among socialist countries in different stages of development.

2. They make an actual contribution to the victory of Mozambique over underdevelopment, and to the consolidation of the socialist state, as well as contributing to the construction of the material and technical foundations for the building of communism in the Soviet Union.

3. They safeguard the mutual advantage and progress of both countries, and thus make a theoretical and practical contribution to the establishment of a new international economic order.

4. They guarantee that the People's Republic of Mozambique will advance resolutely in the socialization of rural areas, the mechanization of agriculture, the creation of an industrial base, and the knowledge, exploration and transformation of its natural resources.

5. Finally, they lead to a greater complementation and interdependence, and to greater stability in the economic and social development of the two countries.

The joint session approved all of the documents which had been signed.

V

With respect to the importance of the agreements that were concluded, the joint session decided:

1. To laud the decision of the Political Standing Committee of the FRELIMO Party's Central Committee to assign Marcelino dos Santos, member of the Political Standing Committee and secretary of the FRELIMO Party's Central Committee for economic policy, to personally and on behalf of Mozambique supervise and dynamize the combined party and state relations between the two countries, as well as the relations between the mass social organizations.

2. To have the democratic mass organizations, the executive town councils, the schools, cooperatives and factories, and other economic, cultural and social institutions, increase the friendly relations and exchanges of views with similar Soviet organizations, and to establish, in particular, friendly and cooperative accords.

VI

In conclusion, the Political Standing Committee of the FRELIMO Party's Central Committee, the Standing Commission of the People's Assembly and the Council of Ministers of the People's Republic of Mozambique decided:

1. To acclaim the Soviet people, the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, the party and state leadership of the Soviet Union and, in particular, the secretary-general of the Central Committee of the CPSU and chairman of the Presidium of the USSR Supreme Soviet, Comrade Leonid Ilyich Brezhnev, for the warm, fraternal manner in which they received the Mozambican party and state delegation, headed by President Samora Moises Machel.

2. To express appreciation for the honor conferred upon the Mozambican people, the FRELIMO Party and the People's Republic of Mozambique in having granted the Order of People's Friendship to President Samora Moises Machel.

3. To congratulate President Samora Moises Machel and the delegation led by him on the success of the official, friendly visit to the Union of the Soviet Socialist Republics.

Approved by the Political Standing Committee of the FRELIMO Party's Central Committee.

Approved by the Standing Commission of the People's Assembly.

Approved by the Council of Ministers.

The President of the FRELIMO Party and President of the Republic, Samora Moises Machel.

DETAILS OF MAPUTO PORT FACILITIES PROVIDED

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 28 Nov 80 pp 2, 6

[Article reprinted from REVISTA DA DIRECCAO NACIONAL DOS PORTOS E CAMINHOS DE FERRO, April-September 1980: "Meeting Point for Cooperation With Countries and Peoples of the Entire World"]

[Excerpts] Pursuant to the decisions of the Lusaka Conference, the commitment of the RPM [People's Republic of Mozambique] in this area of East Africa has increased substantially: because it is the country which provides access to the sea for all the countries of a vast "hinterland," its principal ports will need to handle large quantities of cargo. At the present moment it is prepared to respond to any request.

Because it is the terminus of three major railroads (one line serves Swaziland, connecting at the border with the Swazi railway system; another serves the Republic of South Africa, connecting at the border with the South African Railways system; and lastly, the third line serves Zimbabwe, connecting at the border with the Zimbabwe Railways System), the port of Maputo--with an independent Zimbabwe serving as a bridge to Zambia and Zaire--takes on particular importance.

Specifications

A level roadway 22 meters long extends the entire length of the wharf. It is equipped with 74 electric cranes (of from 3 to 80 tons each) and three rail lines that enable trains to move freely, with the result that the cargo is loaded directly from the freight cars onto the ships or unloaded from the ships onto the cars. There are approximately 115 kilometers of railway track within the wharf area to provide these services.

Toward the rear and arranged in a row paralleling the roadway there are 28 warehouses with a total floorspace of 38,000 square meters and a storage capacity of 276,000 tons; 23 covered spaces totaling 5,920 square meters; and a number of open storage areas. These facilities are also served by three rail lines constructed at their rear.

There is also an electric bunker for the mechanical handling of coal, with a loading capacity of 800 tons per hour. This electric bunker is served by bunkers that have a total capacity of 96,000 tons of coal and by a special freight depot that can accommodate thousands of freight cars.

The port has a 7,500-ton capacity cold storage plant for fruit; it is constructed in such a way as to enable the boxes to be loaded directly from the refrigerated facilities onto the moored ships. There is also a cold storage plant for freezing fish; it has two chambers, each of which has a capacity of 100 tons.

The container wharf, construction of which was started in August 1970 and completed in mid-1971, represents 50,000 square meters of land reclaimed from the bay.

The steel wharf has a capacity which permits the simultaneous loading of two ships each with a draft of up to 37 feet, thanks to the presence of four modern cranes and 12 elevator cars with a capacity of 12 tons. The wharf is equipped with the largest heavy-cargo facility in the port of Maputo, in that it has a 46-square-meter paved area for the storage of steel.

The port handles large quantities of various types of ore, for which there are spaces (bunkers) that make it possible to store substantial quantities of this kind of cargo (1.4 million tons of bulk ore and 30,000 tons of copper).

The sugar complex at the port was completed in late 1966; it provides for the storage and handling of bulk sugar by the most modern methods. This installation consists of facilities for unloading freight cars at a rate of 350 tons per hour; a conveyor belt system; a system of continuous weighing; a loading tower for loading ships at a rate of 150 tons per hour; a system of winches for handling freight cars; and two warehouses for the storage of sugar with a total capacity of 80,000 tons.

In addition, silos were recently constructed for the mechanical handling of grain. They will have a total capacity of 50,000 tons of grain and will be able to handle 800 tons per hour.

Approximately 200 mechanical units, mobile cranes, forklifts, tractors for freight handling and towing, and pipelines running the entire length of the wharf to supply water and liquid fuels to the ships moored at the wharf round out the equipment of the port and are largely responsible for maintaining the reputation for rapid cargo handling and dispatch that this port has long enjoyed.

Matola Rail-Port Complex

Four miles from the port of Maputo is the Matola wharf, which was constructed in 1964 and is used for unloading bulk liquid fuels. It possesses the appropriate installations and pipelines linking the oil tankers to the existing gasoline storage tanks, which have a capacity of 160,000 tons. The crude oil from the Persian Gulf is discharged here, and fuel shipments to the neighboring Republic of South Africa and to destinations along the entire Mozambican coast are also processed at this complex.

A quay and warehouses for the handling of forest products were constructed in this area and in areas reclaimed from the sea.

A new wharf 208 meters in length was constructed later; it is equipped with installations for the mechanized handling of bulk ores at a loading rate of more than 3,000 tons per hour, which gives it first place for such facilities among all African ports. The iron ore from Swaziland and the magnetite and chrome from South Africa also pass through here.

The entry into operation of the Matola wharf enabled the port of Maputo to provide more space for ships.

Pilot Service

A ship wishing to call at the port of Maputo takes on its pilot north of the island of Inhaca, who upon the vessel's departure accompanies it as far as the same location.

Ships can leave and enter the port through the southern bar or the northern bar, which allow the entry or departure of ships with a maximum draft of 38 and 37.2 feet respectively, depending on the tides that occur on the day in question.

Maritime Administration

The Maritime Administration has its headquarters in a building located outside the port area.

It has jurisdiction over the entire coast, including the ports and rivers of Maputo and Gaza Provinces, and is in charge of all maritime services in general; lighthouses; buoy marking; operation of the drydock; anchorages; dragging with cables and anchors; decisions with respect to maritime damage and disasters; fishing; policing of the waters and shores; and the navigational safety--and inspection--of all floating equipment.

FISHING BOAT DAMAGED IN MAPUTO BAY

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 26 Nov 80 p 2

[Text] An industrial-class fishing boat belonging to the Mozambican-Soviet joint enterprise MOSOFESCA [Mozambican-Soviet Fishing Enterprise] has lain half submerged since last Friday night in Maputo Bay, outside the ship channel on the Catembe side.

Although it has not been possible for us to learn the reasons why the shrimp boat "Piti" ran aground--despite our efforts to find out--it is known that the physical damage to the boat is quite substantial, inasmuch as water completely filled the engine room and damaged the electrical system.

The boat entered the port of Maputo last week to repair the damage sustained by one of its propellers. We learned from organizations connected with maritime activities that when the boat arrived at the port of the nation's capital it was unable to dock because of a lack of space, and its captain consequently decided to beach it on the Catembe side of the bay so that it could be repaired rapidly.

The same sources said that although beaching a boat in that area is feasible and therefore proper, it was apparently not done in accordance with the navigational standards required in consequence of the tide, the current and other circumstances.

The result of noncompliance with these standards was that the shrimp boat "Piti" toppled onto its side and shipped water during high tide the following day, Saturday.

At the time of the accident the boat was already loaded with supplies for its crew and all its fishing equipment, inasmuch as the repairs would not require much time and it could immediately thereafter continue its voyage and its fishing tasks.

Since last Sunday firefighting teams from the city of Maputo; the Metalo-Mecanica enterprise; maritime authorities; and the ship's crew itself have been involved in the operations to refloat the vessel.

These operations--which are supported by a dredge--have, however, been made very difficult by the inadequacy of the existing equipment, and the date on which the work can be completed is therefore unknown. As of late yesterday it was still impossible to refloat the "Piti."

The aforementioned entities responsible for maritime activity have emphasized to us that even after the "Piti" is refloated it will be necessary to have a period of at least 6 months for its complete repair, including obviously the replacement of equipment damaged by the saltpeter [sic].

Operating with a maximum crew of 23, the "Piti"--built in Brazil--measures 25 meters in length, 6.7 meters in width (beam) and 4.6 meters in height. The boat displaces 110 cubic meters (approximately 200 tons of cargo) and attains a maximum speed of 10 knots.

The boat is of modern design and carries equipment normally used by large vessels; this gives it a self-sufficiency of 25 working hours at sea. It has a refrigeration capacity of 1,000 kilograms per hour, for a total of 35 tons of shrimp. This figure could be increased by virtue of the dimensions of the hold, which has a capacity of 50 tons of fish.

SABOTAGE, ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES IN COMMERCIAL ENTERPRISE

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 6 Dec 80 pp 1, 3

[Text] Several complaints from the population affiliated with the People's Vigilance activity have led to the detection of serious maneuvers involving economic sabotage in the enterprises associated with the Man Kay group and, consequently, to intervention therein. This measure was reported in a dispatch signed by the minister of home trade, Manuel Aranda da Silva.

By virtue of the aforementioned dispatch, which we published in its entirety on page 3 of this issue, an Administrative Commission was appointed to assume the authority of the General Assemblies in the Man Kay Commercial Company enterprises, SARL; Bulhas, Ltd; Chemical-Drugs; Alves, Correia & Bulhas, Ltd; E.N. Mahomed & Bros, Ltd; and Casa Momad Ibraimo.

All these firms belonged to the May Kay group and, with the exception of the Man Kay Commercial Company, they engaged in their activities in Beira, while the former did so in Maputo.

From wholesale to retail trade, including importing and exporting, the activities of the different enterprises in the group covered a large area of the commercial sector, carrying considerable weight with respect to the system for supplying the population, particularly in the country's two major cities.

As a result of this importance, as our staff was told yesterday by a member of the commission investigating the activities of the aforementioned enterprises, the many different kinds of economic sabotage and fraud practiced by the administrative boards and managements of those firms were detrimental not only to the state's economic security, but also to the efforts expended to improve supplies to the population.

Among other illegal acts discovered after the probe, in the area of the state's economic security, were maneuvers which were reflected in an improper outlay of hard currency amounting to about 17,514,497 meticals, as a result of overbilling and underbilling.

As for the damage to the supply for the population, the illegal acts that were discovered, among other things, caused imbalances in the supplies of commodities distributed in several provinces, thus worsening the problem of queues in some, in addition to constituting the practice of speculation.

PORTUGUESE TECHNICIANS ARRIVE TO ASSIST SHOE INDUSTRY

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 29 Nov 80 p 2

[Article: "Efforts To Restore Production at FACOBOL and UFA"]

[Excerpts] Part of the technical team of the Portuguese company FAROBOL [expansion unknown] has already arrived in Maputo. For a period of 2 years the team will provide support to the rubber and canvas shoe factories (specifically, to FACOBOL [Rubber and Canvas Shoe Factory] and to UFA [expansion unknown], both of which are located in the nation's capital).

The transfer of these Portuguese technicians to the People's Republic of Mozambique was made under the provisions of the cooperation agreement signed between the two countries which provides for technical assistance and the training of staff personnel in this sector of industry.

The aforesaid agreement was signed following the visit made by President Samora Machel to FACOBOL as part of the current Political and Organizational Offensive. With the adoption of this measure and the arrival of raw materials that have already been imported, new prospects have thus been created for the improvement and increase of production in this sector, and the results will become apparent early next year.

According to information obtained from representatives of the management of the aforementioned industrial unit, another group of five technicians in the employ of the same Portuguese partner has been working since late last month on a general survey of the existing equipment at the factory. These technicians are scheduled to leave for their country next 19 December.

The technical team which will work in our country for 2 years--a part of which is already in Maputo--consists of 12 persons, six of whom are assigned to FACOBOL and the remainder to UFA. In addition to providing technical assistance to the current staff personnel in these manufacturing sectors, these technicians will train Mozambican cadres for the future operation of the factories.

Despite the Raw Material Shortage We Receive Strong Support From the Official Organizations

In the course of the interview with our reporters the FACOBOL management cited the shortage of raw material as one of the principal problems and said this difficulty has intensified steadily since 1979.

Meanwhile, a number of Mozambican workers from the FACOBOL factory are scheduled to travel within a few days to a European country, where they will take an advanced training course.

Some of the cooperating technicians now in our country are having to cope with the housing shortage. Two of their number are at present living in Inhaca until their situation in the capital is normalized.

However, this problem (the problem of housing the cooperating technicians), which is a universal problem, is being solved by the appropriate official organizations, which have already moved many of the technicians from the hotels into residences which are being prepared for their use.

DEFICIENT FINANCING DELAYS TRANSFER OF PEOPLE'S STORES

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 1 Dec 80 p 3

[Text] The internal work in connection with the transfer of the establishments of the People's Stores enterprise--which was initiated fully 5 months ago--is scheduled to conclude today, 1 December, in all the provinces of the nation.

According to data obtained from the National Liquidation Commission concerning the aforementioned establishments, the transfer process is considerably behind schedule except in Maputo and Nampula Provinces, where the work has made some progress.

The delay experienced throughout the transfer process has been caused primarily by the financial and organisational difficulties encountered, and especially the former, which are impeding the proper development of the work under way.

We were told, however, that this problem is the object of increased attention on the part of the various entities represented on the National Liquidation Commission, with the Bank of Mozambique having reserved for itself the final study of the question.

Among proposals already put forward by the National Liquidation Commission, it was agreed that the Bank of Mozambique [BM] would grant credit on a case-by-case basis to the purchasers of these establishments, taking into account in each case the type of activity engaged in by a given establishment and the population density of the area in which it is located.

Inasmuch as it is the rural areas which at the present time are experiencing the greatest difficulties with respect to supply, it was also proposed that the BM grant increased financing to those interested in purchasing establishments located in these areas.

"The bank financing," a member of the National Liquidation Commission declared, "is basically weak. It is accordingly insufficient to make possible the purchase--in addition to the establishment proper and its equipment--of the inventory of a given store. This is the reason why a large percentage of those persons who had signed up have subsequently withdrawn."

PEOPLE'S STORES TRANSFERS CAUSING UNEMPLOYMENT

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 4 Dec 80 p 3

[Text] Our staff was notified by a member of the National Liquidation Commission for the People's Stores establishments that the unemployment of the workers from the People's Stores enterprises is a situation that has been noted as the process of the transfer of the respective establishments takes place throughout the entire country.

Despite the fact that the admission and placement of the competent, well-qualified workers from those same establishments in other existing productive sectors has been an endeavor to which the authorized entities have devoted great attention, some of those very workers are still without any employment. This fact is due mainly to the small number of jobs available in our country at present.

Assignment to the Park and Garden Areas

Before the process of transferring the People's Stores establishments began, a study was made of a means of solving the problem of placing the respective workers. For example, in the case of workers who lacked schooling and occupational skills, it was decided to assign them to the park and garden areas, the communal villages or other productive sectors.

However, unlike what had been planned, the dynamics of the transfer, which began last July, exceeded those involved in the creation of the aforementioned park and garden areas, which is in a relatively delayed phase. This situation is one of the leading factors underlying the unemployed status of the workers that is evident at present.

In the urban areas, one of the principle expedients for placing competent workers with minimal qualifications (according to reports obtained from a member of the National Liquidation Commission) has been their admission to new enterprises, or to ministries (as in the case of the city of Maputo).

It is also noteworthy that some workers from the establishments already transferred are still assigned to the stores in which they had been working, although this time they are subordinate to a new owner.

With regard to this matter, the member of the National Liquidation Commission told our staff that, according to regulations, no owner may refuse to keep the former workers of the store that has been purchased, with the idea of admitting new personnel, or facilitating employment for relatives and friends.

That individual emphasized: "However, this does not mean that they must necessarily keep all the workers who were in those establishments at the time."

Priority Must Be Given to the Admission of Those Workers

Also according to the same official, the problem is so serious that, at the present time, the People's Stores enterprise is incurring expenses by paying wages to workers who are unemployed and who are no longer rendering services in that sector.

That member of the National Liquidation Commission remarked: "In view of the seriousness of the problem, we have appealed to the Ministry of Labor, requesting that, through its provincial directorates, specifically the placement sectors, when new individuals are admitted, they take into account the need to give priority to the workers from the People's Stores, based on their conduct and occupational skills."

Meanwhile, insturctions have been given to the Provincial Liquidation Commissions to send lists containing the names of the workers from the People's Stores who are currently unemployed, so that, in conjunction with the Ministry of Labor, a study may be made of a means of creating conditions for their assignment to productive tasks.

ELECTRIC POWER FOR ZAMBEZIA PROVINCE

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 21 Nov 80 p 1

[Text] The capital of Zambezia Province has now ceased to be a city "in the dark" with the startup--although still in the experimental stage--of the new electric power plant. This ended the difficult period the city had been experiencing for years with constant restrictions in the supply of electric power to residences, factories, offices and the public lighting system--; a period in which the city's entire life was conditioned by the limited capacity of its old electric power plant.

Power production has been inadequate for about 10 years, and there were even short periods when Quelimane was completely without light.

The new electric power plant--still in an experimental stage--entered into operation last week, supplying the entire city. The power plant consists of two generator groups with Mirrlees motors, each having a power output of 3.4 MW, or a total of 6.8 MW installed (as a comparison, the old power plant had a capacity of approximately 3.5 MW during its best days). Therefore, from now on there will be no restrictions on consumption, social or industrial, and its is even desirable, for technical and economic reasons, for consumption to be significantly increased.

This is one more victory and clear demonstration of the sensitivity of the party and government organizations to the real problems of the people.

When Mozambique Electric Company [EM] was founded in mid-1977, the company gave priority to resolving the problem of producing electric power in Quelimane, since, at that time, the existing power plant was unable to supply even a minimum quality or continuity of service. In fact, the equipment was obsolete, there were no spare parts and the most qualified experts had left the power plant from the time of national independence.

Therefore, EM drew up plans for a new power plant whose installation depended upon financial aid from the United Kingdom through the government agency, Crown Agents. In the meantime, to relieve the difficult situation over the short term while the new project was being carried out, EM took immediate steps to obtain spare parts to repair the equipment and arranged for emergency groups to come to the city, even though the latter, with their limited skill, served only as a palliative. Since these groups, being "emergency" groups, were not prepared to work continuously, they ran certain risks. And although it is true that some of the equipment was damaged for that reason, it is nonetheless true that the group succeeded in alleviating and minimizing the problems.

Once the necessary financial aid was obtained, construction of the new power plant began immediately, even though there were certain delays in the work schedule initially established. The delays were due to slow material and equipment deliveries, on the one hand, and, on the other, to a certain lack of internal organization and efficiency beyond EM's control as, for example, a temporary lack of stone for making concrete.

The new Quelimane electric power plant, whose investment comes to about 125 million meticais, in addition to supplying the urban areas, will supply the water impounding station of Licuari, Nicuadala, the Sococo, the ceramics factory and others, with all public and private installations being ablt to operate with no restrictions on consumption from now on.

BEIRA-MALAWI RAILROAD ACCIDENT--Beira--Millions of meticais of damage in rolling stock and the loss of 262 tons of molasses intended for export (equivalent to a damage of many hundreds of meticais) is the tally of a railroad accident which occurred last Monday on the Beira-Malawi line at kilometer 64 at a place known as Derunde. According to information supplied by the management of CFM-Centro [Mozambique Central Railroad], the cause of the accident, which resulted in the derailment of 12 cars, was the precarious condition of the maintenance and preservation of that important railroad. Meanwhile, just recently there was another accident for the same reason at kilometer 27 of the same line in the area of Savane. In a meeting with the news media, Engineer Rui Fonseca, one of CFM-Centro's directors, asserted that the Derunde accident was caused by the bad condition of the track as a whole but particularly of that at the scene of the disaster. He also said that efforts are being made to correct and considerably improve the entire line inasmuch as that line is heavily involved in the transportation of merchandise to and from Malawi. He then pointed out that the condition of that line had been worrying national leaders of the railway sector for a long time; he stated in this connection: "For technical reasons and reasons of safety, low speed limits have been established in certain areas to avoid accidents." PROVISIONING ORGANIZATION NEAR COMPLETION--Preparatory work in the nation's capital to implement the new provisioning system is almost completed. This process consists of assigning each family unit to a specific consumer outlet or cooperative closer to its place of residence and includes the distribution of an individual supply card without which no family will be able to purchase in normal commercial establishments the 11 essential products to be provided by the system and to be available soon. One of the principal concerns of Maputo's Provisioning Organization is to tie family units in with commercial establishments closer to their places of residence. Therefore, to guarantee the purchase of the products to be provided by the new supply system, all residents of Greater Maputo will be permitted in the interim to purchase from existing retail stores in the capital. As was explained at the beginning of the preparations for the implementation of the new supply system, family units will not be assigned exclusively to consumer cooperatives. According to clarifications given by Mario Guerreiro, only members of those cooperatives will be able to obtain supplies from those establishments through the use of the supply cards. Other individuals will be tied in with various commercial establishments such as private stores, booths or supermarkets already existing in their area. That is why the entire retail network of Greater Maputo will be involved in the new system. [Excerpts] [Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 21 Nov 80 p 2] 8568

DELEGATION TO BRAZILIAN UNIVERSITY--In response to an invitation from the Brazilian Government, a Mozambican delegation, headed by Fernando Ganhao, rector of Eduardo Mondlane University, left yesterday afternoon for that South American country. The delegation, composed of nine members of the Eduardo Mondlane University and six from the Ministry of Education and Culture, will speak particularly of subjects related to the problems of education and, as part of its program, will hold meetings with members of Brazil's universities, specifically those of Brasilia, Paraiba, Sao Paulo and Rio de Janeiro. "We are thinking of establishing future exchanges with those universities and forms of cooperation, depending upon the advantages to be had in this initial phase," Fernando Ganhao said and added that another purpose of the trip was to bring scientific literature back to Mozambique to raise the level of our university teaching. The delegation will remain in Brazil about 5 days. [Text] [Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 21 Nov 80 p 2] 8568

COOPERATION WITH ROMANIAN YOUTH--A delegation from the Romanian Union of Communist Youth, headed by Benedic Caterina, secretary of the union's Central Committee, left Maputo yesterday to return home. The delegation had spent several days in our capital. During the visit the delegation met with the OJM [Mozambican Youth Organization] and the secretariat of FRELIMO's Central Committee where a program of action was established for the 2-year period 1981 and 1982, including, among other arrangements, the visit of a children's group to our country to spend their vacation. Speaking for his delegation, Benedic Caterina expressed his wishes for our success and progress in the construction of socialism and gave his assurance of the solidarity of the Romanian youth in our great task of winning the battle against underdevelopment. He also said this visit provided an opportunity for our peoples to become better acquainted and served as an indication of the friendly relations between FRELIMO and the Romanian Communist Party and between President Somora Machel and President Nicolae Ceaucescu. NETHERLANDS-FINANCED DRAINAGE PROJECT--Maputo (AIM)--The Mozambican National Directorate of Water opened public and international bidding for the purpose of implementing the first phase of the drainage project for the city of Maputo, the capital. According to the reports disseminated in our newspaper on that bidding, this project is being financed by the Netherlands, and is scheduled to be executed in 1,100 days. The construction company that wins the bid will be responsible for supplying the material to build a system of drainage ditches dug in the northwest and Infulene Valley, northeast of the city. The project area is a depression in the northern part of the city which is flooded regularly during the rainy season. It is also a residential and industrial area, including part of the Mavalane international airport. The financing for this project will be provided to the Mozambican Government by the Netherlands Government, and is scheduled to continue for 3 years. Initially, the project had been budgeted at $9.6 million, but owing to the increased prices of building materials on the market, the current budget has been estimated at over $11.5 million. Seventy percent of the total cost of the project will be in hard currency. [Excerpts] [Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 4 Dec 80 p 3] 2909

CUBAN-TRAINED POULTRY WORKERS--Workers of the National Poultry Company, who recently returned from the Republic of Cuba where they attended a specialized course in poultry farming, have sent a message to Mario da Graca Machingo, member of the Permanent Political Committee of the FRELIMO Central Committee and minister of agriculture. "We would like to express our satisfaction at having carried out this honorable and weighty responsibility which was entrusted to us," the poultry workers' message noted. The document adds that the Mozambican students in that brother country presented the workers with a number of books, in recognition of their dedication during this specialized course. The message also notes the dedication shown by the Cuban people, both in passing on their knowledge of poultry farming and in reinforcing the friendly relations between the two peoples, which will contribute to the struggle against underdevelopment in Mozambique. SWAPO UNREST--More than a thousand SWAPO dissidents are reported to be languishing in concentration camps or jails, or are being forced to stay in UN refugee camps in Zambia and southern Angola. A large number of former SWAPO members, mostly members of the Caprivi National Union, who have taken advantage of the administrator-general's amnesty, have been interviewed by newsmen. They said there was widespread unrest in SWAPO ranks because of tribal discrimination. The dissidents said there was growing indication that leaders of the Caprivi National Union planned to join the moderate leaders in South Africa in their quest for a peaceful transition to independence. The arrival of a new group of SWAPO dissidents, which included three women and four children, has pushed up the number to take advantage of the amnesty to 36 within a fortnight. They told newsmen that they left Zambia because they feared that they would be killed or thrown into jail if they remained. Most of them are loyal to the deposed former SWAPO vice-president, Mr. Muyongo. One of them, Mr. (?Kennedy Shapwa), who had been sent by SWAPO to Moscow to study trade unionism, said there had been a large-scale killing of members of the Caprivi National Union, and the 16-year-old marriage of the union and SWAPO was over. 'AFP' EXAMINES REASONS FOR KANO DISTURBANCES

[Text] Lagos, 28 Dec (AFP)--The situation returned to normal at the weekend in Kano, a Moslem city in northern Nigeria some 1,200 kilometers from Lagos following 9 days of religious riots which have caused between 400 and 1,000 deaths according to information published in the Nigerian capital. The riots started on 18 December in the old Kano city (with about 1 million inhabitants) when followers of a Moslem sect known as Al Masifu, whose objective is believed to be the take-over of the central mosque, clashed with the police who came to disperse them.

According to the reports which reached Lagos, the followers of the sect, "who were superior in number, burned the police vehicles and then began to set fire to houses and attack people as a reaction against the police intervention." It is impossible at the moment to determine the exact number of the victims and the origin of the troubles is still unclear although it is believed in Kano that through the takeover of the central mosque, the leader of the sect, al-Hadj Mohamed Marwa, intended to impose a more stringent form of Islam as well as his own way of praying.

The Nigerian press made two suppositions at the weekend. According to it, the Kano affair could be of purely Nigerian origin and particularly an internal affair of the Kano state which is governed by the People's Redemption Party (PRP) that is itself divided into two factions. On the contrary, this affair could have been fomented abroad in order to destabilize the country which has been under civilian rule for 14 months now.

Under the heading "Politics Is at the Origin of the Kano Crisis," the DAILY TIMES OF LAGOS (a pro-government daily newspaper) tried to demonstrate that the Al Masifu sect seems to enjoy foreign support. "It has become clear," wrote the paper, "that the sect leader Mohamed Marwa Matta Sine, who is of Cameroonian origin, and his followers are more than mere religious fanatics. It has been established that one of the followers killed by the police was a Chadian officer (as his identity papers testified) and that the wounded sect members were treated by light skinned foreign doctors.

The first information received from Kano at the beginning of the week mentioned the presence of Chadian, Cameroonian, Nigerian and Guinean nationals among the attackers.

This was confirmed during the weekend by the official press agency, NAN (News Agency of Nigeria), which asserted that the members of the Muslim sect seemed to have been trained in urban guerrilla tactics and that some of them appeared to have supernatural powers.

If one turns to the declarations of the governors of the state of Kano, Mr Mohamed Abubakar Rimi, whose membership in the People's Redemption Party (PRP) is the subject of controversy, the whole matter is rather a problem of internal policy. Mr Mohamed Rimi asserted on Kano television that the disorders were organized by PRP malcontents. None of them, he said, will be able to make us alter the reforms which we have embarked upon in the state. Observers recall that the Kano state governor was expelled from the party, as well as the governor of the neighboring state of Kaduna, Mr Balarabe Musa, last June for infringing the PRP charter, according to the party directorate.

It is also recalled that the PRP is essentially based on a populist ideology, which has its roots in Islam and which is preoccupied by the fate of the talakawas (the masses). It is particularly opposed to the continued existence of the feudal system which the Fulani (Peulh) nobility maintains.

Since he was elected in August 1979, Governor Rimi has tried to reduce the powers of the emirs and traditional rulers in Kano State. After the State House of Assembly passed the resolution, he dissolved the council of emirs and abolished taxes on cattle and the Jangali community, which the people used to pay to traditional rulers.

The daily paper, NATIONAL CONCORD, which in general reflects the view of the NPN (National Party of Nigeria), blames Governor Rimi for not consulting the emir of Kano, El Elhaj Ado Bayero, on the events. In addition, the paper writes that the governor had reportedly sent a letter to the leader of the sect Al Masifu giving him 2 weeks to leave Kano with his followers after the police had exerted pressure on him. Copies of this letter were reportedly made and distributed in the streets of this Moslem city. Reacting to this, El Hadj Mohamed Marwa planned to seize all mosques in Kano, according to the paper, with a view to reestablishing the role of emirs as religious personalities in the Islamic institutions.

The News Agency of Nigeria reports 1,000 victims, including a correspondent of the LAGOS DAILY TIMES, Mr Tunde Amao, who was killed by an arrow in a quarter under the control of the sect members. NAN also reports 1,000 people arrested by the police. It notes that the fanatics were surrounded and assaulted by the police in their own quarters. According to the agency, the police have erected barriers on every road to Kano city to prevent the sect from receiving reinforcements as it did earlier this week. As a matter of fact, members of the same sect, who are scattered throughout the neighboring states (Sokoto, Bauchi, Niger and Borno) reportedly came to assist their brothers from Kano in street fighting. According to NAN, the police intercepted six vehicles on this occasion, which were loaded with automatic weapons, bows and arrows.

The armed forces of Nigeria and the air force which were called to offer assistance, have not intervened. The air force planes only undertook reconnaissance flights over the quarters controlled by the fanatics, who are compared in Lagos to those who seized the Mecca grand mosque in November 1979.

DEVELOPMENT MINISTER ON COUNTRY'S REFUGEE PROBLEM

LD191323 London ASH-SHARQ AL-AWSAT in Arabic 13 Dec 80 p 3

[Interview with Somali minister of local government and rural development, Jama Mohamed Ghalif by Muhammad Sayyid 'Umar in Mogadishu--date not given]

[Excerpt] Mogadishu--[Question] What is the real number of the refugees?

[Answer] There are 765,321 refugees in Somalia at present. They are those who are in the refugee centers.

[Question] But according to some statistics their number is 1.5 million.

[Answer] The fact is that the official number of refugees in the refugee centers is the figure I gave you. Many times this number of refugees have entered towns and villages. Some of them have brought part of their money while others have brought their livestock and settled in the republic's villages and territories.

[Question] How do the refugees enter the Republic of Somalia? Are the borders open to them all the time? On the other hand, do the Ethiopian and Kenyan authorities allow the refugees to take their money and emigrate to Somalia?

[Answer] Yes. The Somali borders are open to them. The border with Kenya is short and not as long as our border with Ethiopia. Even so, anyone walking on foot can cross the Kenyan border. The fact is, there are a number of observation posts on the border but the roads are paved and the land is open and the jungles are vast and anyone walking on foot can enter from any side one wishes. They can even enter with small and big cars because the borders are long and vast, particularly with Ethiopia.

[Question] Do you believe that the immigration operation is being carried out under Ethiopian pressure on the basis that it will constitute a factor of pressure on Somalia to exhaust it economically or not?

[Answer] In fact the Ethiopian imperialist authorities try to exert pressure on the people of Somalia and employ intimidation and assassination methods against those demanding freedom. They do so by taking advantage of the support they receive from the Soviet Union, Cuba and other allies.

[Question] How much aid has the United Nations given to the refugees? How is this aid sent and under what conditions is the United Nations giving aid to the refugees in Somalia?

[Answer] The United Nations does not have the capabilities to give constant aid because its budget is limited. Last year, it presented 11 million shillings--over $1 million. The task of the United Nations is to appeal to the states of the world and to the other international organizations to give aid.

[Question] What Arab aid has been given so far?

[Answer] The Arab brothers give us aid but we must differentiate between the aid given for the refugees and the aid given to the Somali Government for project development. The fact is, the Saudi Arabia Kingdom has given $20 million as aid to the Somali Government to cover the budget deficit. As long as this aid has been given to the government, it will not go to the refugees but to the government. The basic reason for which the Saudi Arabian Kingdom had given this sum is to enable Somalia to offset the effect the refugees have on the budget.

The Iraqi Republic has also presented $20 million. Iraq has allocated $15 million to bolster Somalia's budget which has been affected by the influx of refugees and $5 million for the refugees, presented in the form of food and clothing. The state of Kuwait has also given aid in shiploads [type of aid not specified] without informing us of the value. My personal estimation is that this aid amounts to not less than $5 million. I have contacted the officials on the UN office to evaluate this aid because we sometimes cannot tell the real value of aid. We have also received aid from individuals in some Arab countries, particularly Kuwait, totaling $750,000. The Islamic Development Bank has given $1 million for the construction of hospitals and the purchase of essential medicines. The Islamic World League has presented $500,000 for the refugees. The Saudi Red Crescent has also given sporadic aid to the Somali Red Crescent. In general, that is the aid that has been given to the refugees and not to the Somali Republic. Other aid has been given to Somalia directly.

[Question] Will the Somali [as published] refugees be granted Somali citizenship or will they return to their country when the present circumstances end?

[Answer] The truth is that the burden is too much for us. Therefore we hope that they will return to their country within the framework of self-determination. The fact is that Somalia cannot absorb these vast numbers nor can it give them Somali citizenship. The refugees are sure that they will return to their country one day.

[Question] Have specific efforts been made to repatriate them in the near future?

[Answer] We are making extensive efforts for this purpose but the other side is using arms against the refugees and does not want to give them their rights. The other side will not agree as long as it has the support of the Soviet Union, Cuba and its other allies. In my opinion, the best way to resolve the problem is for the foreign forces to get out of the Horn of Africa. The two sides should then reach a peaceful solution for the repatriation of the refugees. You, being a journalist, are aware that Ethiopia refuses to give Eritrea the right to self-determination. This is the same prolbem.

ANC WOMEN'S DELEGATION LEADER'S COMMENTS

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 5 Dec 80 p 4

[Excerpts] "The relations between FRELIMO [Mozmabique Liberation Front] and the African National Congress [ANC] did not begin today; they date back to the time of the armed struggle for the liberation of Mozambique. The support that FRELIMO has given us did not occur by chance, for our struggle is a continuation of the struggle that it waged and won. This is because Mozambique will not feel free until this part of Southern Africa is completely liberated." The foregoing comments were made by Ruth Amapate, chief of the delection of the women's section of ANC, at the press conference that she granted to the national news media a few days ago.

The women's delegation from ANC that has been in our country for nearly 2 weeks is visiting Mozambique at the invitation of the OMM [Organization of Mozambique Women]. The delegation visited several sections of our country in order to become familiar with our current situation, as part of the exchange of views between the two women's organizations. This trip also served as an occasion on which to study concrete methods for OMM support to that women's section.

During these visits, the ANC delegation was interested essentially in observing the activity in which women are engaged in the various sectors. It was for that purpose that the delegation toured the production centers in which many female workers are employed.

ANC member Ruth Mampate remarked: "Cabo Delgado, the site on which the armed struggle in Mozambique began, was the province that we had an opportunity to visit in addition to the country's capital. The lives of the people in that area illustrate quite clearly the reasons for the people's struggle because, in the communal villages and cooperatives that we visited, we noted that there were good prospects for development. The collective work is consant, the production is in the hands of the people themselves and, in every phase, the population knows the goals that are being sought."

Cooperation Between the Two Women's Organizations

The contacts that it had with officials of the Organization of Mozambique Women, as well as the schedule of visits, afforded a study of the support that OMM should give to the women's section of ANC, and this was the chief purpose of the delegation's trip to our country.

One of the questions which the press asked Ruth Mampate related to the goals of the delegation on this visit. In that regard, the women's section of ANC agreed with OMM that the latter should, through demonstrations, back the campaign under way in South Africa at present for the release of Nelson Mandela and the three other liberty fighters who were recently condemned to death by the Pretoria regime.

Furthermore, solidarity weeks will be held with the South African people, and the two women's organizations will simultaneously celebrate Women's Day in each country, namely, on 7 April, Mozambican Women's Day, and 9 August, South African Women's Day.

As for the concrete action in which the South African women are engaged at present, Ruth Mampate stated that the attention is currently focused entirely on the liberation struggle. That member of ANC added: "We have our female comrades on the battle front for this purpose, as political commissioners and even commanders."

OBOTE CHRISTMAS MESSAGE TO THE NATION

LD251550 Kampala Domestic Service in English 0400 GMT 25 Dec 80 EA

[Text] President Obote has sent a goodwill Christmas message to the people of Uganda. The message said: Uganda is renowned for being one of the leading countries in Africa, built by the efforts of our own people and religious missionaries. On the occasion of the Christmas festival of the birth of Christ, I reiterate and send a Christmas message of goodwill to all men and peace to our country. To all Ugandans of every faith, I would say that this is a festival of rejoicing and of reflection.

In Christianity, the festival marks the birth of the Christian Savior and if we are in our homes here in Uganda, it is traditional to joice at the birth of the child and to reflect on how best that child would be brought up to serve our respective homes and society. I see Uganda at the present moment in the same light. For 8 years since January 1971 to the time of liberation last year, the people of Uganda had to undergo and to endure a regime of murder and terror, which, as we look back, was a period of pain, trial, struggle and concern. I am saying a period of pain, because we lost many; trial, because, many wondered whether to submit or not to submit to the regime of murder and terror; struggle, because some of our fellow citizens opted to sacrifice their lives for the freedom of all of us so that all of us may live in freedom and peace.

As we look back to the years of struggle, there were times when there was general concern amongst the people of Uganda as to whether we would ever be in this present situation, where the people of Uganda now have a government of their own choice. That concerns us as to whether or not we would ever have a government of our own choice [words indistinct] to that of an expectant mother. Much as Ugandans as a whole never lost hope of getting rid of a murderous and a fascist regime, it was never certain that we would rid ourselves of the regime and we had to endure the hardships and problems for over 8 years.

Our expectations and deliverance were realized last year. After liberation and until 10 days ago, we had had three administrations, which in human terms can be described as a small and weak child. With elections, the people of Uganda have produced a strong, energetic, healthy and determined child. We have a strong parliament, a strong government, with a strong opposition.

On behalf of the government, I want to reaffirm our basic policy. There shall be no revenge and the policy of reconciliation will be prosecuted with all the vigour under our command. I am pained that during this season of goodwill to all men, a number of our citizens are still living abroad. I particularly call upon those who recently fled from Arua and Moyo districts to come home and I want to assure them of our commitment to the policy of no revenge and reconciliation. To all others who are living abroad for whatever reason, I will send the message to each and every one of them that the people of Uganda have spoken in a free and fair election and that they should accept the verdict of the people. They are welcome home in that spirit.

Here at home I want to express in the most humble manner possible my personal understanding of the Christmas message. The birth of Christ, the Savior, was first announced to the shepherds, who were a simple and humble class of people. All others came to know about the message later. We in Uganda got that message just over 100 years ago. We now have a new government and the first message the new government wants to send is to all the peasant farmers, the workers and the youth of Uganda. To all of you, my government recognizes the contribution you have made in building Uganda and your potential ability to rebuild Uganda. The workers and the youth have roots in the peasantry.

To the youth, we pledge a meaningful and active involvement in the affairs of our land. We pledge a positive policy for their development in the service of this nation. To the worker, I acknowledge, on behalf of the government, your impossible situation. The government is working urgently to rectify the situation. To the peasants, all the number of years you have been producing commodities that you have not been paid. Instead, in many cases, you have been issued with receipts promising payments. In January 1981, the government shall call upon all of you who are in possession of delivery receipts of your produce and have not been paid to register with an appropriate authority such receipts and the government shall arrange to determine who failed to pay you and take appropriate action against such persons. Having determined why you were not paid, arrangements shall be made for you to be paid in full and that those who failed to pay you will be subjected to appropriate rigorous disciplinary action.

To all farmers, workers, youths and all Ugandans, I send you a message of sweat and toil and assurance that your sweat and toil will be justly rewarded. I ask you to be proud of what you are doing. You are the backbone of our economy and our nation.

I have received since elections, messages from persons representing a broad cross-section of the Ugandan populace which, I now want to acknowledge with grateful thanks. In all the messages, you have all prayed for unity and stability as well as security in our land. I promise, with your cooperation, that the government will work for the achievement of those objectives. In this message, I want to assure you that this is an era of hope and confidence in our future. And it is the time for you yourselves, your family and for Uganda.

With determination by all of us, I have no doubt that Uganda, the pearl of Africa, shall rise and shine again. I wish every Ugandan a Merry Christmas. Let all of us rededicate ourselves to our national motto and we say with one voice in everything we do: For God and my country.

MOBUTU INTERVIEW ON FRENCH RADIO

AB211015 Kinshasa AZAP in French 1748 GMT 19 Dec 80

[Text] Paris, 19 Dec (AZAP)--The founding chairman of the Popular Movement of the Revolution [MPR] and president of the republic, citizen Mobutu Sese Seko, who is continuing his private visit to Paris, on Tuesday gave Radio France International an important interview dealing mainly with the tragedy in Chad, the organization of regional groups in Africa and Zaire's internal situation.

France should not have withdrawn from Chad. Central Africa must let its voice be heard on this problem, the founding chairman said, speaking on the Chad tragedy.

Asked his reaction as a Central African leader to the rather firm position of the French Government on the Chad situation, President Mobutu explained that France should not have withdrawn from Chad, because, he asserted, France's responsibility is always present.

Asked if he agreed with President Bongo's appeal last Saturday on French television for the return of French troops to Chad, leader Mobutu Sese Seko gave the following answer: It is almost too late, too late, considering all the current on-the-spot developments.

Chad, he stressed, is an integral part of our subregion, Central Africa, and the time has come for the Central African subregion to make its voice heard. That is why, he said, I took the initiative to make my colleagues of the subregion aware of its importance so that the Central African region could take a serious view of this Chad problem and become conscious of the danger it represents, even for the survival of the Chadian nation and for the stability and security of Chad's neighbors.

For President Mobutu, the key to the Chad problem could be found in Brazzaville, where the heads of state of the member states of the Customs and Economic Union of Central Africa [UDEAC] will meet on 20 December, and after negotiations by the Zairian head of state, have decided to include the Chad situation on their agenda. Unfortunately, President Mobutu said, my schedule does not allow me to be present in Brazzaville on 20 December to contribute my voice to that of my UDEAC colleagues for an eventual initiative [word indistinct] but I shall be represented at a very high level by my first state commissioner. On the economic integration of the African states, President Mobutu admitted that in this field, Africa was on the right path toward the strengthening of its real unity. Referring to the Economic Community of the Countries of the Great Lake, [CEPGL] the head of state expressed satisfaction with the resolutions of the fourth summit of this community. Something serious is going on (?nearby), he said before mentioning his personal approaches [words indistinct] in Central Africa (?especially) between the UDEAC and the CEPGL. The forthcoming meeting in Brazzaville will probably define the position of the UDEAC, President Mobutu said.

For the Zairian president, the African countries' efforts to regroup must be encouraged to a very great degree because, according to him, without such groups there will be no OAU.

Reviewing Zaire's internal situation, leader Mobutu Sese Seko began by expressing satisfaction with the success achieved on the economic recovery plan. The figures are there, he said, and they do not deceive. After the difficult turning points of 31 March, 30 June and 30 September, and in view of the positive balance which has already been prepared for 31 December, Zaire, President Mobutu explained, is no longer talking of economic recovery but of extended facilities from the IMF. Guide Mobutu Sese Seko added: All our partners now know that something serious is happening in Zaire and Zaire is now making its case to the IMF and the World Bank.

Asked about the people's participation in the economic recovery, President Mobutu paid tribute to his people, who have listened to his advice and to his voice and whose discipline has enabled Zaire to get out of a very difficult situation. The great beneficiaries of Zaire's recovery are the people, President Mobutu Sese Seko declared, adding that it is time for the people to benefit from the confidence they have placed in their leader.

Asked if there are political prisoners in Zaire, President Mobutu gave a clear, straight-forward and unequivocal answer: [words indistinct] political prisoner, he will be released. [word indistinct] what is being said on the political prisons and prisoners in Zaire, the head of state added, is part of a [word indistinct] campaign, meant to cause harm. And President Mobutu pointed out that among all branches of Amnesty International in the world, it is the one in Belgium that has been most at Zaire's heels. This is not by accident since it is known that Mobutu favors the use of an expensive language toward the Belgians--the man who [words indistinct] takes a beautiful beefsteak out of his mouth.

Zaire, President Mobutu went on again, has just opened wide the doors of its prisons to the International Red Cross. The report of this respected and dignified institution supports Zaire, but never will Amnesty International make any reference to this report. My conscience is clean, leader Mobutu Sese Seko concluded.

Concerning Zaire's recent political reforms, especially the creation of the MPR Central Committee, our [words indistinct] founder of the MPR began by recalling his 4 February address, during which he had carefully reviewed all sectors of national life.

I had to, he said, address harsh words to the Political Bureau which in turn had to undergo a thorough self-criticism, which resulted in the transfer of all the Political Bureau's powers to the Central Committee.

The MPR Congress, leader Mobutu Sese Seko explained, meets every 5 years and we intend to make the twice-yearly Central Committee meetings minicongresses.

I appeal, the MPR founding chairman explained, to trustworthy men and people of value to form the Central Committee and to support me [words indistinct] carry out the administration of the country, while the Political Bureau members have become advisers who help me in my daily administration duties. It is a matter of a formula, leader Mobutu stressed--a formula involving a greater degree of participation by the people than you can imagine.

A rather unexpected question from Radio France International to President Mobutu: Mr President, how do you feel? President Mobutu's answer in between two bursts of laughter: As you can see, I am very well.

MOBUTU COMMENTS ON CHAD, WESTERN CRITICISM

AB240647 Kinshasa AZAP in French 1630 GMT 23 Dec 80

[Text] Paris, 22 Dec (AZAP)--The founding chairman of the MPR and president of the republic, citizen Mobutu Sese Seko, and his wife, Mama Bobi Ladawa, return to Zaire on Tuesday the 23d at the end of a 12-day private visit to Paris.

On Monday, guide Mobutu Sese Seko granted an interview to Jean Lartequy of the magazine PARIS MATCH which was mainly devoted to the Chadian problem. President Mobutu first recalled the decisions of the last UDEAC [Central Africa Customs and Economic Union] summit which has just ended in Brazzaville and with which Zaire has been associated for the first time.

The founding chairman stressed that at this meeting Zaire's point of view was adopted and that the final communique published at the end of the deliberations called for the immediate withdrawal of foreign forces from Chad while recommending the immediate setting up of an inter-African force to replace the Libyans--of course with the understanding that Central Africa would have to be represented within this force.

Referring to what the PARIS MATCH journalist called the risk of the extension of the Libyan threat, President Mobutu said he could neither confirm nor deny the alleged intentions of Colonel Al-Qadhdhafi, and he had no way of reading the thoughts of the Libyan leader. He added that, for his part he is calling for strict observance of the sacred principle of the sovereignty of states and the inviolability of the borders inherited from the colonial era by all OAU member countries.

All well-meaning African countries will have to join their efforts to help the Chadians regain their unity and devote themselves to their own development in peace, guide Mobutu Sese Seko said in substance.

Questioned on the attitude to be adopted by France founding president again began by deploring France's withdrawal from Chad and went on to wonder if a return of the French army under the present circumstances would not be interpreted by authorities on international law as a kind of aggression.

This does not prevent France from continuing to adopt a firm attitude of never hesitating to come to the assistance of her African friends when they are threatened in matters of security, he pointed out.

The suitable solution for Chad now is a solution of detente, the Zairian way, President Mobutu indicated.

We have experienced all this in Zaire, the founding chairman pointed out, adding: We have known secessions and rebellions, but we were forced to understand each other. During the agitated period of our history, we had 44 political parties, 22 governments, 7 trade unions, just to mention a few. But look at what we are today, look at Zaire today.

Guide Mobutu Sese Seko ended on a bitter note: Today we live in peace and national concord thanks to the MPR, but we are blamed in the West for having a one-party system and thereby practicing dictatorship. But your problem in the West is that you are more and more infiltrated by some so-called humanitarian international bodies by which you keep weakening us. In truth, the West today bothers us more than the East. But I am not the type to let myself be weakened in this manner. I am the head of state of everybody--the good ones and the evil ones. But I must tell you that the part which I reserve for the good citizens is predominant. Zaire, my country, does not let herself go easily. We defend ourselves and resist, come what may.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL ADOPTS DRAFT BUDGET

AB262057 Kinshasa AZAP in French 1749 GMT 24 Dec 80

[Excerpt] Kinshasa, 23 Dec (AZAP)--On Tuesday at the Palais de la Nation, the legislative council adopted the state draft budget for 1981 by 175 in favor, 3 against and 14 abstentions out of 192 members who took part in the vote. The draft will be submitted to the head of state for promulgation. The budget adopted by the people's commissioners set total receipts at 5,070,825,538 zaires and total expenditures at 5,571,500,813 zaires. This indicates a deficit of 500,671,275 zaires.

In his contribution to this public session, the state commissioner for finance and budget, citizen Namwisi Ma Nkoy, declared that the presentation of the state budget for next year was made under the watchword of openness, which must be the watchword of the organs of the MPR [Popular Movement of the Revolution].

All information--including that on sectors which had so far been considered untouchable--was furnished to the people's commissioners, he stated. Talking about the remarks made by participants [words indistinct] citizen Namwisi stressed that the budget is a demonstration of the political determination to orient the action of every [passage indistinct].

In this connection, the expenditures relating to the office of roads, for example, have considerably increased, as well as the budget of regional administrations (70 percent).

The members of the legislative council addressed themselves to several other essential issues during this October budgetary session, including in particular wages, which are a great burden on the budget of the state. A 10-percent increase costs the state 150 million zaires. Also, they expressed the belief that the most important thing now is to influence supply. Two other issues discussed by the assembly were the status of the SOTRAZ [Zaire Transport Company] and decentralization.

The commissioner for finance said that in the mind of the executive council, the said decentralization affects the decisions of the executive. He announced that this work has been done and the report submitted to the first commissioner of state.

With regard to Zaire's participation in the reconstruction of the Lobito railroads, citizen Namwisi said that this expenditure was not meant for the sake of prestige as some participants claimed; Zaire must meet its obligations connected with a project concerning its neighbors and its economy.

Talking about the deficit that Zaire's budget has exhibited for several years now, the state commissioner warned that it will be difficult to avoid the situation for a long time to come. He, however, recommended that the deficit should be used in the productive sectors.

The state commissioner for finance and budget also talked about the problems of the sale of diamonds in the amount provided for under the title receipts of the national press (14 million), which will use this amount; demonetization, the program of which will resume in January; and the imbalance in the distribution of investments to the various regions.

MINISTER KANGAI INTERVIEWED ON CUBA TRIP

LD291042 Salisbury Domestic Service in English 1745 GMT 27 Dec 80

[Interview with Kumbiri Kangai, minister of labor and social services, on 27 Dec 80; place not given]

[Excerpts] The minister of labor and social services, Comrade Kangai, returned from Havana on Christmas day, where he attended the Cuban Communist Party Congress. This afternoon, Comrade Kangai spoke to a member of a ZBC news team:

[Begin recording] [Question] Comrade Minister, you have recently returned from a trip to Cuba. Can you tell me what was the purpose of your visit?

[Answer] Well, the purpose of our visit there--we went there as a delegation--was to attend the Second Congress of the Cuban Communist Party and also to share with our Cuban colleagues their experiences in terms of social and economic development.

[Question] Did you go there in your capacity as minister or as a representative of Zanu PF?

[Answer] In fact, it is very difficult to differentiate. I went there as both because as a minister I had also to engage in discussions with officials, my counterparts there, and discuss matters which relate to my responsibilities. As a party official and a member of the Central Committee, I also had to see how their Central Committee functions, how they organize congresses like the one which we attended.

[Question] And how did you view the congress itself?

[Answer] The congress itself was a great success. It was well attended, well organized; it had more than 140 delegates of other countries. This is excluding the delegations from the various branches and committees of the Cuban Communist Party and members of the (?Politburo).

[Question] You say you had discussions on matters concerning your duties as minister. Does that mean that you signed agreements with the Cuban Government?

[Answer] There were no agreements signed. What we did was to really exchange information on matters of mutual interest. In fact, we had more to learn from them. They have had a lot of experience in creating self-reliant projects for their country. [End recording]

KENYAN, SUDANESE PRESIDENTS SUPPORT UGANDA'S OBOTE

Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 19 Dec 80 pp 1, 6

[Article by Cornelius Nyamboki: "Moi, Numeiry Support Obote"]

[Text]

PRESIDENT Moi and Sudanese President Gaafar Numeiry yesterday pledged full support to Uganda's new President, Dr. Milton Obote.

In an 11-page communique, the two leaders said they were motivated by the positive political developments in Uganda.

They said they had, therefore, decided "to reinforce and strengthen the historical ties of brotherhood, neighbourliness, friendship and co-operation between Kenya, the Sudan and Uganda".

Security

The communique, covering bilateral, regional and international matters, was signed by the two leaders at the People's Palace at the end of a four-day State visit to the Sudan by President Moi.

The two leaders also called for an immediate meeting of countries in the Indian Ocean region to resolve the deteriorating situation in the Horn of Africa.

"The security in the Indian Ocean is an integral part of the overall security in Europe, the Mediterranean, the Red Sea and Africa . . . .

"The two leaders agreed to call on all States in the region to consider holding a meeting primarily to discuss the question of the Indian Ocean as a zone of peace," the communique said.

On aid to developing countries, the two leaders "appealed to the world community to respond positively, through relevant institutions, to the aspirations and needs of the developing countries."

They stressed that only a new international economic order, based on equity, could bring about peace and ensure security in the world.

Presidents Moi and Numeiry reaffirmed their determination to broaden and deepen "these relations and further strengthen the axis of co-operation and consultation in all fields and at all levels."

The two leaders exchanged views on areas in which the ruling parties in Kenya and the Sudan could co-operate. The communique said the two leaders:

- Endorsed the recent outcome of the joint Ministerial consultative meetings between Kenya and the Sudan.
- Noted with satisfaction the achievement of the multi-faceted co-operation in the political, economic, technical and cultural fields.
- Agreed to hold more fraternal meetings to consolidate ties between Kenya and the Sudan.
- Endorsed an earlier suggestion for a tripartite meeting of the leaders of Kenya, Ethiopia and the Sudan "at the earliest possible time".
- Agreed that regular exchange and State visits between leaders of Kenya, Ethiopia and the Sudan "would greatly fulfil the vital interests of the peoples of the countries and serve the cause of peace, stability and security for the mutual benefit of the peoples of Africa and the world".
- Reaffirmed their faith in continued commitment to the enduring principles of the United Nations, the Organisation of African Unity and the Non-aligned Movement.
- Noted that co-operation with mutual respect is a means of strengthening understanding and promoting friendship and solidarity among peoples.

●Reaffirmed their support for the OAU in its efforts to attain socio-economic, scientific and technical advancement of the African continent and expressed their common determination to continue to work for peace, understanding and co-operation for mutual benefit of all the African peoples.

●Reaffirmed their conviction that African problems should be resolved by peaceful means, in accordance with the OAU principles and within the African context.

●Called on all OAU member-States to ensure total commitment to the OAU, a vital instrument for resolving bilateral and regional conflicts and a catalyst in the development of the African continent in all fields of endeavour.

●Called for an immediate withdrawal of foreign troops from Chad and an immediate ceasefire pending political negotiations to resolve the Chadian conflict by peaceful means.

●Reaffirmed their unwavering support for the people of Namibia under Swapo, the sole legitimate representative of the people of Namibia in their struggle for genuine independence, unity and territorial integrity.

The two countries commended the United Nations in its efforts to resolve the Namibian stalemate.

"Kenya and the Sudan, aware of the South African attempts to give legitimacy and to support groupings within Namibia, strongly condemn such manoeuvres and call on the UN, the OAU and other institutions to take these objections and sentiments very seriously," the two leaders said.

They also condemned apartheid and appealed to all peace-loving countries to refrain from practising racism in reverse.

On the Middle East, the two leaders said Palestinians must be let free to form a government if peace in the Middle East was to be realised.

The Sudan and Kenya oppose forceful occupation of the Palestinian land and call on Israel to withdraw from all occupied Arab land", the communique said.

On the Iran-Iraq conflict, the leaders expressed concern over its threat to regional peace, saying it might spill into the international scene.

They called for a speedy and peaceful solution to the conflict.

On Afro-Arab co-operation, the two countries said this "is of vital importance to both Africa and the Arab world".

Solidarity

They reaffirmed their desire to strengthen Afro-Arab solidarity and co-operation, advanced through the 1977 Cairo Summit.

"The two sides viewed with appreciation the constructive and positive role played by the Sudan in strengthening unity and co-operation between these two world communities."

The communique also said President Moi had invited the Sudanese leader to visit Kenya at a date to be fixed "by subsequent consultations".

On signing the communique, President Moi said in a four-minute vote of thanks:

"I hope this kind of co-operation will continue. I am happy that I now have the key to your capital city and can come here any time without notice."

President Moi was accompanied by Foreign Minister Robert Ouko, Ministers of State G.G. Kariuki and Nicholas Biwott, Local Government Minister Stanley Oloitipitip, Transport and Communications Minister Henry Kosgey and several senior Government officials.

He said time had come when African leaders should consolidate their ideals to form a unified continent.

He said Africans needed food more than ideologies "and we must strive towards achieving this need."

President Moi said he would send officers periodically to the Sudan to learn various aspects of technology "useful to our people".

President Numeiry said the "fruitful discussions we have had throughout your stay in our country marks an important milestone in our ever-developing bilateral relations."

KENYAN, ETHIOPIAN LEADERS DISCUSS BILATERAL RELATIONS, WORLD EVENTS

Nairobi THE WEEKLY REVIEW in English 12 Dec 80 pp 36, 38, 40

[Text]

DURING the four-day visit by Ethiopia's head of state, Lt. Col. Mengistu Haile Mariam, to Kenya last week, discussions with President Daniel arap Moi went beyond issues directly relating to the two countries. As their final communique indicated they addressed themselves to other African and international issues, especially those affecting world and regional peace and development. They reviewed the situation in southern Africa, stressing their solidarity with liberation movements waging war to end racialism and colonialism in the region. They had a word of support for Organisation of African Unity (OAU) efforts to bring harmony among African countries. They expressed their conviction that Middle East peace can only be achieved through collective effort with the inclusion of the Palestinian Liberation Organisation (PLO). And they also addressed themselves to other such issues as the Persian Gulf war, calling for its speedy end and the settlement of the conflict by peaceful means; the need to curb the spread of nuclear arms, and for a concerted international effort to see South Africa does not develop nuclear bombs; and the urgent need for a new world economic order.

Yet it was matters closer to home that took priority and had greater significance. More so the question of aggression against the two countries by Somalia which is out to take territory inhabited by people of Somali origin in the neighbouring countries. That was clear even in the communique, signed by the two leaders just as the Ethiopian head of state was just about to fly out. After relating the niceties exchanged by the leaders, the communique then directly addressed itself to the "need for their two countries to co-operate further and to co-ordinate their activities in the struggle against Somalian expansionism and the forces which have adopted hostile policies". The two heads of state also took the opportunity to repeat conditions that Somalia must meet if there is to be durable peace in the region. One, Somalia must renounce publicly and unconditionally all claims to the territories of Ethiopia, Kenya and Djibouti and declare null and void all instruments asserting such claims. Two, Somalia must openly and solemnly declare its acceptance of the principles and decisions of the UN and the OAU governing inter-state relations including the principles of the inviolability of state frontiers and non-interference in the internal affairs of other countries. Three, Somalia must, in particular, withdraw its reservation on the decision on state frontiers made by the first OAU summit conference held in Cairo in 1964. Four, Somalia must solemnly declare that it will scrupulously respect international agreements, as well as the principles of non-use of force in the settlement of international disputes, and Somalia must pay prompt and adequate reparation for the war damage she inflicted on Ethiopia during the 1977-78 Ogaden war.

The two leaders were also anxious that Somalia should not be given sustenance to continue the armed aggression on its neighbours and therefore appealed to all states providing military assistance to Somalia to stop doing so. Any such assistance, they pointed out, will provide a recipe for continued protracted conflicts in the Horn of Africa. They did not say so but it was clear the appeal also applied to the US which agreed last August to provide Somalia with $44 million in military assistance in return for the use of air and naval base of Berbera. They also noted that non-acceptance of their conditions would mean the perpetuation of the existing tension and insecurity in the area. In that case, the two leaders agreed, Ethiopia and Kenya would intensify their collaboration "to eliminate the root-cause of tension and insecurity with the view to promoting peace, security, stability and co-operation in the region."

What they meant exactly about eliminating the root-cause was not quite clear. Somalia however, saw it, as indeed it saw all the conditions put to it, as a declaration of war. And apparently the Somali leadership thought the matter was serious enough to warrant urgent attention. Somalia President Siad Mohamed Barre called an emergency joint meeting of supreme revolutionary council, the central committee of the Somali Revolutionary Party, the people's assembly (parliament) and the cabinet. According to the country's news agency Sona, the Somali leadership decided at the meeting "to mobilise all the resources of the nation towards national defence so as to make abortive the ill-intentions evident in the so-called communique."

Somalis were urged "wherever they are" to be ready for war "to defend their motherland and national soverignty." The Somali leaders were said to have "expressed deep surprise at the two countries' (Kenya and Ethiopia) complicity and deep-rooted enmity to harm the Somali people as a whole." They were also surprised by the "easiness" with which "Kenya fell prey to Abyssinian (Ethiopian) intrigues, and subsequently created in her country unwarranted instability and chaos, and at the same time invited enmity from the Somali government and people which hitherto has not existed."

Simply put, Somalia has rejected the conditions put forward by the Kenya and Ethiopian heads of state without even any consideration. Instead it has said, that it is ready for war. And further, that Kenya must now face an open war for supporting Ethiopia. ■

SOMALIA-KENYA DIALOGUE--Somali President Siad Barre wants a "brotherly dialogue" with President Moi over the shifta menace in North-Eastern Province. The Somali leader is quoted by weekly VOICE OF AFRICA as saying that the sooner this dialogue is held the better. Kenya and Ethiopia demanded, in a joint communique recently, that Somalia publicly renounce her territorial claims over the two countries. Somalia has, over the years, nurtured a dream of creating a Greater Somalia by claiming lands inhabited by Somalis. Following the communique, President Barre declared in Mogadishu that the Kenya-Ethiopia declaration meant that Somalia should be placed on a war alert. President Barre reportedly told the VOICE OF AFRICA in Amman, Jordan, on Wednesday: "We ardently desire to create sound relations with Kenya and we have made this abundantly clear to President Moi. "We have never organized armed guerrillas to invade Kenya. It is absolutely impossible and an idle dream for anybody to expect that Somalia will have territorial claims over Kenya." The Somalia leader was quoted as saying that he had adequate land "for millions of Somalis who are within the country and those who are outside." BUSES FOR TRANSPORT PROBLEM--The General Ethiopian Transport Agency, Anbessa, has imported new buses to alleviate the problem of transport services in Addis Ababa and the regions. Twenty new buses due to give service starting Monday have arrived in Addis Ababa with the measure taken to overcome the inadequate transport service prevailing in the country, Comrade Abera Gobena, the General Manager of the Agency, declared yesterday. Comrade Abera disclosed that the twenty new buses are among the fifty that will be put into service here shortly. Thirty more will be arriving after three weeks. Another 100 buses to serve in the regions will be obtained this year, the Manager reported. It was learnt that the experts of the Agency had gone to the Fiat company in Italy and had checked and reappraised the durability and fitness of the new buses. The buses have 28 seats and enough space for standing passengers. At present because of the growing number of residents in the city, buses are obliged to carry up 150 passengers tresspassing the 96-passanger-limit, thus causing early damage to the buses, Comrade Abera indicated. [as published] Comrade Abera also stated that in spite of the new buses the prevailing transport problem will not be immediately solved owing to the ever-growing population of the capital. PFP OFFICIAL VIEWS RECENT RESHUFFLE AS 'CHARADE'

Accra GHANAIAN TIMES in English 3 Dec 80 pp 1, 8

[Excerpt] Mr S. A. Odoi-Sykes, Popular Front Party Parliamentary Leader yesterday described as a "mere empty charade", the second instalment of President Hilla Limann's Cabinet reshuffle.

In a statement to the press at Parliament House in Accra, Mr Odoi-Sykes said "the second instalment of President Limann's Cabinet reshufful has deepened the confusion and speculation surrounding the objective and logic of the whole exercise. [as published]

"It looks like a mere empty charade. For it is not easy to appreciate some of the changes and new postings in the Cabinet," he said.

The statement charged that the President seemed to be responding to overwhelming external pressures in this whole business," and Ghanaians did not know and could not fathom that the initial Cabinet reshuffle was the first act in an unfolding drama. [as published]

Mr Odoi-Sykes pointed out that a Cabinet reshuffle "is not a weekly or monthly affair. It a major political exercise which is rarely executed in the life of any government after careful thought and thorough consideration.

He stressed that such reshuffles are not done in piecemeal and regular resort to it is a betrayal of apparent confusion," the statement said. [as published]

GOVERNMENT URGED TO DEAL WITH BUREAUCRACY

Accra GHANAIAN TIMES in English 6 Dec 80 p 2

[Editorial]

[Excerpt] Poverty in the midst of plenty. This is the unjustifiable plight the Ghanaian has had to go through due to inertia in certain quarters and at best our bureaucratic approach to pressing issues.

One is, therefore, bound to throw up his arms in despair now, when he hears of complaints on the evils of bureaucracy and the harm it is causing to the country.

The public has been complaining about it. The press has written volumes on the issue. Ministers have been protesting against the practice. And now the President, himself, has joined the protest team. It's like a recitation.

There must, surely, be an end to the complaints.

What the public now expects is action by the Government, itself, to eliminate the obstructionists from the system.

For, as matters stand now, the public, the press, the politicians and even high priests of human rights, stand helpless in the face of the stubborn resistance being put up by the bureaucrats.

It needs a big stick, the type which can only be wielded by the Government, to effect the desired change.

VALCO WILLINGNESS TO CORRECT MISUNDERSTANDINGS EXPRESSED

Accra GHANAIAN TIMES in English 1 Dec 80 p 8

[Article by Geoffrey Barbour and Patrick Arku-Nelson]

[Text] The Volta Aluminium Company (VALCO) is prepared to meet the Government to review any provisions of the master agreement, "if there is the need to".

Speaking at a symposium at the University of Ghana, [word illegible] last Friday on the theme 'VALCO's contribution to the economy of Ghana', Mr J. V. L. Phillips, resident manager of the company said "we, at VALCO, have demonstrated by the history of the power rate negotiation that if there is the need to review any of the contract provision in the master agreement, we will be agreeable to do so, and to the extent appropriate, VALCO will consider amending those provisions". [as published]

In this connection, Mr Phillips said VALCO had welcomed proposals made by the Volta River Authority to increase its power rate and was waiting for the authority to come forward to negotiate on this issue.

The resident manager said of late, VALCO's contribution to the economy and, even its intensions had been questioned in the media and pointed out that VALCO considered it necessary to respond in order to correct where it believed there were misunderstandings, misrepresentations or distortions.

This, he said was not because "we believe that is the best way to resolve business problems or differences, but because others have chosen that approach in preference to direct dialogue with us".

Mr Phillips challenged members of the public to come out with facts concerning any illegal dealings involving VALCO.

Touching on the Kibi bauxite project, Mr Phillips said VALCO had already submitted some proposals to the Ghana Aluminum Commission. He however, regretted that up to date VALCO had not received any response to the proposals.

In his remarks Professor K. Folson, Pro-Vice Chancellor of the University of Ghana, who chaired the symposium said at the very beginning of the signing of the agreement the late Dr K. A. Busia opposed it saying it was not in the interest of the country.

STRONG MEASURES URGED AGAINST SUBVERSION

Accra GHANAIAN TIMES in English 9 Dec 80 p 2

[Editorial]

[Text] The Government's assurance to deal firmly with any self-crowned 'revolutionary', who might want to disturb the smooth-running of affairs in the country, has set worried minds at ease.

For, it is not enough for the government to procure information about the illegal and subversive activities of some individuals and let matters rest there, but must ensure that the necessary steps are taken to nip in the bud any diabolical plans from gaining roots.

Prevention is better than cure, the wise say.

And this principle equally holds in the political life of a country.

For, it is dangerous to watch unconcerned the antics of an armed lunatic, since no one knows when he can turn what appears to be an hour of entertainment into that of grief.

Since the TIMES strongly believes in the substance of the complaints about some foreign states financing subversionists in the country, we need not remind the government on its responsibility in maintaining peace and order in the society.

We, therefore, call on the authorities not to play it soft with any trouble-shooter, who is caught in the web.

HUMAN RIGHTS ARGUMENT VIEWED AS DOUBLE-EDGED SWORD

Accra GHANAIAN TIMES in English 2 Dec 80 p 2

[Editorial]

[Text] The pontification on the concept of human rights, from both high and low quarters, has our support.

Indeed, nothing is more painful than one having his rights being trampled upon by either some one in authority or a subordinate.

But there are two sides of the coin, either of which needs not escape the attention of the champions of liberty.

For while it is wrong for an individual, presumed innocent, to have his rights violated, it is equally mischievous and harmful to society for any person or group of persons to arrogate to themselves, the right to disturb the peace of the land, through subversive activities.

When some governments in Africa, early this year, started registering their protest against Libya's involvement in their internal affairs, many Ghanaians, obviously, dismissed such protests as, perhaps, some of the old inter-state political game.

It was not until the affairs in Gambia, that political observers began to express doubts about Libya's innocence. But even there, some doubting Thomases still regarded these accusations as another political gimmick.

Then came Ghana's turn. A plot was uncovered linking Libya with a group of self-styled revolutionaries, dreaming of a bloody revolution, in which none would be spared.

There were reports of moneys paid in foreign banks and operational vehicles, at the ready, in a neighbouring country, to help execute the plans.

Revelations

There were even unconfirmed reports of some professionals, including journalists, being recruited as part of the operations.

The cynics still stood their ground, dismissing the alarming revelations as mere hallucination.

And only last week, Nigeria was also compelled to take Libya on and warn her against subversive activities on Nigerian soil.

The question now is: Who is merely crying wolf?

Are all the governments concerned--from Gambia to Nigeria--puppets of some imperialist powers, bent against any progressive moves aimed at improving the lot of the people?

Should Ghanaians wait until the dagger is on their throats, before they invoke the power of human rights to save their skin?

Where were the champions of human rights when people, who had not been tried in open courts, faced bullets at the Teshie military range?

Aren't some of these pontiffs of human rights then in high advisory places, legalizing illegal acts and issuing questionable decrees?

There might have been one or two unexpected moves in the state security's desire to maintain peace on the land.

But, surely, such trifles cannot be compared with the chaos the whole nation would be plunged into, if a few rascals were to have their way over the majority.

The sermons on human rights should continue by all means. But we will have none of it if it should only lead us to the path of doom.

BRIEFS

TUC'S LOW-KEY STANCE--The General Secretary of the Public Utility Workers Union (PUWU) Mr C. A. Adjei, has stressed here that the Trades Union Congress is not interested in confrontations with the Government. He said the congress was determined to use its power responsibly to ensure peace and progress in the country. He said most of the industrial actions embarked by workers could be attributed to sterile interpretations of collective agreements by management and added that with a little bit of ingenuity on the part of management the workers' lot could be improved. NO GDR BOYCOTT REQUESTED--The national secretariat of the Ghana-German Democratic Republic Friendship Society, has called on all peace-loving African governments to steer clear of tactics aimed at boycotting the German Democratic Republic. A statement issued in Accra by the secretariat and signed by its general secretary, Mr H. O. Nsiah drew attention to the fact that the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany had up till now, not found it prudent to respect and comply with the world-wide recognition of the existence of the two German states and had claimed responsibility for all Germans. It suggested that there should be an exchange of ambassadors between the two German states in accordance with international law to enable Germans to know and learnt to live better with one another in peace. [as published] "The whole world is aware that there exists on the soil of the former German Reich, since 1949, two independent and sovereign German states, and no fake attempts whatsoever can reverse the course of history" the statement added--GNA. NO ACP MERGER SEEN--The Action Congress Party (ACP), as it stands at the moment has not merged with any political party, Colonel F. G. Bernasko (Rtd), the leader, declared in Accra at the weekend. He said there were three schools of thought in the party: That the party should stand alone; that it should merge with the United National Convention (UNC), the Social Democratic Front (SDF) and the Third Force Party (TFP), or that it should merge with the Popular Front Party (PFP). Col Bernasko who was addressing a delegates' conference of the Greater Accra Region branch of the ACP said the executive would have to seek approval from party members before taking a final decision. MOI WARNS SOMALIA TO FORGET EXPANSIONIST AIMS

Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 19 Dec 80 pp 1, 6

[Text]

PRESIDENT Moi yesterday warned Somalia to forget its expansionist ambitions if it wants its independence to be respected.

The President said this in his address to the nation soon after his arrival at Jomo Kenyatta Airport after his four-day State visit to the Sudan.

President Moi stressed the need for good relations among African countries. The people should think of boundaries only when talking about their farms, he said.

He revealed that the communique issued at the end of his visit to the Sudan underlined the importance of true independence for all.

"We want African leaders who have no discrimination in revenge. If we want South Africa to be free while killing each other, others won't believe it," he noted.

He also said that Kenya, Ethiopia and the Sudan had agreed to hold a Ministerial meeting in Addis Ababa next year. The aim would be to ensure peace in the Horn of Africa. On food shortages, President Moi said there was no shortage but blamed it on the fast-growing population of the country.

"Since the 1977 maize boom, over 1.5 million children have been born in Kenya. Of these, only 400,000 feed on milk, while the rest feed on maizemeal," he said.

He said if Kenyans stopped breeding at such a rate, there would be no problem.

He appealed to civil servants and the Ministers to work hard and avoid wasting time.

He asked leaders to try and create more jobs for Kenyans.

The President expressed the need for more investment, giving the example of the Kenana sugar complex in the Sudan, which he said employed 15,000 people.

The President also called Kenyans to be mindful of other people's welfare.

He said hoarders were neither Nyayo followers nor mindful of others.

President Moi said he had forgiven many and asked other Kenyans to follow his example and forget the past.

The President also told wananchi to stick to their jobs and leave politics to politicians. Referring to himself as one of the most experienced politicians with 25 years and two months in politics, he said leadership came naturally and not through force.

The President also appealed to Customs officers to be serious in their duties and avoid being lured into corrupt practices.

He expressed happiness with the police force for its continued efforts of bringing law breakers to court and urged them to continue with the same spirit.

Touching on the Press, President Moi warned newspapers to report objectively and not to exaggerate stories with the only aim of selling their papers.

"I almost took one paper to court to substantiate a story about children being kidnapped at Thika," he said.

He said there was nothing wrong with being criticised as long as the criticism was constructive. But he told the newspapers to stop witch-hunting.

He said his successful tour of the Sudan would strengthen the already existing good relations with that country, adding that neighbours should always help in solving each other's problems.

He conveyed greetings from President Numeiry and the people of Sudan to Kenyans, saying he was impressed to find that the political parties of the two countries had the same goal of self-reliance.

He said the sugar industry in Kenya should be boosted so as to benefit wananchi and for export.

He said wananchi from Kenya and the Sudan would be allowed to visit each other so as to gain experience from each other.

The President appealed to the Chief of General Staff Gen. J.K. Mulinge, to choose six people to train as cadets in the Sudan since they had been offered places there.

He hailed Kenya's armed forces for their discipline and said he was proud of them

Speaking on the Kenya Airways, the President said the local pilots were quite experienced and that there were no expatriates,

"We have more than 108 qualified and experienced pilots and all we need are planes, and we are struggling to get them," he said.

He wished all Kenyans a merry Christmas and appealed to drivers to drive safely during the holidays to avoid accidents.

Explaining why beer lorries were exempted from the recent ban on lorries travelling at night, the President said the Government gets good money through tax collected from the industry and should be allowed to continue.

He also said the Nyayo children should continue taking milk and that was why KCC lorries were also exempted from the ban.

MOI VISIT TO SUDAN TERMED SUCCESSFUL

Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 19 Dec 80 p 6

[Editorial: "Control Activities of Uganda Exiles"]

[Text]

PRESIDENT Moi has returned from a successful State visit to the Sudan. Its focus of attention has been peace — in the region, on the African continent, and in the world at large.

In the joint communique issued after the State visit the issue of peace in the Indian Ocean region was stressed since this area has become embroiled in Superpower competition. It was not as important to them until after the oil crisis of 1973, which dramatically showed that the Western world could become vulnerable to a choking of the vital oil supply route through the zone.

As it attempted to beef up its own security, the Soviet Union for its part began moving security forces into the region. In this competitive situation the security interests of the nations of the region have been pretty well ignored. It is this ignoring of the needs of the area that both Heads of State have tried to reintroduce into the wide diplomatic discussions. Their view is that the issue of Somalia should be subsumed under the general review of regional security since that country is a basic cause of insecurity in the region. Significantly, Somalia was not specifically mentioned in the communique.

The results of the Ugandan elections were announced just before the visit started and the two Presidents' pledge to help in Uganda's reconstruction. Uganda itself has already stated that she will welcome the resumption of healthy relations with her immediate neighbours and one can see a situation where, in attempts to widen her diplomatic activities, she will no doubt count on her neighbours to aid her efforts. There have been occasions in the past when Ugandan exiles have used the two neighbours' facilities to continue their quarrels with their government. Now that there is an elected government and the two States are going to aid in Uganda's reconstruction, they should keep the activities of these "voluntary exiles" under control.

This decade is likely to see a diminution of foreign aid and technical assistance from the developed world to the Third World in spite of the fact that there still is room for giving relevant aid. The two leaders highlighted this problem of aid and technical assistance, pointing out that the global framework for giving aid should give the views of the Third World a hearing.

In terms of relations between Kenya, Ethiopia, and the Sudan, as expected the two leaders have agreed that there are areas of co-ordination where Ministers from the three countries could usefully meet and continue to explore ways and means of getting joint programmes off the ground and speeding the implementation of projects already agreed upon.

Beyond purely State activities, much can be done by the people in improving relations between nations. This point was recognised by the two leaders, who will be expecting their peoples to visit and get to know more about the two countries. This will in time lead to trade and other relations developing outside the State aegis.

African problems must always be solved within the context of the continent. The two leaders expressed themselves to some seemingly permanent problems on this continent ranging from Chad to South Africa. On Chad, following the general Organisation of African Unity position, they reaffirmed that the foreign troops in that troubled land should be withdrawn . Both leaders also support strongly the South-West African People's Organisation leadership in Namibia and would like to see the United Nations exert pressure on South Africa over Namibia.

Sudan is an important bridge to the Arab world and it is fitting that her good offices continue to be used to bring the African and Arab peoples closer together in the spirit of the 1977 Cairo Summit. The relations between the two peoples have been bedevilled by misunderstandings which in some respects stem from historical experiences and at times from propaganda put out by media which is not particularly interested in the problems of the two worlds. There is need for greater knowledge to be disseminated in both worlds about themselves.

As President Numeiry has been invited to visit Kenya at a future date, we hope that his visit will focus the interest of the two countries on continuing to work together on the problems which face their people.

BALANCE OF PAYMENT DEFICIT WORSENS

Nairobi THE WEEKLY REVIEW in English 12 Dec 80 pp 52, 54

[Text]

LAST Friday, the governor of the Central Bank of Kenya, Mr. Duncan Ndegwa, admitted that all is not well with the country's foreign trade situation. While addressing a gathering of members of the Kenya Institute of Bankers, Ndegwa said that the overall balance of payments situation is in deficit by shs. 1800 million. He, however, did not say how big the deficit in the current account, which determines how much can be immediately imported, is or how the worsening situation was going to be improved. He did say that the position was expected to improve by the end of the year but he did not disclose by how much. His disclosure, nevertheless, proved that the latest economic survey, released by the ministry of economic planning and development in October, was fairly accurate in predicting that the overall balance of payments deficit at the end of the year would be about shs. 2000 million. The end of the year is only three weeks away and although Ndegwa hoped the situation would improve by then, it remains doubtful whether the change will be significant enough to change the situation by much.

The economic survey had predicted that, besides the overall balance of payments deficit of about shs 2000 million or more, the deficit in the current account would be in the region of shs. 5000 million. The survey had hoped that the situation would improve with inflows of foreign investment capital and loans from international agencies and foreign governments. The worsening deficit could only point to the inadequacy of the expected foreign capital inflows to bolster the country's foreign trade situation. At least one country that had provided Kenya with balance of payments support in 1979 has not pledged to provide similar assistance for 1980.

Ndegwa's optimism appeared to be based on the hope that funds would be available from external sources based on the guarantees by the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. What Ndegwa did not say was that the balance of payments position had worsened from a surplus of £72.6 million (shs. 1,452 million) at the end of 1979 to the present £90 million (shs. 1800 million), a fall of approximately £162.6 million or shs. 3,252 million. The present position exceeds or, is comparable to a deficit of £81.5 million in 1978 (shs. 1,630 million) which was then considered ominous and led to the application of import deposits. The surplus of 1979 is attributed to the effect of import deposits, which operated, as it were, to reduce the amount of available finances which would have been used for imports. For some still unexplained reason, the import deposits have not proved much of a deterrent in 1980 and, will soon lose most of their effect since the Central Bank has recently embarked on a policy of refunding them before their maturity dates.

The worsening deficit seems to have been aggravated by the government's inability to control imports of less than shs. 4,000 in value. The minister for commerce, Mr. Eliud Mwamunga, admitted only two weeks ago that numerous consignments of imports, each under the value of shs. 4,000, had flooded the market and were seriously undermining local industries. The government had therefore decided to withdraw the concession which allowed importers to import such consignments of goods without having to apply for import licences. The move was explained at the time, by the ministry of commerce, as motivated by the government's desire to end widespread abuse in import control procedures. The ministry of commerce did not mention that the poor condition of the balance of payments was an instrumental factor in the decision to withdraw the concession.

Signs that something is wrong in the country's foreign trade sector became apparent over a month ago when licences for the importation of tyres were reported cancelled by the Central Bank after they had been approved by the ministry of commerce.

The Central Bank maintained silence over the issue, a silence which only led to more speculation that the government was slowly applying brakes on the flow of imports. The reality, as it later turned out, was that the Central Bank was taking longer to process applications for import licences, delays which had the effect of imposing restrictions on imports.

Only last week, the Central Bank withdrew another concession in a move that was once more viewed as intended to improve the foreign exchange situation. According to the Central Bank's latest move, residents of Uganda and Tanzania are no longer permitted to take out of Kenya personal effects of any value without satisfying the Central Bank that the goods have been paid for in foreign currency. Failing that, the Central Bank will demand that the intending exporter produces an irrevocable letter of credit.

Whatever happens, signs about to indicate that 1980 will end, for the Kenya economy, true to the worst predictions of planners.

LABOR MINISTER REITERATES SUPPORT FOR KENYANIZATION

Nairobi THE WEEKLY REVIEW in English 5 Dec 80 p 42

[Text]

LAST week's charges by Kenya's minister for labour, Mr. Titus Mbathi, against detractors of the government's policy of Kenyanisation is yet another assurance that the government intends to fulfil its obligations of Kenyanisation. Many government officials have sounded the same sentiments in the past, but when he addressed a Kenya National Chamber of Commerce luncheon in Nairobi last Friday, Mbathi was also appealing for help — he requested the chamber's assistance in discouraging the practice by some local businessmen of selling trade licenses given to them by the government, to expatriate traders. Despite the sensitivity of the expatriate issue, which has lately acquired political overtones, Mbathi maintained that the whole business community must abide by the set legal rules whatever their nationality.

Even before Mbathi denounced the acquisition of trade licenses by non-citizens traders, the ministry of commerce also had its score to settle with illegal holders of retail and wholesale trade licences or holders of both. The minister of commerce, Mr. Eliud Mwamunga, called it routine administrative exercise but in effect it will be the scrutiny of some trade licences. Those illegally possessed may even be withdrawn by the end of the exercise in January next year. Both the remarks by Mbathi and the revocation of retail and wholesale licenses by Mwamunga seem to be prompted by the government's current concern about the reported widespread illegal importation of goods.

The on-going battle against non-citizen traders and expatriates probably intensified in January this year when the then minister for home affairs, Mr. Stanely Oloitipitip, warned that his ministry would be stringent in processing applications for work permits for non-citizens in the country. As expected, the minister's statements received widespread support notably from the Central Organisation of Trade Unions (Cotu) and the Kenya Management Staff Association whose secretary general, Mr. Walter Adell, had been engaged in an anti-expatriates crusade. Cotu also issued a statement claiming that some 90 per cent of the estimated 15,000 expatriates in the country played no useful role in the economy.

In the current debate on Kenyanisation, there seems to a general agreement that the undesirable expatriate personnel and alien businessmen have all to go except for those expatriates engaged in "highly specialised scientific and technical jobs" who may stay. With Kenya's modern-employment sector reportedly lagging behind both in the rate of growth of the labour force and wage increases, pressure is mounting for the government from an estimated 45 per cent of the modern sector employment force concentrated in urban areas. Consequently, the government's task presently is not to redefine its Kenyanisation policy but to sort out desirable expatriate personnel from the 15,000 tally, and it seems that is why Mbathi is asking for assistance. ■

MOI ORDERS NATIONAL YOUTH SERVICE

Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 13 Dec 80 pp 1, 6

[Text]

PRESIDENT Moi yesterday announced the introduction of one year's compulsory national service for all Form Six leavers, starting in 1982.

Addressing the nation from Jamhuri Park, Nairobi, the President said amid cheers: "This will be compulsory but in no way punitive.

"It will be designed to inspire and to educate young people in realities, and the Government will accept responsibility in terms of providing pocket money throughout the period of service."

National service, he said, would be a prerequisite to entering university, other institutions of higher learning or direct employment.

President Moi stressed that the scheme was being introduced to assist in shaping and developing a responsible generation.

"The preparation of the youth must be related to character. We will be primarily concerned with the fashioning of character," he said.

He stressed that it would be essential for the young men and women eligible to do their best while in the service, whatever the job or place they were serving in, since good performance would be "a requirement for entry into the university or any other institution of higher learning".

Regular reports would be written by service supervisors and such reports, just as much as academic results, would influence careers, the President announced.

He said details of the scheme would be announced later.

The scheme will affect the students who are completing Form Five this year.

The President vowed that Kenya would use whatever measures necessary to protect her territorial integrity and nationhood and reminded every Kenyan: "We did not fight for the right to be masters of our own soil so that we could give some of that soil away to others."

President Moi was referring to recent skirmishes in North-Eastern Province, where, he said, "we witnessed some efforts by a few people to create an internal problem".

The President called on all wananchi to assist in bringing about everlasting peace and stability by reporting divisive elements they detected in their midst.

The President's message also highlighted the need:

- to continue the war against tribalism,
- to remould local traditions and blend them with national ideals.
- to work ceaselessly towards self-sufficiency.
- to involve the country's youth (60 per cent of population) in national development.
- to use past experience to plan for a better future.

The full text of the speech:

ON this 16th anniversary of Jamburi, I send my warm greetings to all Kenyans here at home and those abroad. I wish you all, and your families, well as we celebrate this important National Day — the day when we became a completely independent sovereign state.

I also take this early opportunity to thank all those friends of Kenya who have sent us such warm messages of congratulations and good wishes. It is pleasing and heartening to see so many friends take such a direct and keen interest in our country's national activities and development.

My brethren, there has been a great deal of material development throughout our republic since I addressed the nation during last year's Jamburi Day celebrations. For example, the rural areas have drawn benefit from research programmes and more efficient arrangements for agricultural credit. There have been new roads in some places, and extensions to hospitals or schools.

Increase

Efforts to increase employment opportunities have been stepped up in agriculture, factories and businesses. However, and as related to the longer-term future of our nation, it seems to me that the most important development, over the 12 months under review, has been a deliberate re-shaping of national outlook and character.

In order to strengthen nationhood, in its most meaningful form, and to ensure that development is vigorously promoted for the benefit of all Kenyans, we must constantly be ready to learn from experience. I have said before that the future destiny of our republic will be whatever we make it to be. But this future has to be built upon foundations of the past, which we ourselves have now designed and controlled for the last seventeen years. After this length of time, we should be able to see many ideas or approaches in their proper perspective. We should be able to carefully measure the vitality of some, and the weakness of others. It should be recognised as well that not only our own experience has been important. Many lessons have emerged, and indeed are still taking shape, from observation of events and policies in a number of other developing countries.

From all this experience we have come to see very clearly, as one example, the critical need for working towards self-sufficiency in such areas as basic food supply and competent manpower. It has also become abundantly evident that effective Government must, in every sense, be a popular Government — rooted in the genuine mandate of the people, and then sustaining a close relationship with the people through insistence on telling the truth about all problems and realities. But above all, the most absolute lesson springing from all sources of experience, has pointed to the critical importance of national unity.

This brings me back, directly, to the point I made earlier about re-moulding of national character. This past year has borne witness to the determination, by the people of Kenya, to abolish tribalism and resolutely oppose divisive elements. Following the last Leaders' Conference at the Kenya Institute of Administration, very significant steps have been taken to de-emphasise the tangible or emotional influences of tribalism within all aspects of national life, reaching from politics and economics right down towards sporting and social activities. The impetus in all this has been that of a mass impulse, a popular movement, and its impact must be regarded as profound. I feel extremely encouraged by this mass enthusiasm.

We can think back to illustrations at least of threat in Kenya, and there are living examples today in certain other states, proving that tribalism may quickly undermine — or be used to undermine — political stability and consequently the critical foundation of national unity. And as you all know, without unity and stability, there can only be insecurity and human suffering, while all development plans and efforts are thrown into total disarray. It is therefore important that this popular movement must continue, quite relentlessly, until tribalism — as a force in Kenya — is something that can barely be recalled.

But let me make one thing, which should be obvious to each one of us, perfectly clear. Nobody is seeking to rob any man of his birthright and culture. None of us decided, as a personal choice, to be born a Luo or Kikuyu, a Kamba or a Kalenjin, a Baluhya or Giriama or Masai.

As children, we were all first instructed in the language and the culture of the tribe in which we happened to be born. In later life, our natures and ambitions have, of course, been influenced by particular traditions and values. Most of us understand that fundamental roots and codes of conduct are positive elements of human dignity. Moreover, we know that the whole diversity of such traditions and values, with the range of talents that they sponsor, can bring to bear upon national development a vitality that might otherwise be lacking.

But what the present popular movement has wisely acknowledged is that respect for historical backgrounds, and for language or culture, does not mean, in the Kenya of today and the years to come, that everyday lives should be favoured by tribal considerations. All of us now, first and foremost, are Kenyans. Traditions and values associated with particular communities only make sense today within the framework of a Kenyan nationality, and when applied to the development and welfare of our nationhood.

This is why even more effort must henceforth be made, by every separate community, to assume and promote national traditions and values, identifying then the richness and dignity of each separate culture with broader attributes which all can share and which our children will inherit.

As you will all remember, my last ceremonial address to the nation was on Kenyatta Day, less than two months ago. On that occasion, I explained to you the role of Government in promoting and guiding national development. I also touched upon some of the ways in which economic independence might more rapidly be secured. Today, as an important theme, I want to say something about the preparation of our younger men and women so that they can play their proper and ultimate part in the progress and the destiny of Kenya.

Comments

Many statements and comments have recently been made, and more will be necessary, about impacts of the continuing rapid increase in our country's population. But at this moment, I wish to lay stress upon the factor that, with every passing year, our population is becoming more youthful in its composition. Following every census, it is always very revealing to look at the figures related to age-structure. At this present time, for example, young men and women below the age of eighteen make up about sixty per cent of Kenya's total population. And if I may remind you, this means that a very high proportion of our population, consisting of these young people, were not born when we achieved Madaraka in 1963.

Such a high proportion of young people has many implications in terms of national planning and prospect, some of them worrying and some of them hopeful. But the most important conclusion — or challenge — is that young men and women must be properly prepared for their present place and ultimate function for their role in national development. Many efforts towards this objective continue to be made. But I am convinced that — as a nation — we are still not doing enough. Youth must become more actively involved now in everyday activities, reaching into all sectors of our economy and social fabric. In the past and following our traditions and values, which I was discussing earlier, young people were given specific responsibilities in the affairs of their communities and societies. Today, we cannot afford to see young people sitting back, waiting for their parents or elder brothers to do all the work. Each one of us must play some part in the constructive affairs of the nation.

When I talk of preparing the youth for present tasks and future leadership, this cannot simply be related to formal basic education. There is a great deal to learn, and to grasp, outside the formal academic field. And it is equally true that there is much more to preparation of the youth than projects of vocational training. In addition to these efforts, we should help and encourage young people to know their country, its people, its wealth and limitations in the field of natural resources, and so on. Moreover, we should instil at least some understanding of how economic planning is approached, and the impacts of technology on economic prospect for our younger people to develop confidence in their ability to tackle and overcome the many problems that will be identified in the struggle for more rapid development.

Above all, preparation of the youth must be related to character. And in the moulding of character, the most important elements are self-reliance, self-respect and discipline. With this entire and vital truth in mind, I have decided that, with effect from 1982, all young men and women who complete Form Six, will first undertake a full year of National Service before going to the University, other institutions of higher learning or direct employment. This will be compulsory, but, of course, the system will be in no way punitive. Instead, it will be designed to inspire, and to educate young people in realities, and the Government will accept a responsibility in terms of providing pocket money throughout the period of service.

The actual details of the scheme and the arrangements to be made will be announced in the near future. But let me stress that it will become essential, for the young men and women concerned, to do their best while engaged upon National Service, in whatever job or place, since good performance will be a requirement for entry into the university or other institution of higher learning. Regular reports will be written by the Service supervisors, and such reports, just as much as academic results, must influence evolving careers.

We will be primarily concerned with the fashioning of character. The nation must recognise that there is a positive responsibility to broaden the horizons of young people in this way by putting them into direct contact with our peoples needs, and problems to be faced in meeting those needs. So I want to say emphatically that this policy and programme of National Service will in no sense be a waste of time. I sincerely believe that practical service, in the cause of the nation and people, will give our young men the kind of preparation really needed to derive maximum benefit from subsequent forms of higher education and training. It will help them to mature more rapidly to appreciate that young people do not, after all, have a monopoly of wisdom, and to realise the worth of humility as opposed to false values of arrogance. Moreover, they will experience the satisfaction of getting to creative grips with some urgent tasks, such as adult education, improving the standards in Harambee schools, or in whatever fields of effort they are selected.

Integrity

My dear Kenyans, I want to end th address on another subject of gre importance to us. This is the quest o f territorial integrity and interna stability. Recently, we have witnesse some efforts by a few people to creat internal problem in one of ou provinces, the North-Eastern Province. I want everyone, both in Kenya and outside, to know that we did not fight for the right to be masters of our own soil so that we could give some of that soil away to others.

We shall use whatever measures are necessary to protect the territorial integrity of our nation. In saying that, I would like to add that we in Kenya, want to live in peace with our neighbours and on the basis of positive good neighbourliness. We expect other countries to respect that spirit, and not encourage any disgruntled elements to create difficulties hoping that an area of Kenya could be seized.

And to my dear countrymen, I end my address by asking each one of you to be always watchful, and to report to the authorities anyone who is engaged in anti-social activities — be it stealing, smuggling or spreading rumours and propaganda aimed at dividing the people. We must always move forward on the basis of the conviction which we have upheld from the very beginning, that is, "unity is strength", and that with unity we shall overcome all our problems. ●

JAPANESE AID FOR AIRPORT--Lilongwe--The Minister of Finance, Mr. Louis Chimango, has thanked the Japanese Government for providing Malawi with an additional loan of approximately K 1.5 million for the completion of the Kamuzu International Airport now under construction in Lilongwe. The Minister was speaking after he and the Japanese Ambassador to Malawi, Mr. Senkuro Saiki, exchanged notes at a Ministry of Finance headquarters ceremony on Thursday. The exchange of notes precedes the actual signing of the loan agreement between the Malawi Government and the Overseas Economic Cooperation Fund of Japan, scheduled to take place in Tokyo, Japan, on December 11. Thanking the Japanese Government for their continued assistance in the development of this country, Mr. Chimango recalled that in 1978 Japan provided Malawi with a loan of approximately K 18 million for the Kamuzu International Airport project. The Minister assured the Ambassador that the Government and people of Malawi were extremely grateful to the people and Government of Japan for converting this K 18 million loan into a grant last year. "The additional funds you are providing will ensure the completion of the airport on schedule, by September, 1981 at the latest," Mr. Chimango told the Ambassador. The Minister also thanked the Japanese Government for sending to Malawi technicians, nurses and teachers whose contribtuion to the national development, he said, was quite significant. COMMENTARIES ON HOLDING OF SPPF CONGRESS

'Vital' Decisions Expected

Victoria NATION in English 6 Dec 80 p 1

[Editorial]

[Text] The Seychelles People's Progressive Front will be holding its 2nd annual Congress next week, beginning at 4 p.m. on Wednesday.

Just as at the first congress in November last year and at extraordinary ones called for certain specific purposes, the decisions taken at next week's meeting are of vital importance for the whole country and nation. They are important because they are decisions taken by the Seychellois people for their own future and that of their own country.

Before Liberation, national policies were set either in the interests of the colonial masters or in those of the ruling capitalist class. The revolution of June 5th 1977 reversed this situation and placed the working people in power. In other words, from being the underdogs it is the workers who are now the ruling class and everything revolves around the interest of the people.

The struggle to liberate our country and to establish workers power--spearheaded by the Seychelles People's United Party (SPUP)--was not easy, as we all know, but our perseverance and the conviction of the justice of our cause finally paid off. That victory, however, was not the end of the struggle.

We had to consolidate what had been gained and build for the future. Thus the Seychelles People's Progressive Front--in the words of one of the resolutions passed at the Congress that saw its birth--"replaced the SPUP not because of its failure, but on the contrary because of its success in the role it has played and its passing away is a condition for eternal success."

The SPPF therefore was born after reflections following 14 years of struggle and out of the spirit of justice, brotherhood and equality. It was formed to create the necessary structures which would enable the working people to decide their own future, to build the type of society which they want, and to establish and promote national unity.

To achieve this aim, the SPPF set up branches all over the Republic and formed the National Workers Union, the Seychelles Women's Association and the National Youth Movement.

Representatives of all the branches and all three national organisations sit together with the Front's Central Executive Committee to form the Congress, which is the supreme policy-making body of the land. Thus the decisions that come down from the Congress are those of the representatives of the people at all levels of our society.

They are the decisions of the true people of this country, and not--as we knew before--those of MPs who were elected as so-called representatives of the people through the backing of a party machine and the power of money, and who knew only during an election campaign that the people existed.

Importance of Meeting

Victoria NATION in English 17 Dec 80 p 1

[Editorial]

[Text] The People's Assembly will be holding its last meeting for this year on December 24.

This will be an important meeting, as always, but much more so in that a whole package of Bills will be put before the House for enactment into law.

This will probably be the first time in the history of Seychelles that such a large number of laws are instituted during one sitting of the Assembly.

The media have already elaborated some of the laws intended for our country, and the public--through their SPPF branches and in discussions with the leaders who represent them--have come to know about some of the other items of legislation that will be debated before being executively enshrined into the country's Book of Laws.

Laws are established in a country for the preservation of order and for the benefit of the people. Some popular laws may be regarded by some as controversial, but what is important is that they are always in the interest of the majority.

In some countries, a few at the top decide which laws to adopt, but in our country, after a Bill is published, it is explained in detail by the media and discussed by the branches, which mandate the members on how to vote. If need be, the voting on a Bill may be put off for more discussion with the people through the branches.

In this connection, it is naturally popular laws--laws that will benefit Seychelles for a better Seychelles--that we shall inherit after careful and serious deliberation by the people.

The people's wishes stand imperative and supreme!

STEADY IMPROVEMENT OF LIVING STANDARDS NOTED

Victoria NATION in English 4 Dec 80 pp 1, 2

[Text] The living standards of the Seychellois people are now being steadily improved through a range of self-help projects set up by the Rural Development Group. The Group, formed two years ago, has just drawn up a report outlining its work in the planning and construction of several schemes aimed at improving community facilities.

Important projects for the future are also described, for which funds are now being sought.

The Rural Development Group acts as a link between Government and the Seychelles People's Progressive Front branches in carrying out schemes that will benefit local communities.

Chaired by Mr. Ralph Adam, Principal Secretary for Youth and Community Development, and comprising Government experts in various fields, the SPPF Chief Co-ordinator and volunteer workers, the Group meets monthly to work out a plan of action for self-help projects based on requests from local people channelled through the branches.

Finance is then arranged with the help of non-governmental organisations, whether local or foreign, and the actual construction work is done, as far as possible by the people living in the communities themselves.

Several small-scale schemes to give people a good supply of water are now being prepared by the Group, and work on one of them, at Les Cannelles, is expected to start in the next two months.

At Takamaka and Pointe au Sel projects have been approved by the Water Division and are being submitted for funding. Total aid for these two schemes will be about R. 320,000.

Plans for a small reservoir at Capucin are also going ahead. Though the land here is steep, making it difficult to bring materials to the site, there seem to be no major problems and funds are now being sought. A rough estimate of the cost of building the reservoir and laying pipes is R. 250,000.

Funds have already been received from an Irish body, Trocaire, for a water project in the Dame Le Roi/Anse Gaulettes area.

In the health field, the Rural Development Group has studied proposals for around four health-related projects on Praslin and these have been submitted by the Volontaires du Progrès to be financed with French co-operation. Also on Praslin the Anse Kerlan community centre is expected to be finished this month.

It has proved more difficult for the Group to plan new roads because of their high cost--they are much more expensive that water schemes. Funds are still being sought to complete or begin the following roads: Les Mamelles/La Louise; Beau Vallon/L'Abattie; Bel Ombre/Danzilles; Anse Louis/La Salette and Thompson Lane.

The review of activities says that the Group will need to take on more members in future. Since many community projects need planning permission, it is suggested that there should be a member from Physical Planning. The Roads Division and the Ministry of Education and Information should also be represented, it adds.

The Rural Development Group is currently made up of: Mr. Ralph Adam; Mrs. S. Frichot (Chief Co-ordinator SPPF); Miss G. Figaro (Community Development Officer); Mr. S. Shrotriya (Community Development Planning Officer); Dr. Chetty (Health Department); Mr. P. Lablache (Lands Division); Mr. R. Chang Tave (Survey Division); Mr. C. Elizabeth (Water Division); Mr. F. Payet (volunteer adviser in roads for South Mahé); Mr. J. Darcel (Volontaire du Progrès); P. Maréchal (Secretary, NGO Co-ordinating Committee); Mr. P. Haas (Volontaire du Progrès based on Praslin); Mr. E. Faure (Secretary).

PEOPLE'S DEFENCE FORCE PLANNED TO SAFEGUARD REVOLUTION

Victoria NATION in English 11 Dec 80 pp 1, 2

[Text] Two Bills aimed at setting up a combined defence force in Seychelles and regulating its dicipline were explained to members of the SPPF branches and members of the National Assembly at National House on Tuesday by the Defence Minister, Mr. Ogilvy Berlouis. [as published]

The Defence Bill 1980 and the Defence Force (Offences) Bill 1980 will be tabled at the Peoples' Assembly on December 24.

The Defence Bill provides for the defence of Seychelles and proposes to establish the Seychelles People's Defence Force, which will consist of the Seychelles People's Liberation Army, the Seychelles People's Navy, the Seychelles People's Air Force and the Seychelles People's Militia.

The army, the navy and the air force will each have a regular and a reserve force serving under terms and conditions of service established in the Act, if approved by the Assembly.

The Defence Bill describes the function of the Defence Force in the defence of the Republic and outlines its role in helping the civil authorities carry out their task and in the fulfilment by Seychelles of its international obligations.

The Bill sets out the ranks, functions, responsibilities and duties of the members of the Defence Force. It establishes the Head of State as Commander-in-Chief of the Defence Force with power, if the need arises, to call other disciplinary forces (for example the police force) to defence duties.

The Minister responsible for defence is designated as Chief of the Defence Force, while the Chief of Staff of the Defence Force is appointed by the Commander-in-Chief.

The Defence Bill also provides for the setting-up of a Defence Council, which will advise the Commander-in-Chief.

The Defence Force (Offences) Bill 1980 defines various offences contrary to regulations and provides for trial and punishment for those offences. Serious offences will be brought before a court-martial and disciplinary offences will be dealt with by disciplinary officers.

"The functions and performances of some units of the defence force which have been in existence since Liberation Day 1977, have provided much information to assist in the drafting of the two Bills," Minister Berlouis told the meeting.

"It has taken us over three years to present the two Bills because we wanted regulations that are adapted to Seychelles needs. They have been drafted to allow for easy management of the defence force while maintaining order and discipline in it".

Many questions followed the Minister's outline of the proposed Act, particularly concerning discipline in the force.

MINISTERS TO ATTEND CUBAN CP CONGRESS

[Text] Seychelles will be represented at the 22nd Congress of the Cuban Communist Party in Havana from December 17 to 20 by two Government ministers who both left the Republic at the weekend.

They are the Minister for Planning and Development, Dr. Maxime Ferrari, and the Minister for Transport and Tourism, Mr. Matthew Servina.

On his way to and from the Congress, Minister Ferrari will call on the Spanish Minister of Fisheries to hold discussions.

Minister Servina will hold talks in Madrid with the Spanish Ministry of Tourism and in Rome with officials of the Alitalia airline company.

In Cuba, both ministers will participate actively in the different programmes of visits to various Cuban development projects organised for the Congress, and Minister Ferrari will sign an agreement between the Seychelles People's Progressive Front and Cuban Community Party.

Minister Ferrari's interest will be centred around the boat, fishing and tobacco industries, projects in which Cuba has made much progress.

Another Government officer who left the Republic at the weekend was Mr. Jeremie Bonnelame, Principal Secretary for Foreign Affairs. He will take part in a meeting of the Organisation of African Unity standing committee for the liberation of the African continent that has opened in Dar-es-Salaam, Tanzania.

At the meeting, which will go on until Thursday, Mr. Bonnelame will present a paper on the delonisation of the African continent on behalf of Seychelles. [as published]

OILMEN 'OPTIMISTIC' AS SECOND WELL GOES AHEAD

Victoria NATION in English 2 Dec 80 p 1

[Text] Though the first attempt to find oil in Seychelles has failed, drilling of a second well has begun and the exploration company remains optimistic.

A progress report from Amoco (Seychelles) Ltd. says that the drillship Diamond M. Dragon has finished its test drilling of the Owen Bank No 1 well and has started on a second one--the Reith Bank No. 1--24 kilometres nearer to Mahé and about 50 metres below the water surface.

"Although the oil bonanza hoped for on the first well was not found," the report says, "the information gained from examination of samples has been very useful in interpreting the seismic data that was previously obtained from seismic shooting over the area earlier this year."

The company met some difficulty in setting the initial 75 centimetre surface casing due to the structure of the top-surface rock formations, and the ship had to be moved twice before a satisfactory setting could be obtained.

These initial problems have been overcome, however, and with the drill bit now at a depth of over 400 metres and work progressing well, the report ends on this optimistic note:

"Amoco" enthusiasm for an oil discovery continues as ever before because the right conditions for the creation and entrapment of oil could well exist in any of the prospects in the Agreement Area, even though a tremendous investment is necessary.

"The cost of the Owen Bank well No. 1 was over US $14,000,000 due to difficulties of drilling in such a highly exploratory environment. With such high costs involved, the company takes a very serious attitude towards its operation and has now transferred to Seychelles the engineer who was previously assigned as drilling manager for Amoco operations in the North Sea."

COMMONWEALTH OBSERVERS' INTERIM REPORT ON ELECTIONS

Kampala WEEKLY TOPIC in English 19 Dec 80 pp 4, 9

[Text] It is unique in the annals of democracy for a soveriegn nation to invite an international group to observe its national elections and report whether they were free and fair. Our role, which was endorsed by all four political parties, is without precedent. The response of the people of Uganda to our presence has been heart-warming.

2. No assessment of this election would be valid which did not take full account of the prevailing situation in Uganda and its recent history. A general election makes large demands on a country's financial, administrative and manpower resources, as well as accentuating strains within the body politic. To conduct such an exercise against the background of a shattered economy, an enfeebled and disrupted administrative infrastructure, continuing security problems and a social fabric stretched to the limits of endurance by eight years of brutal oppression and incalculable human tragedy would be a daunting enterprise for any country. Uganda's dilemma has been whether to wait for better and more settled times before holding an election or to hold an election as an essential first step towards national rehabilitation. Its choice has been an act of faith deserving of the world's sympathy and understanding.

3. Clearly, in the circumstances of Uganda, a degree of imperfection and administrative confusion were only to be expected in the electoral process, being inherent in the overall situation. These have been compounded, in our view, by the very short period of time within which important phases of the electoral process have had to be carried out.

4. Compiling an accurate national electoral roll is a formidable undertaking for all developing countries. Where the period required in other states has been months and even years, Uganda sought to accomplish it in little more than a fortnight. Deficiencies were thus inevitable: what is surprising is the extent to which the effort succeeded. In large parts of the country the registers of voters have been of an acceptable standard. Nevertheless, there has been an insistent pattern of complaints from a number of constituencies that the provisional registers were not publicly displayed as required by the law, denying those aggrieved an opportunity to file objections or seek legal remedy. Our own observations have revealed errors and omissions which could have been rectified if the procedures enjoined had been followed strictly and more time provided to deal with complaints. How much of this stemmed from deliberate bias as distinct from administrative inefficiency is hard to say: significantly, all the political parties felt their interests threatened in varying degree. It is even more difficult to estimate the overall magnitude of the errors. According to the evidence at our disposal, however, they are likely to have an impact, if at all, only in a small minority of constituencies, primarily in the South Western part of the country.

5. No single issue has bedevilled this election more than that of nominations. Because of its potential impact on the political arithmetic of the outcome, the unopposed return of candidates from as many as 17 out of 126 constituencies was bound to cause concern. That they belonged to one party only heightened the suspicions and doubts of the others. It is therefore necessary to deal with the nominations question in some detail.

6. In a number of cases, prospective candidates were denied nominations because of their failure to produce the necessary educational and language certificates. As this was a technical requirement of the law, irrespective of the status of the nominee, no further comment need be made at this stage.

7. In a number of others, prospective candidates were disqualified because of late arrival or a failure to show up at all. The parties concerned complained that they had either been detained or forcibly prevented from presenting themselves. With one exception, we failed to receive any response from the authorities to whom we referred these allegations. We note, however, that only the candidates of one party appear to have experienced no security or other difficulties on their way to the nomination centres.

8. In the case of the five unopposed returns from the West Nile District of Arua, the critical factor was a failure to produce the necessary income tax clearance certificates. The Electoral Commission confirmed to us that it had verbally granted a temporary deferment to the candidates, who, in the event, were disqualified by the Returning Officer. We are unable to ascertain under what legal authority the Electoral Commission was competent to grant such a deferment. Its advice, however well-intentioned, proved fatal to the interests of the party concerned.

9. There have been, in all, a total of six unopposed returns from the West Nile Districts of Arua and Moyo. Leaving aside the question of income tax clearance certificates to which we have already referred, it was urged before us that all nominations in these two districts were void ab initio by virtue of section 20 of the National Assembly (Elections) Act 1957, which requires every nomination to be proposed, seconded and supported in writing by a total of at least twelve voters registered in the constituency. Having regard to the fact that under Ugandan law the decision of a Returning Officer is final and can only be challenged in the High Court, it is not for us to pronounce on the legal issues involved. Nevertheless, we wish to place on record that we have satisfied ourselves, as the result of a visit to Arua by some members of the Group that no register of voters existed in the form required; that invasion and a disturbed security situation brought registration to an abrupt halt within a day or two of its commencement, and that Arua District at the time of their visit was overwhelmingly depopulated.

10. In Kasese District, all three candidates of one party whose nominations had been formally notified many days earlier were peremptorily disqualified by the Electoral Commission on 8 December, 1980 less than two days before polling commenced. According to the Commission, the reason for its intervention was that these particular nominations had been filed after 12 noon on 23 November. Immediate inquiries on the spot by members of the Group established to our satisfaction that the nominations had in fact been lodged in time. Our urgent efforts to secure redress proved of no avail.

11. Viewing the matter in its totality, and after making due allowance for the superior organisation of the party securing all the unopposed returns, the Group cannot avoid a feeling of deep unease.

12. One of our principal concerns has been to see whether there has been freedom of movement and expression during the election campaign. We have been impressed by the political awareness of the people of Uganda. Transcending all their differences has been an overriding concern that this election should mark a turning point in Uganda's history, ushering in peace, stability and economic progress

13. We have been impressed, too, by the sober and constructive attitude of all the party leaders. Intimidation or coercion has not been a significant factor in this election and, outside parts of West Nile, no party has experienced undue difficulty in being able to campaign freely throughout the country. There has been some violence, but overall at a much lower level than we would have expected in the circumstances of an anxious population and an abundance of arms. In the main, the campaign itself has been vigorous, free and open with many party newspapers canvassing all shades of political opinion. This has been supplemented by the strong oral tradition of Ugandan society, with each party relying on the bush telegraph to transmit its message and mobilise support. Although the publicly-owned media have not been as even-handed as would have been desirable, we are satisfied that all the parties have been given reasonable opportunity to present their case to the electorate and to solicit its support.

14. The Group has taken a close interest in every aspect of polling procedures and, at its instance, all four parties have been associated by the Electoral Commission with arrangements for the distribution of election material to the polling stations. There have been acute logistical difficultires on account of a shortage of vehicles and fuel, resulting in disruption and considerable delays in various parts of the country on polling day. [as published] These are likely to have affected all parties.

15. In the capital city of Kampala, however, polling arrangements have been seriously marred by inordinate and inexcusable delays. In a number of stations, polling had not commenced till late in the afternoon, and in some not even at the scheduled hour of closure. It would be difficult to believe that this has been wholly the result of mere incompetence.

16. The period fixed for the poll ended in confusion. In the afternoon a radio announcement by the Electoral Commission extended the poll till 2 p.m. on 11 December and officials were instructed to sleep overnight with their ballot boxes even where polling was complete and without being offered adequate security. We were beseiged by telephone calls from fearful polling staff, party agents and an irate and suspicious electorate, but our observations so far this morning suggest that the evening may have passed without major problems. In many parts of the country, counting had already commenced on 10 December in ignorance of the Electoral Commission's announcement.

17. In all the circumstances, the polling arrangements outside Kampala appear to have been adequate, with commendable efficiency evident in many constituencies. The poll itself has proceeded smoothly once the balloting materials arrived. The pervasive presence of party agents from start to finish, the spirit of cooperation among them, and the procedure for counting of ballots at each polling station on the conclusion of the poll have sustained and reinforced the confidence of the parties and the electorate in the essential fairness of the process. The last-minute extension of the poll has, of course, introduced a new factor whose full effects on the count we are not yet in a position to assess.

18. We appreciate the positive measures taken by the Chairman of the Military Commission to remove roadblocks and confine the military to barracks. Apart from facilitating access to the polls, they greatly enhanced the psychological atmosphere in which polling took place. We commend the Ugandan Police for their contribution to the success achieved.

19. If this election has in a sense been a striving for the impossible, the degree to which it has succeeded must primarily be attributed to the people of Uganda. The remarkably high turn-out of voters, their enthusiastic but orderly behaviour, and their palpable wish to be masters of their destiny constitute a great act of affirmation in the democratic process.

20. The Group as a whole is continuing to monitor the count and our final view must be contingent on how it is conducted and how ballot boxes were stored overnight. At this stage, however, despite the imperfections and deficiencies to which we have drawn attention, and subject to the concern expressed on the question of nominations and unopposed returns, we believe this has been a valid electoral exercise which should broadly reflect the freely-expressed choice of the people of Uganda.

CP PUBLICITY SECRETARY LOSES POST FOR PRO-OBOTE STATEMENT

Kampala THE ECONOMY in English 22 Dec 80 p 2

[Text] Before consulting the executive committee of the Conservative Party, Mr. Katenta Apuli issued a statement which has resulted into losing his post as Publicity Secretary of CP.

Recently Mr. Katenta passed announcements on Radio on behalf of CP, congratulating President Obote for attaining the high office in the land and urged him to implement the UPC policies and further assured the President that CP is behind him. This is contrary to what the CP is standing for. The CP strictly and jealously upholds its party policies which are totally opposed to those of UPC.

In Katenta's message to the President, he implied that CP is totally and wholly supporting UPC and goes to the extent of begging for a ministerial post in the UPC government. This, the executive of CP does not favour and they want to try again in the next general election if voted in power to implement their party policies. As such the CP supports the government but will be happier if the time came for them to implement theirs.

So the executive of the Conservative party has decided to relieve Mr. Katenta of his responsibility as a speaker of the party but may remain as a member of the executive until the annual delegates conference next year. Mr. Henry Kyeyune is now the acting Publicity Officer, assisted by Mr. Denis Rwabona and Mr. Bukaberwa of Makerere University.

DEMOCRATIC SPLIT SAID 'CONFIRMED' BY 42 CROSSOVERS

Kampala UGANDA TIMES in English 3 Dec 80 pp 1, 3, 8

[Article by Ilakut Ben Bella]

[Excerpt] The top DP man Bunyoro has joined UPC, only a week before elections next Wednesday.

Mr Kanagwa Akiiki, a DP candidate in Hoima, and the organising secretary, said he had quit the party because of infighting, factionalism and lack of leadership.

Surrendering his membership card together with 42 other DP members who crossed over with him, he confirmed former president Milton Obote's contention that his opponents were badly split.

Kanagwa told a UPC rally at Kasese town on Sunday: "I was fed up with politics of intrigue, split and facionalism.

"The DP is a party of indecision and ineffective leadership.

"The last staw for me was when all the DP leaders and parliamentary candidates were summoned to meet at Rubaga Social Centre, a religious hideout. [as published]

"Why should we discuss national issues in a tiny place belonging to the Catholic Church? Don't we have facilities at Kampala International Hotel or the International Conference Centre?

"Every DP candidate is a Catholic, a Catholic, a Catholic. I am sick." Kanagwa, a former diplomat in the 1960s and now a businessman, wondered.

He said when they were summoned he had expected their leader to brief them on what transpired at a meeting between 10 DP leaders and President Nyerere in Dar.

"We wanted to be briefed on the issue of ballot boxes. Instead, me were instructed how to fill forms nine and 10 of the nomination paper. [as published]

"I insisted that we should be briefed on the vital issues. The 200 people present then took some decisions but later as usual, these decisions were reversed by a powerful inner circle.

Kanagwa will probably brief Obote about what goes on in the 25-year-old party, which clearly is heading for disintegration.

PRIME MINISTER, PRESIDENT TO HAVE PERMANENT POLICE ESCORT

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 24 Dec 80 p 1

[Text]

THE President and the Prime Minister are to be provided with a police escort at all times when they move by car in Zimbabwe.

This was confirmed yesterday by the Minister of Home Affairs and the Minister in charge of police, Dr Sethan Nkomo, at a Press conference in Salisbury.

On Monday a police spokesman appealed to all motorists and pedestrians in central Salisbury to give way to motor cycles and motor vehicles displaying flashing blue lights and sounding warning devices.

The spokesman would not comment further. He said trials were being conducted and asked the public to co-operate.

At the Press conference Dr Nkomo was asked if the trials were connected to permanent police escorts planned for President Banana and the Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe.

He replied: "There was no Prime Minister before and no President. Now that they are there it is normal to provide escorts."

It is understood the President and the Prime Minister are to be escorted by motorcycle outriders or by B cars whenever they travel by car. Pedestrians and motorists will be expected to move off the road and stop until the escort has passed.

No comment was available from the police last night.

CONTINUED LOSS OF SKILLED LABOR DEPLORED

Salisbury THE FINANCIAL GAZETTE in English 5 Dec 80 p 1

[Text] The flight of skilled personnel from Zimbabwe continued unabated in September, although some areas actually showed a gain.

According to the monthly migration statistics compiled by the Central Statistical Office for September, the last month for which figures are available, the country continued to lose engineers, accountants, auditors, artisans and nurses at an alarming rate. But some professional groups, such as physicians and surgeons, teachers, draughtsmen and engineering technicians actually increased during the month.

Active

In all, a total of 709 economically active people left Zimbabwe during September, while only 432 arrived for a net loss of 277.

The greatest single loss recorded during the month was for female clerical and related workers. Fully 109 women in this category left the country, while only 37 entered.

More nurses left the country than arrived. During September, 21 nurses and midwives left, while only eight came into the country.

Artisans

The loss of skilled artisans continued, with 37 mechanical engineering workers leaving and 30 arriving.

Motor mechanics left at an alarming rate with 25 choosing to emigrate for a total loss of 19.

On the positive side, the loss of highly-skilled physicians seems to have been checked, and, hopefully, reversed. Zimbabwe lost six physicians or surgeons during the month, but gained 11. The same trend was evident among teachers, with 12 leaving and 22 arriving, and draughtsmen who recorded a net gain of 12.

1981 PROSPECTS FOR TEA INDUSTRY EXAMINED

Salisbury THE FINANCIAL GAZETTE in English 5 Dec 80 p 1

[Text] Zimbabwe's tea industry will have to concentrate on growing a quality product or it will not survive, says Mr. Brian Gill, the managing director of the Tanganda Tea Company, the largest tea concern in Zimbabwe.

In an interview, Mr. Gill said that, like tea growers in other countries, local tea producers have been badly hit by rising production costs and declining prices.

Depressed

In Zimbabwe, the outlook for the industry in 1981 was "depressed", said Mr. Gill.

"What has hit the industry so severely is the increase in wages", he said. "Wages will cost us an additional $800 000 in 1980-81.

"The situation is very serious as 80% of our production is exported and therefore, the determining factor in our industry is fluctuating international tea prices."

Stabilising tea prices was the aim of last week's international tea growers' conference held in Salisbury.

Representatives from 15 countries, including the "big three"--India, Sri Lanka and Kenya--met under the auspices of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development to try to work out some sort of equitable agreement to strengthen prices.

Little Headway

Very little headway was made, however, mainly because no middle ground could be reached between those countries, like Zimbabwe, pushing for an international agreement, and those, like Sri Lanka which are so dependent on tea that they find it very difficult to accept any kind of reduction in exports.

"Unfortunately, the degree of flexibility available to countries like Sri Lanka is very low", said Mr. Gill. "About 35% of Sri Lanka's population is dependent on tea, and 65 to 70% of the country's earnings come from the crop."

The problem has been aggravated by the rapid expansion of the Kenyan tea industry, which, because virtually all of its tea is of the highest quality, has made significant inroads into the international market.

Slim Chance

"Until the giants can sort themselves out, the prospects of reaching a tea agreement are slim", said Mr. Gill.

Meanwhile, the Zimbabwean industry, which produces a tea of moderately high quality, will have to make do as best it can.

STRUCTURE OF WORKS COUNCILS DETAILED

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 25 Dec 80 p 1

[Text]

A DETAILED document outlining the possible structure of future works councils in Zimbabwe has been released.

It was announced this week that Government legislation was to be introduced to pave the way for new works councils to be set up throughout commerce and industry next year.

A document has been circulated giving an example of what a typical constitution for such a works council might be.

POWER

According to the document works councils would have no power to supercede matters covered by industrial legislation. The new councils, which are aiming to improve relations between workers and employers, could also be powerless to enforce recommendations.

The document says that a company could reject a works council recommendation without giving reasons if these reasons "involve confidential matters relating to company policy, financial structure or staff matters".

The chief industrial relations officer and registrar of trade unions and employers' organisations, Mr Ignatius Chigwendere, said this week it was hoped the councils would promote better understanding between the two sides, to prevent strikes and settle disputes at lower level.

The document, in outlining aims and objectives of the proposed councils, say they should "promote employment security, safety and health and general work satisfaction," and "promote the general and common interest and welfare of both the company and its workers".

Areas for discussion listed by the four-page document include: "General conditions of employment provided that no final decision can be taken on any matter that is subject to the provisions of the relevant industrial agreement, industrial regulations or other legislation currently in force."

ISSUES

It says other issues for talks can include those having the objective of improving relations between the company and its workers, provided "such issues do not infringe upon nor impede in any way, the rights of the company to manage its own business as it deems fit, and provided such issues are not covered by any operating industrial council agreement or industrial regulations."

Other points covered in detail by the document include:

Composition "The council will be made up of members nominated by management and representatives elected by workers. The company will nominate the chairman and the workers' secretary.

Election procedures: Workers will be able to lodge one secret vote for the candidate of their choice. The candidate with the most votes in each department will be elected.

Meetings: A quorum will be half of each side, with meetings to be held during working hours and with all the council's expenses paid for by the company.

Constitution: Can only be changed by unanimous agreement of the council.

THOUSANDS GRANTED RENT-FREE HOUSING

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 25 Dec 80 p 1

[Text]

MORE than 11 000 tenants in the former local government areas throughout the country will not have to pay rents for their houses with immediate effect.

The Minister of Local Government and Housing, Mr Eddison Zvobgo, gave this "Christmas cheer" at a Press conference in his office yesterday when he announced his plans for the conversion of rented accommodation in former local government areas to home ownership.

"I have proposed to all local authorities," he said, "that with immediate effect, the discount for sitting tenants should be 2 percent for the first five years; 3 percent for the next 10 years and 4 percent for the next 15 years.

"This means that a person who has been resident in his house for 30 years will not be required to pay anything for the house."

THE Minister's announcement was welcomed by the Mayor of Salisbury, Councillor Jack Whiting.

Asked for comment, he said: "I go along 100 percent with the Minister's move. People must own their houses and it must be on freehold. It makes for responsibility. They then have a stake in the city and the country."

He said the municipality would lose "an awful lot of money, running into thousands of dollars" in rents, adding: "It is a very small price to pay to have a happy and united community. We can only have peace in this country when people in the lower echelons are at peace and happy."

The Minister added that the house owners would have to pay for the cost of road and stormwater drainage, water, electricity and other supplementary charges.

Mr Zvobgo said where a municipality received the land at no cost, no charge would be raised for that land against the purchasers, but in other cases, a charge would be made for the land.

Giving Harare as an example, he said the land was given to the municipality for nothing by Mr Cecil John Rhodes through a deed of grant.

"It is of no cost to the municipality at all," he said. "Most of the tenants have been living in those houses for over 30 years and have more than paid for them. These houses are theirs for free with effect from this moment."

The Minister added that tenants could now extend or modify and improve their homes if they wished.

Here is a breakdown of the houses where tenants have been relieved of the monthly rent:

Salisbury — 5 437 houses. Bulawayo — 3 068. Gwelo — about 200. Gatooma — 1 590. Que Que — 403. Umtali — 271. Ft. Victoria — 163 rondavels. Sinoia — 80

Hartley and Marandellas were excluded in this category because there were no houses over 30 years old, Mr Zvobgo said.

Excluded also were 300 single quarters in Gatooma and 157 in Bulawayo which are not family accommodation.

Apart from the supplementary charges, tenants would also have to pay the cost of survey, stamp duty and title registration when the properties are transferred into their names.

Mr Zvobgo said he had asked local authorities to consider amending those sale agreements recently entered into in terms of the previous policy of 30 percent discount for sitting tenants.

In answer to a question, the Minister said all local authorities had been fully consulted and in the case of Salisbury, the municipality had done an exercise on the scheme.

The new policy had been limited to local government areas, he said, because it could not be applied to individually-owned houses in other residential areas.

He was optimistic that the home-ownership scheme would improve the overall standard of living.

"It is amazing what people can do to their homes once they know they now own them," said Mr Zvobgo. "Eleven thousand families suddenly owning homes is the kind of thing that has pleased the Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe exceedingly."

The Minister said it was Government policy to achieve a situation where "we can say one family, one house" to root out profiteering.

"Therefore in 1981, we are going to mount an exercise which is now under study in my Ministry to achieve that purpose," he said, adding: "It is not confiscation of houses that belong to people but we would like to ensure that if you have 10 houses, you must dispose of the other nine by selling them to those who do not have houses".

On rents in general, Mr Zvobgo said he was aware there were some landlords who were charging exorbitant rents.

"We have legal problems in dealing with this situation," he said. "But I can promise the country that we will soon resolve that particular problem. We will have some rent control of some kind, some rent control act of legislation. Certainly the present situation cannot be allowed to continue."

VACANT EAGLE SCHOOL GOES ON SALE

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 25 Dec 80 p 3

[Text]

EAGLE SCHOOL in the Vumba, which has been vacant since a group of missionaries and their families were murdered there in June, 1978, is up for sale.

At the time of the murders, the school was being rented by the Elim Mission from a board of Trustees, but has not been used since. A spokesman for the mission in Salisbury, Mr Peter Griffiths, said that the school was in need of repair and that it would cost about $30 000 to get it back into shape.

Many prospective buyers have come to light, including the Ministry of Youth, Sport and Recreation and the Ministry of Education and Culture. The asking price was about $180 000, said Mr Griffiths.

Dr Joshua Nkomo, the Minister of Home Affairs and leader of the Patriotic Front, has shown an interest in the property, but no negotiations are known to have taken place.

Another prospective buyer has been a medical practitioner, Dr Ken Jenkins. He has had plans to open up a medical centre on the site and to take advantage of the school's ideal position for the establishment of a spiritual retreat.

A spokesman for the Ministry of Youth, Sport and Recreation, said that the Ministry was interested in buying the school, but that no statement would be made until early in the new year.

Mr Griffiths, who is also in charge of religious education at the Ministry of Education and Culture, said that Elim Mission would be opening a new school at its original site, north of Inyanga.

ADMINISTRATIVE COSTS RESULT IN $32-MILLION DEFICIT FOR RAILROADS

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 24 Dec 80 p 10

[Text]

ZIMBABWE'S railway system had a deficit of $32 million for the year ended June 30 mainly because of rising administrative costs which were $29 million.

Rising fuel costs also contributed to the overall deficit, says the railways annual report, and were 45 percent up at $11,9 million. Because of this the operating profits were down by $1 million to $12 million.

Another $1 million in income came from rents on properties.

In addition to the administration costs of $29 million, another $1 million was spent on motor road services and associated costs, $3 million went to pay for using the old unitary system's equipment, and interest of almost $11 million was paid for loans to the unitary system and the railways.

Military make-up pay added another $1 million to the bill.

Of administrative and general costs the greatest proportion is taken up by head office and area administration costs of $21,7 million.

POLICY

Of the railways total net assets of $186 million, $104 million has come from loan finance.

A new accounting policy has been adopted for the Government grant made to pay for the year's deficit. Until now the deficit has been written off by retrospective grants.

However, the annual report now says: "Government has conceded that the annual deficit reflects the extent to which the economy has been subsidised by the application of sub-economic tariffs by the railways and has agreed to support, in advance, the budgeted deficit each year from 1980/81".

During the year the diesel locomotives travelled 17 million km — just over 1 million km more than the previous year. Steam engines accounted for 3,9 million km.

Operating revenue for each engine per kilometre was 6,8c (up by 1c over the previous year) and operating expenditure was 6c, an increase of 1,1c over the previous year.

For each dollar spent 40c went on maintenance of engines and rolling stock, while 20c went on administration. Freight accounted for 72c of each dollar of revenue.

The number of passengers carried by the railways was down by 28 percent to 891 000.

RUN ON BREAD--When the great seven-days run on bread ended in Bulawayo at close of trade yesterday a million loaves had been sold. The bread queues formed before sunrise, and kept reforming throughout the day. One baker, Mr Ric Accorsi, said: "It was incredible. We as well as the public, are exhausted." He picked up a ringing telephone and said: "Sorry, no bread. Try later. First come, first served." He rationed customers to two loaves each. "We've been working to capacity plus 10 percent," he said. "The demand is so big it is unreal." [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 25 Dec 80 p 3]

LABOR LAW CHANGES--The Government is to change present labor legislation in order to make it more consistent with the political change taking place in the country, a Government source said yesterday. The source said the changes would be mostly on the discriminatory features in the Industrial Conciliation Act. "The present Act has racial undertones and it must be changed with speed. The Government wants to see this Act changed in order to make it consistent with the political change happening in the country. I am sure it will be changed early next year," the source said. The source added that the Government was in favor of the re-grouping of industry in a manner that would facilitate stronger and more financial viable trade unions. In this process there would be no room for racially divided unions "as we have today." "It therefore stands to reason as far as the Government is concerned, that all aspects of the present Act with racial undertones must go." The source also said that the present industrial legislation was framed on a condescending attitude on the part of the ruling class which ignored those on the receiving end. The law must therefore seek equity and introduce processes that would allow the aggrieved party some "form of appeal." [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 25 Dec 80 p 9]

CHIRUNDU-KAFUE RAIL LINK--Another rail link between Zimbabwe and Zambia may be built through Chirundu, according to officials of both governments. Earlier this year the Zambian Ministry of Power, Transport and Communications said a railway line from the town of Kafue, south of Lusaka, to link up with another from Karoi in Zimbabwe across the Zambezi River at Chirundu was one of possible shorter routes to the sea being considered. At present the bulk of cargo from Zimbabwe and South Africa to and from Zambia and Zaire is shipped on the railway line from Bulawayo through Victoria Falls. Zimbabwe's Minister of Transport and Power, Mr Ernest Kadungure, has recently spoken in Salisbury of a possible new rail link with Zambia. "We might do that in the near future, but now we would like to rehabilitate the present (railway) system effectively." The Minister noted that while a new rail link through Chirundu "will be shorter, for the time being the link through Victoria Falls is working well." IMPORT 'SQUEEZE' RELAXED--Industry got a Christmas present from the Government yesterday in the form of a relaxation in exchange control. From now manufacturers can import some raw materials, which they have to process themselves, with money legally held outside the country. The Ministry of Finance said it would still be forbidden for importers to sell the raw materials to others, and finished goods could not be imported for resale. For the last five years authority has been given for those non-currency-involved deals to be allowed in some cases where the goods will be for the importer's own use. Said the Ministry: "Exchange Control will consider applications for the issue of NCI permits in the categories currently permitted, such as personal imports paid for from personal free funds and in addition for the importation of raw materials for manufacture by the importer. "Authority will not be granted for the importation of raw materials for resale to other or third party manufacturers, not for any processed goods which are intended for resale." LOW-COST HOUSING--The Ministry of Local Government and Housing is proceeding with plans for the development of 500 ultra-low-cost housing units on Hatcliffe Estate, north of Borrowdale. Announcing this yesterday, the Ministry of Local Government and Housing, Mr Eddison Zvobgo, said: "There is a pressing need for low-cost housing for workers in the northern sector of the City of Salisbury, and this has recently been highlighted by the predicament of the families of employees of owners and trainers at the Borrowdale Turf Club." The Minister noted that his Ministry's ultra-low-cost design of the houses would place them within the means of the workers within the northern sector of the City. The Department of Physical Planning and the Department of Housing Development Services were currently drawing up layout plans and designs for the proposed development. The Minister added that a limited supply of water was available from City sources for this initial development and investigations were under way into the provision of further supplies--"if necessary, from underground sources." "It is intended that the newly developed housing area will be handed over to Salisbury City Council for administration," the statement said. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 25 Dec 80 p 1]

SHORTAGE OF PAPER LOOMS--School exercise books could be in very short supply next year if the Government does not allow extra newsprint to be imported, printing industry sources warn. The warning has come against the background of a huge increase in projected school enrollments, with at least 60,000 extra places in senior schools to be made available next year. Educational publishers said this week: "The amount of newsprint produced locally will in no way cover the extra demand for writing paper." However, no-one is yet sure of what the country's total demand is likely to be. A study is being made of potential demand and a committee has been formed to report back to Government. The country's only newsprint makers, Umtali Board and Paper, will produce a record 20,000 tonnes next year, says managing director, Mr Bob Annan. Most of this will be taken for newspaper production, leaving a big gap for other newsprint users. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 25 Dec 80 p 5]

DETENTION OF PF OFFICIALS--Dr Nkomo, who is PF president, said at his Press conference yesterday he had no information on the continued detention of his publicity secretary, Mr Mark Nziramasanga and Mr Sidney Malunga, an MP. The two were detained last month and according to the present legislation should be released after 30 days and be charged or have their detention order renewed--by the Minister of Home Affairs. The 30 days expired on Sunday. "I have not renewed any detention order and I do not know," he said when persistently questioned about the men. Asked about recent police promotions, the Minister said these were designed to give the force "the character of the country." He added: "It must look Zimbabwean and it must have the color of Zimbabwe." [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 24 Dec 80 p 1]

SIX SOUTHERN NATIONS SIGN HEALTH AGREEMENT

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 20 Dec 80 p 7

[Text]

SIX Southern African countries including Zambia have thrashed out an agreement for regional cooperation in health, which is expected to take off by 1983.

This was announced in Lusaka yesterday by Health Minister, Mr Rajah Kunda, who has just returned from Zimbabwe where he attended a two-day health symposium at which it was agreed that Zambia, Botswana, Tanzania, Malawi, Lesotho and Zimbabwe should exchange health personnel, drugs and other facilities.

The agreement was an extension of the one signed between Zambia and Zimbabwe last October under which the two countries would exchange patients requiring specialist treatment.

Other areas are training of health personnel, recruitment, development of traditional medicine and exchange of consultants.

He said the symposium, which centred on primary health care, emphasised the need for comprehensive health facilities for people at their places of work.

"We concluded that there should be a thorough examination of health facilities at all places of work. People who set up industries or factories should consider health of the workers not as a means to an end but an end itself," he said.

The regional cooperation agreement was now being studied and a prelude to it was the request for Tanzania and Malawi to work out a paper on the implementation of traditional medicine.

"We are also working out papers to identify facilities which exist in each member country to see how best these can be used to the benefit of the six member countries," Mr Kunda added.

The minister said two World Health Organisation experts attended the symposium and gave their support for the regional health plan.

Mr Kunda said member countries would meet in Geneva next year to work out further measures to have the plan implemented.

RELATIONS BETWEEN NIGERIA, SAO TOME DETAILED

Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 13 Dec 80 p 9

[Text]

NIGERIA and the Democratic Republic of Sao Tome and Principe have agreed to widen the parametres of economic co-operation between them.

In a communique signed by President Shehu Shagari and President Pinto Da Costa of Sao Tome and Principe at the end of the latter's three-day official visit to the country, the two leaders resolved to set up a joint commission of the two countries as a means of fostering this economic co-operation.

The commission, when set up, would facilitate the successful implementation of agreements on education, trade and air services that have been concluded by the two countries, the communique said.

During the visit of President Pinto Da Costa, the two countries also explored the desirability of entering into fishing rights agreement as well as agreements on cultural, scientific, social and technical co-operation.

On the international front, the two leaders expressed dissatisfaction with the continued widening of the economic gap between the north and the south regions and also expressed anxiety over the deteriorating of trade in the developing countries.

They however, noted with satisfaction the continental efforts within Africa to promote intra-African trade.

On African regional affairs, both leaders expressed grave concern and indignation about the situation in southern Africa.

They strongly condemned the recent military incursion of the racist South Africa in Angola, and noted that "this wanton, reckless and irresponsible action would further endanger the course of peace in southern Africa.

With regard to Namibian independence, President Shagari and President Pinto Da Costa called on the international community to reject any attempts to instal "an unrepresentative, undemocratic and puppet government" in the territory.

DIFFICULTIES STILL CONFRONTING NATION IN ECONOMIC FIELD

Dakar AFRICA in French Dec 80 pp 97-98

[Article reprinted from L'ECONOMISTE DU TIERS MONDE]

[Text] One year after a civilian government came back to power, the general impression is that the Ghanaian economy is not about to emerge from stagnation, says this international financial monthly.

Three directives were enunciated by President Limann, which are supposed to open the way for a new era of prosperity for the Ghanaian economy: none seems so far to have provided the kind of measures needed in response to the gravity of the situation.

In relation to the first two measures, i.e., the training of cadres and the diversification of the economy, practically no initiatives, have been taken. As for the government's third objective, the renewed confidence in the economy by lenders and foreign investors, slow progress has been made, due, it seems, less to the merit inherent in the activities of the leaders than to the fact that in the view of traditional financiers, the present climate is less unfavorable to business than the prevailing conditions of a year ago.

On the other hand, negotiations with the International Monetary Fund have progressed a great deal: to obtain the Fund's green light and the credits it can grant the country, Ghana has accepted, among other things, to limit its imports and pay for them in hard currency. At the request of the IMF, Accra has also attributed high priority to agricultural development during the next 2 years. Reimbursement of debts, neglected during the last 2 years, has been undertaken. The Ministry of Finance must, therefore, concede only two more points: a new devaluation of the cedi--which will contribute to an increase in the cost of living--and noticeable cuts in state expenditures, especially in civil servants' salaries.

Having inherited a difficult economic situation, whose most spectacular aspect is a 50-percent drop in cocoa production during the last 20 years, as well as a more stable political situation in which, nevertheless, destabilizing elements have not completely disappeared, the Ghanaian Second Republic appears to be a country in search of a new equilibrium.

OIL EXPLORATION ACTIVITIES--What may become the country's best oil well was recently drilled off the shores of Half-Assini by the Phillips Petroleum Company. The company's vice-president, Mr. Robert Haas, said after drilling to the depth of 11,000 feet the company is optimistic about oil deposits in the area. He said a series of tests will soon start on the finding and by the end of December it will be possible to determine the real oil prospect of the area. No matter the outcome, the company will open more wells next year and provide funds for geological and geophysical surveys. The company has so far spent $60m. on its activities in Ghana and it would commit $10m. more to the exploration. [Text] [London WEST AFRICA in English 8 Dec 80 p 2520]

INCREASED WORLD BANK AID--The World Bank will increase aid to Ghana in the coming years to cover new projects such as factory development, oil exploration and rehabilitation of the railway system, the vice-president of the Bank, David Knox, said. He said Ghana had a considerable potential for industrial, agricultural and mining development and promised the World Bank's assistance to rebuild the country's infrastructure. He said the size of Ghana's economic problems was such that it would take some time to achieve results. This year the World Bank granted Ghana a loan of $54.5m. to help finance agricultural development and highway maintenance in the Volta Region. [Text] [London WEST AFRICA in English 8 Dec 80 p 2521]

INDUSTRIAL NATIONS AGREE IN PRINCIPLE TO RESCHEDULE DEBT

Monrovia NEW LIBERIAN in English 22 Dec 80 pp 1, 6

[Text]

Liberia has won agreement in principle from eight industrial countries for rescheduling of 34.4 million dollars in debt, the Liberian Finance Minister, Major Perry Zulu said in Paris over the weekend.

Minister Zulu told the French News Agency that the accord had been reached last Thursday and Friday at a meeting of the "Paris club."

In attendance were representatives of the United State, Britain, France, West Germany, Italy, Japan, Belgium and Sweden.

Major Zulu said, however, that the Liberian Government had wanted a restructuring of 50 million dollars in debt.

The French Economic Ministry said the representatives would recommend to their governments that Liberia be allowed four years to take care of payments on debt due between July 1, 1980, and December 3, 1981.

The Ministry also said Liberia's creditors had taken into account an economic recovery program the country had drawn up based on an accord with the international monetary fund.

In his November 17 address to the nation on the State of the Liberian economy, Head of State and Chairman of the People's Redemption Council, Master Sergeant Samuel K. Doe outlined some defined measures to solve Liberia's current economic crisis.

One of the measures outlined was to negotiate the rescheduling of the nation's international debts until a later date in order to enable Liberia cover economically.

Other measures included the purchase of National Savings Bond by Liberian workers in both private and government sectors and freezing of the employment in the government sector.

Early in December, U.S. Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs, Mr. Richard Moose, flew into Monrovia to hold talks with government officials on the crisis. At the end of his two-day visit Mr. Moose told newsmen that "all foreign debts owed by Liberia to the United States and other friendly countries would be rescheduled in order to help Liberia recover from the present economic crisis."

According to Liberia's Press and Cultural Counsellor in London, Mr. John Morias, the Liberian delegation which Finance Minister Major Zulu headed, had talks all through last week with representatives of the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and members of the "Paris Club."

Mr. Morias said that throughout the talks Minister Zulu had been optimistic and hopeful that members of the "Paris Club" would offer Liberia a reasonable grace period by rescheduling its international debts servicing.

NUJOMA WILL HEAD SWAPO DELEGATION IN GENEVA

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 23 Dec 80 p 2

[Text]

LUANDA: Mr Sam Nujoma, Leader of Swapo, said in Luanda yesterday he would lead his organisation's delegation to the multi-party talks on SWA in Geneva next month.

South Africa had said it feared Mr Nujoma would send lower-ranking officials to the conference next month in an attempt to undercut it.

Mr Nujoma said Swapo would do all it could to make the conference a success, and Pretoria would be to blame if it failed to make progress on the implementation of the United Nations independence plan for SWA.

South Africa was trying to create obstacles and still wanted to make a "Bantustan" out of Namibia rather than a truly independent state.

The Swapo President said his group was going to Geneva to discuss the Security Council resolutions calling for elections under UN supervision leading to independence for the Territory.

Mr Nujoma said the UN Secretary-General, Dr Kurt Waldheim, had suggested the truce take effect in March and Swapo monitoring force.

But he stressed that his men must stay in SWA and not be withdrawn to bases in Zambia or Angola.

This point remained to be settled.

South Africa and Swapo have agreed on a number of other points, including the establishment of a demilitarised zone along the Angola-Namibia border and the continued basing of South African troops in SWA during the period leading to elections.

Mr Nujoma said he would like to see elections held a year from now. — Sapa AFP

MUDGE, HOUGH DIFFER ON DELEGATION MAKEUP

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 22 Dec 80 p 1

[Text]

A SECOND round of talks between the AG Mr Danie Hough and Mr Dirk Mudge is scheduled for today following Friday's protracted negotiations on the composition of the DTA delegation to attend the Geneva talks next month.

The talks are to be resumed in Swakopmund.

Political observers have inferred from Mr Mudge's tightlipped "no comment" after Friday's meeting which lasted until three pm that a solution had not been found.

There is strong dissatisfaction within DTA ranks concerning the size and composition of the DTA delegation which is to accompany the AG to Geneva in relation to the numbers of delegates that have been afforded to opposition parties.

Informed political sources have pointed out that there is only one of two possible two outcomes possible for the present dispute over the number of delegates that have been allowed by Mr Hough to opposition parties both inside and outside the National Assembly.

These observers state that either the AG yields to Mr Mudge's apparent demands for an increased quota of DTA delegates or he refuses the present proportion of DTA and opposition delegates to be altered.

It has also been pointed out by sources well informed on the pre-implementation talks to be held in Geneva next month that it would not really matter all that much how many delegates attend the conference since all would not be directly involved in the process of negotiation.

Other political analysts have also made the observation that the dissatisfaction reigning within DTA ranks is based upon performance in the recently held second tier elections.

It has also been said that dissatisfaction within the ranks of the DTA as to the distribution of its 14 allocated delegates is a problem that should be resolved within the DTA without reference to the AG.

The AG's decision to permit internal political parties to send delegates to Geneva even without having taken part in the 1978 elections to the National Assembly has been tempered by the consideration that Swapo itself, a major party to the talks, has not had it's strength tested in an election.

In a statement, he said the target date for a video cassette service was July 1 next year and this would be followed on October 1 by additional programmes inserted by the South West African Broadcasting Corporation. Further steps towards a fully-fledged service for the Territory would be considered at a later stage, depending on the territory's financial position, he added. An explanatory statement by the Chairman of the SWABC Board, Mr Piet Venter, in Windhoek said the South African Broadcasting Corporation would be asked to initiate a television service in the Territory. Accord With NPP

[Text]

THE national chairman of the NPN, Chief A. M. Akinloye has declared that his party still believed in its accord with the NPP.

To this end, he urged that the accord be strengthened, adding that all obstacles to its proper functioning should be removed.

Chief Akinloye said this while addressing the opening of the NPN yearly convention in Kano on Sunday.

He said, his party saw the accord as very important and essential for the stability, peace and progress of the country.

Chief Akinloye then declared: "We must make no mistake, the UPN is up to tomorrow bemoaning the accord of the NPN/NPP and they will do anything to see the accord break at all costs".

He refuted the allegation that the accord was signed under duress, and that there was also threat presented by three armed men at Eko Hotel, Lagos.

It was an open victory, he contested, that the accord was negotiated by a committee of the two parties led by their respective national chairmen.

He also added that the accord was signed by two national chairmen and two national secretaries of the parties.

Chief Akinloye confirmed that at no time did Dr. Azikiwe, the leader of the NPP, take part in the negotiation or signing of the accord.

COMPLAINTS ON RECRUITING WHITES, ASIANS SPELLED OUT

Lagos BUSINESS TIMES in English 16 Dec 80 pp 1, 2

[Article by Roseline Umesi]

[Text] The Association of Professional Nigerians in Europe has complained bitterly about the recruitment of whites and Asian immigrants into top executive jobs in Nigeria to the detriment of Nigerians who in most cases are more qualified.

The president of this association, Mr M.T. Ashmi has urged the Federal Government to explain the basis on which these recruitments are made. They asked the government to ensure that before such jobs are offered to expatriates (a) that the post is unsuitable for a national; (b) that it has been advertised with the same conditions locally with the type and level of response obtained; (c) that it has been advertised at the home base of the company, i.e. Europe or America and directed to the nationals of the particular African country resident in that country.

This organisation claimed that there are highly qualified Nigerians in almost every profession at home and abroad who have been waiting for this "Manna from Heaven" as it has been falling on white elites in Nigeria who get all the plum jobs.

In the first place the association of professional Nigerians in Europe claimed that the wording of the advertisement of these jobs indicates clearly that the Nigerians are not wanted for the jobs.

Secondly, these jobs are never advertised in the local newspapers in Nigeria nor any other paper in Europe which is easily accessible to Nigerians in Europe.

Thirdly, they argue that the foreign based companies in Nigeria are not interested in recruiting indigenous professionals except on exploitative conditions.

Above all they claimed that these posts are always filled before the advertisements are placed in the media. Mr. Ashmi supported his allegation by quoting recruitment consultants employed by some of these companies in London which on enquiring, said that "the positions are not meant for Nigerians and that their clients in Nigeria have already obtained their quotas for expatriate recruitment even before the advertisement.

He further cited some examples of jobs in Nigeria advertised in the London "Sunday Times" of October 19, 1980 which were summarised as follows:

(1) General Manager--Biscuit Manufacturing Company, qualification--a good degree with proven experience. Age 30-45. Salary ₦25,000; High quality house, car, domestic staff, etc., 6 weeks leave and other overseas fringe benefits such as schooling.

(2) Commercial/Administrative Manager for a subsidiary of a U.K. consumer goods group; Salary ₦20,000; Age--28-35; Qualification, graduate or qualified accountant; Experience--management/supervisory; Benefits--include free furnished house, car, driver, medical cover, children education allowance, twice yearly UK leave with family air fares.

These are just a few examples.

Commenting on these allegations, the Minister of State in the Federal Ministry of Internal Affairs, Chief (Mrs) Janet A. Akinrinade told the "Business Times" last week that before recruiting or granting quotas for the white workers that "the Ministry makes sure that such jobs cannot be done by Nigerians."

She also said that to make sure that expatriate managers hand over to Nigerians within a short period, the government makes sure that the contracts to work do not extend for more than four years.

However, she remarked that in some cases the contracts are renewed when a vacuum is created due to the resignation of the Nigerians who were understudying the white managers.

With regard to the huge salaries and fantastic fringe benefits paid to these white managers, she said that it depends on individual companies to fix salaries for their workers which perhaps relate to their profitability.

She therefore argued that it is not the business of her Ministry to fix salaries for these expatriate managers.

She said that it is the responsibility of the Nigerian managers to protest if they discriminated over salaries, fringe benefits and status.

Chief (Mrs) Akinrinade denied the allegation that some companies bribe the officials of the Ministry in order to obtain the manpower quotas.

In the first place, she said, the approval of quotas undergo over four layers of official evaluation before the final approval is given.

She also said that she did not know why these companies choose to advertise the jobs in the overseas [article incomplete].

PLANS TO IMPEACH KADUNA STATE GOVERNOR DISCUSSED

Refusal To Appear

Lagos DAILY TIMES in English 6 Dec 80 p 32

[Text]

THE Kaduna State House of Assembly is to issue a warrant of arrest on the state Governor, Alhaji Balarabe Musa, following his refusal to appear before the legislature.

According to a report by NAN, the speaker, Alhaji Muhammadu Abubakar Dan Musa, said because of the governor's refusal, the assembly would have no alternative but to exercise the powers conferred upon it by section 121 of the Constitution.

Section 121 of the Constitution empowers a House of Assembly to summon any person in Nigeria to give evidence before it.

Earlier, the Assemblymen had invited the governor to come and explain the "operations of the state 1980 Appropriation Law".

In a letter to the speaker, the governor stated that under section 102 of the Constitution he could attend a meeting of the House to speak on affairs of the state.

"From the way you use section 120 of the Constitution to summon officials, apparently not for the purpose of any genuine investigation, but for merely diverting attention from the serious issues facing the people of this state, no useful purpose will be served by my accepting your invitation" he added.

The governor said that the speaker misused section 120 of the Constitution and appealed to the legislators to consider the 10 bills he had sent to them over three months ago.

'Foregone Conclusion'

Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 9 Dec 80 p 7

[Article by Ibrahim Salihu]

[Text]

THE impeachment of Governor Abdulkadir Balarabe Musa of Kaduna State is a foregone conclusion.

This disclosure was made by the chairman of the House Committee in the Kaduna State House of Assembly, Alhaji Dahiru Maigana, while speaking to the New Nigerian over the weekend at Birnin-Kebbi, where he attended the first convocation ceremony of the Sokoto State Polytechnic.

He emphasised that the governor must be impeached for his negligent handling of the people in Kaduna State and the contempt he has for the constitution.

Alhaji Dahiru revealed that all mechanics for the governor's impeachment have been set in motion although it is hoped he would see reason and come back to the right path.

Refusing to disclose what are the steps so far taken, he said they have been kept secret but newsmen would know whenever it is time for action. He then pointed out that it was the governor not the House that wanted to impeach the governor but rather it was the governor himself that asked for it.

He said all the 99 legislators in the House were willing to vacate seats with the governor if that would save the people of Kaduna State from undue suffering.

He regretted that people in the state have no drugs in the hospitals, no light, water and schools all because of one person's stubborness.

'Empty Threat'

Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 10 Dec 80 p 3

[Article by Mustapha Tor Waya]

[Text]

GOVERNOR Abdulkadir Balarabe Musa has described reported threats to impeach him by the Kaduna State House of Assembly as 'empty.'

In a letter addressed to the Speaker of the state legislature yesterday, the governor said that the executive also had constitutional powers which it could use against the legislature.

However, the governor said, the two arms should desist from using their powers to intimidate each other.

The governor advised the speaker to use all available means to bring to an end the indignities which according to him had characterised the posture of the legislature towards the executive.

He said if there were areas in which the legislature wanted clarifications on the implementation of the 1980 Appropriation Law he would supply them within 24 hours of his receipt of the written demand from the Assembly.

He said the secretary to the government would also be available to provide further explanations to the House.

The House is expected to send a reply to the governor's letter today.

Impeachment Threat Called Blackmail

Enugu DAILY STAR in English 11 Dec 80 p 2

[Editorial: "The Kaduna Tinder Box"]

[Text] The NPN majority threat to impeach Balarabe Musa must be seen as a political gimmick calculated to cow the Governor to submit to their will. It is crass blackmail.

The real quarrel is that the Governor slashed the salaries of legislators and placed on reserve the extraordinary increases the majority imposed on the budget.

The legislators padded the capital budget heavily with projects primed to score political gains without ever thinking of sources of funding.

This extra amount is not available in the treasury nor is it immediately expected from any source. So the governor had to place it on reserve. That is, subject to the availability of funds.

This and the salary cut to fall in line with the all-party decision on salaries for such public officers, rankle the NPN majority and they have been looking for their pound of flesh ever since.

They believed that by consistently refusing on four occasions to approve the governor's list of Commissioners they would bring him to heel. They failed. Balarabe Musa is strong willed and sometimes intractable. But he knows his onions and his legal grounds well.

He alone, among nineteen Governors, has shouldered the burdens of office without the assistance of commissioners as laid down by the constitution.

In the year since, the administration of the affairs of the state has been second to none. For which reason all honest persons who are not lost in the mesh of party politics should give praise to the governor.

Instead the legislators want to impeach. The impeachment of Governor Balarabe would be to start something the end or effect of which none can control or foresee.

It should be clear enough that Kaduna State is like a tinder box. Ignite it and you may perish in the flame. The repercussions of such a move is bound to have wide ranging effects that can rock the foundations of our system.

No one will contest that such a move, if it succeeds, will not result in the complete destabilisation of the state. What may be in doubt is whether the chain reaction will be limited to the state.

Any action therefore likely to affect the organic life of this country, no matter how remote, has to be resisted. The NPN majority must resist the temptation to flex their muscle.

In the politics of the state, there is what is known as the Katsina factor and the Zaria factor. The move aimed at unseating Balarabe has its perils. That is why the New Nigerian finds itself pleading for patience with the legislators, and asking them to leave matters as they are, until 1983.

Certainly there will be a Katsina State in 1983 and those NPN legislators--they are in the majority--who do not want a Zaria man as their governor, can wait till 1983.

The NPN majority cannot sustain an impeachment on legal grounds. But the majority can always impose its will. It is a pity that tribalism is not dead in Nigeria. And not even among the Hausa tribes as the case of Balarabe Musa confirms.

The NPN did everything to rob him of the executive office. They tried to manipulate ballot boxes and went to court, and lost. Party-men have never forgotten nor forgiven Balarabe Musa for denying them the executive office in Kaduna.

This move for an impeachment shows that party-men want the governor's head at all costs. First they must ponder the cost because that may include the very existence of our federation or, at best, abort our parliamentary democracy.

The committee will be made up of representatives of the state government and the Lagos State Chamber of Commerce and Industry.

Addressing the annual general meeting of the Chamber of Commerce and Industry in Lagos at the weekend, its president, Chief J. Akin-George, commended the Lagos State Governor, Alhaji Lateef Jakande, for the "positive reception" he gave representatives of the chamber in October this year.

The chamber had met Governor Jakande to present its views on possible solutions to problems confronting it.

It had also sought the assurance and co-operation of the state government with the business community, to promote rapid commercial and industrial development of the state.

On the proposed joint consultative committee, Chief Akin-George said "this move will certainly improve the relationship between the private sector and the state government and generate the mutual confidence necessary to achieve our common goal".

He said the chamber was also currently studying the Lagos Metropolitan Master Plan and judicious utilisation of the limited land area in Lagos.

NEW INDUSTRIES IN VARIOUS AREAS DETAILED

Niger State

Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 13 Dec 80 p 12

[Article by Sulaiman Gambari]

[Text]

SIX industrial projects are to be established by the Niger State Government in different parts of the state during the next plan period.

The industries are: soft drink, ceramic tiles, animal feeds, pharmaceuticals, shea-nut processing and aluminium fabrication.

Briefing the New Nigerian on the activities of his ministry at an exclusive interview on Wednesday, the Commissioner for Trade and Industries, Alhaji Ibrahim Usman Rijau disclosed that the state government would soon determine where the industries would be sited.

The commissioner also said that the bricks factory in Minna would be completed in the next financial year. He further explained that the Polypropylene Sack Project at Kantagora and the Bida Furniture Factory would also be executed in the next fiscal year.

Commenting on the establishment of small scale industries in rural areas, Alhaji Ibrahim Rijau expressed the willingness of the state government to give adequate financial assistance to investors who would be ready to establish such industries.

He, however, advised businessmen and firms to take the initiatives rather than expect the state government to be the initiator of such industrial projects.

The commissioner, therefore, called on investors through their Chambers of Commerce to invest on industrial projects in the state to enhance its social and economic development.

Alhaji Ibrahim then enumerated some of the incentives offered to businessmen by the state government for industrial take-off in the state. These, he said, included the provision of advice, industrial plots, market information and the government participation in case of a joint-venture.

Imo State Glass Works

Lagos BUSINESS TIMES in English 16 Dec 80 p 3

[Text] The N83 million International Glass Factory at Aba, Imo State, will go into full production in 1982.

When fully operational, the company will, among other things, produce glass doors, windows and car windscreen at a production capacity of 14,000,000 square meters of sheet glass yearly.

These facts were disclosed to newsmen in Aba by the chairman of the Board of Directors of the Company, Mr Ambrose Ejiogu, during the official foundation laying ceremony of the company by the governor of the State, Mr S. O. Mbakwe.

Mr Ejiogu said that the company which is a joint venture between the Imo State government and the International Glass Company of Italy is also expected to offer employment to over 1,000 Nigerians when it goes into full production.

Mr Ejiogu revealed that the inability of the company to pay custom duties on building materials in time, due to lack of funds, was delaying construction work at the site.

Speaking later, Governor Mbakwe said he had noted the problems of the company and, however, urged the Board of Directors to justify the confidence reposed in them by his government in completing the project on schedule.

TEXTILE INDUSTRY SAID FACING BLEAK FUTURE

Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 4 Dec 80 pp 1, 3

[Article by Mustapha Tor Waya]

[Text]

THE nation's textile industry which employs about 80,000 workers faces a very bleak future.

And until a lasting solution is found news about the industry will continue to be gloomy.

This is because the industry is besieged with numerous problems, the most serious of which are inability of some of the textile firms to diversify production and update technology.

A Kaduna based industrialist who wishes to remain anonymous told me yesterday that those problems were further worsened by lack of willingness by Nigerians to invest in the industry because of the long time it takes to make profit in the industry.

He said only one factory in the country produced yarn and this called for investment in that sector.

Expatiating my source revealed that most textile factories in the country were commissioned about two decades ago. Yet little or no attempt was being made to replace obsolete machinery and change production techniques.

Dismissing the suggestion that our cotton was not of good quality, my source said what was wrong was the obsolete machinery found in our ginneries. He gave the example of the Gusau Ginnery which, he said, was commissioned on the very day our present Minister for Agriculture, Alhaji Ibrahim Gusau, was born. That is over 50 years ago. The Gusau Ginnery was still using the same machinery sustained by imported spare-parts from 'over-invoiced' sources, he said.

For a short-term solution, however, my source suggested that the Federal Government should buy over all assets of the former British Cotton Growing Association (BCGA) now called Cotton and Agriculture Processing (CAP) and reactivate the ginneries with modern machinery.

He said the responsibility to ensure the survival of the textile industry in the country rests squarely on the Federal Government.

NIGERIA AIRWAYS FARES MAY BE INCREASED

Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 16 Dec 80 p 9

[Article by Biola Ajoni]

[Text]

NIGERIA Airways has proposed to the Federal Government a general increase of its air fares.

According to the proposals worked out by KLM Royal Dutch Airline experts now running the airline, the fares of short journeys would be strongly affected.

This is because under the proposals, the exisitng regulation which fixed cost of air travel per kilometre is to be scrapped.

The delegate of the KLM Royal Dutch Airline, who oversees co-operation agreements with other airlines, Mr. H. Kawer, disclosed these to Nigerian journalists in Amsterdam last week.

Mr. Kenter said that the new system for computing fares which would take into consideration landing and take-off costs, overflying and handling fees in addition to cost per kilometres, had been tabled.

According to him, the handling and take-off costs of an aircraft were very high because of the fuel consumed for both actions.

He explained that an aircraft consumed the same amount of fuel in taking off and landing, the distance of its journey not withstanding.

The landing and take-off costs must therefore, be equally reflected in all air travels not withstanding the distance as well as other common costs, he said.

Mr. Kenter pointed out that costing air travels per kilometre created a situation in the airline where some passengers were indirectly subsidising the fares paid by others.

According to him, it was most ridiculous that a passenger travelling First Class from Lagos to Accra by the Nigeria Airways paid only 134 Naira. No other airline in the world charged such a fare for any similar journey, he contended.

Mr. Kenter said the situation now was such that any extra flight operated by the airways meant increasing losses because the fares were too low.

Mr. Kenter argued that although an increase in air fares would bring about a reduction in the number of passengers in airways, it would nevertheless break, even if it could not make profit.

According to him, Nigeria Airways was the only airline in the world with 30 to 40 per cent annual growth rate in demand.

"If fares are increased, the growth rate will fall to about 10 per cent, still relatively high by world standards, and the airline would make more money", he said.

Mr. Kenter stressed the need to make the airways a limited liability company.

He said such a measure would, among other things, reduce political pressure on the transport agency.

Mr. Kenter said the idea of a quota staffing system, for instance, was not ideal for the airways, adding, "you have to find the right man at the right time".

As an autonomous body, he added, the airways would be less dependent on government for funds which were hard to get and would be able to borrow on its own.

GONGOLA OIL PALM POTENTIAL--Feasibility studies conducted by both the Nigerian Institute for Oil Palm Research (NIFOR), Ibadan and Institute of Agricultural Research, Ahmadu Bello University (ABU), Zaria, have shown that Gongola State has the potential for growing oil palm trees. Similar studies conducted by the Directorate of Overseas had specifically identified Baissa, Abong and Bissaula as areas where such oil palm trees could be successfully grown. Making the remark while commissioning the 560,000 Naira central workshop in Yola yesterday, the state Governor, Alhaji Abubakar Barde, announced that nearly all crops that were grown in every part of the country could be found in Gongola. To this end he announced that a total of 240 hectares of land had been identified for growing palm trees. Other crops that have great potential for development in the state, the governor said, include cocoa, coffee and benniseed. Governor Barde said that his state has abundant untapped agricultural potential, adding that "the state could feed the whole nation if the fertile lands are properly utilised." This, he said, could be possible if the Federal Government concentrates its efforts towards the achievement of the "Green Revolution" programme in the state. DELTA STEEL PLANT--The Delta Steel Plant will cost the Federal Government about two billion Naira. Already, an independent board has been set up to look after the production of iron rods. The steel plant is expected to commence production by 1981. The board would utilise imported iron ore from Guinea, Liberia and Brazil temporarily for the production of billets. Disclosing this to Governor Solomon Lar of Plateau State when he paid him a courtesy call in Jos last Wednesday, the chairman of the company, Mr. Tunji Arosanyin said that the project had about 12 German companies working on it. Mr. Arosanyin also said that the company, when fully operational, would supply the Jos and Katsina Steel Rolling Mills with billets for the production of iron rods for distribution to other states in the northern parts of the country. Replying, Governor Lar urged the Federal Government not to relent its efforts to ensure that the company took off as scheduled because steel formed the bed rock of industrialisation. CHIEF DEPOSED IN OGUN--Ogun State Government has announced the deposition of Chief Adejoju Adeyemi as the Obamaja of Owu, Abeokuta. A government statement in Abeokuta said this was in exercise of their powers conferred by sub-section (1) of the section of the chiefs laws on the state government. According to the state, following the death of the former Olowu, Oba Adebowale Oyegbade, certain chiefs in Owu attempted to constitute themselves into a regency council and also paraded themselves as the prescribed authorities for the area. According to the statement, the government promptly wrote to warn against such illegal action and to state categorically that since the death of the oba, the prescribed authority which was delegated to him, in accordance with section 22 of the chiefs law, cap 19, had reverted to the government. The statement added that Chief Adeyemi in a subsequent letter to the government insulted the state Governor, Chief Onabanjo referring to him as "a complete stranger." "The government wrote again to ask him to withdraw the letter and to apologise within seven days, but not only did he twice refuse to receive the letter before it was finally registered but has neither withdrawn his letter nor apologised," the statement explained. BAUCHI POLYTECHNIC INSTITUTE CLOSED--The academic board of the Federal Polytechnic Bauchi has ordered the indefinite closure of the institution. In a letter addressed to the students yesterday, the Secretary to the Board, Mr. N.O. Maribe explained that the move followed the continued boycott of lectures by the students which had disrupted the institution's academic programme. He said the order took effect from 12 noon yesterday and that the students were expected, in their own interest, to vacate the hostels and the institution's premises. The secretary said further announcement would be made as and when due. A student of the institution told the New Nigerian yesterday that their continued boycott of lectures followed the "unconstitutional expulsion of six of their colleagues." He said proper channel was not followed before the decision to expel the students was taken. Efforts to get the view of the authorities on the alleged expulsion did not yield result. BENUE STATE GASOLINE SHORTAGE--For the past eight days, Benue State has been witnessing acute shortage of petrol. As a result most motorists in the state had to abandon their vehicles. A litre of petrol sells for 55 kobo in the black market, while the commercial transporters have capitalised on the situation by increasing transport fares by as much as 60 percent. For instance, a transport fare from Makurdi to Otukpo has gone from two Naira fifty kobo to four Naira. An investigation by the New Nigerian revealed that the effort of the state government which bought 12 petrol shuttling tankers, had not arrested the situation. Commenting on the situation, the Presidential Liaison Officer (PLO) in the state, retired Major Paul Dickson, said that the shortage was caused by a defective machine at the fuel pumping installation at the Port Harcourt refinery. He said that arrangements were going on to effect repairs on the defective machine. [Mohammed Salau] [Text] [Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 16 Dec 80 p 16]

PRICE INCREASE RESTRICTION--Price increases by manufacturers will be restricted to below 5 percent in 1981. In its budget proposals, the government said that companies that were granted price increases of over 5 percent in 1980 can only effect another price revision of below 5 percent in 1981 with the express consent of the Productivity Prices and Incomes Board (PPIB). For importers of all heavy industrial machinery for resale, a mark-up of not more than 25 percent on the C.I.F. is allowed. However, other approved costs may be added as was the case for 1980. Importers/dealers of motor spare parts are allowed to apply a factor of not more than 2.0 to the C.I.F. Other approved local costs however, may be added to arrive at selling prices. In all cases, price increases will not be allowed as a result of anticipated increases in costs, the government said. The income guidelines were also modified. In 1981, companies will be allowed to declare as dividends, up to 60 percent of the profit after tax. In the current year companies were allowed to declare up to 60 percent of after tax profit or 25 percent of the paid-up share capital, whichever was higher. This had enabled some companies that made low profits for the year to still pay higher dividends than they would have been able to pay under the 60 percent ceiling. In addition, the government has decided to regulate somewhat the payment of bonus shares. In 1981, it intends to forbid the creation of such shares on the basis of increases in reserves that derive from a revaluation of assets. [Text] [Lagos BUSINESS TIMES in English 16 Dec 80 p 1]

SECURITY FORCES UNCOVER ARMS CACHE

House Raided in Ndola

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 19 Dec 80 p 1

[Article by Saviour Chafungwa]

[Text]

ZAMBIA security forces from Lusaka and Ndola yesterday unearthed 90 AK 47 rifles and 112 magazines from a house in Ndola's Pamodzi township.

The raid party, led by Copperbelt police chief Mr Julius Zulu and his deputy Mr Levy Bwacha, was shown the house by a detainee who was flown from Lusaka by senior security officers in a Zambia Air Force plane.

The detainee is among Zambians and foreigners who were rounded up in connection with an attempted coup plot two months ago, and the arms cache was allegedly part of the arsenal the plotters had planned to use.

The unnamed detainee, who is apparently cooperating well with the security forces, told the team that there were 91 rifles, 36 loaded magazines and 36 empty magazines buried about three metres deep.

But he later changed his mind and said there were only 90 guns.

Paramilitary police took 20 minutes to dig up the arms.

The rifles were packed three in each plastic bag covered with sacks. According to one label written in German in one of the magazine plastic bag, the arms were bought on May 25, 1978.

The label did not indicate whether the arms and ammunition were from East or West Germany.

Mr Zulu explained to me later that he had received information on the hidden cache from Lusaka yesterday and later in the day officers from the capital arrived with the detainee. The raid took place just after lunch hour.

Declined

He declined to name the detainee, saying it would be improper as investigations were still continuing.

Mr Zulu could not say for how long the arms had been buried.

"I am happy that nobody tampered with these guns, especially armed robbers. Now you know what type of problems we have in this country," he said.

As the officers counted and cleaned the guns, residents converged on the house to have a glimpse of the arms cache.

Later, the rifles were loaded in a police vehicle and the party which I had accompanied, drove to Kamenshi police station under heavy armed guard where they repacked them in plastic bags.

The arsenal was later driven to Ndola airport where a ZAF aircraft was waiting and were flown to Lusaka under tight security accompanied by four security officers and the detainee.

In Lusaka, Police Inspector-General, Mr Crispin Katukula confirmed that he had dispatched his officers with one of the detainees to Ndola to retrieve the arms

"This is part of the investigations we are carrying out, but we cannot name the suspect at the moment," Mr Katukula said.

Killed

The coup plot was foiled on October 16 when a contingent of security forces raided a farm in Chilenge, 15 km south of Lusaka, after a tip-off from villagers.

During the raid, two of the insurgents were killed and one was injured. The then minister of Home Affairs Mr Wilted Phiri conceded at a Press conference that the men were heavily armed and did not look like amateurs at handling guns.

He could not say if any of the Zambian security forces had been killed or injured during the exchange of fire.

The gang fled into the bush, but several of its members were captured, including an undisclosed number of AK 47 rifles, magazines and maps of Lusaka showing strategic installations such as State House, Zambia Broadcasting Services building, military barracks and the international airport.

The security forces also captured ZAF, army, ZNS and Zambia Airways uniforms.

Two weeks later President Kaunda announced that the plotters had planned to overthrow the Government on October 16 and 17 but the Zambian security forces moved in swiftly to smash them 24 hours before they could strike.

He also revealed that among the plotters were former Katangese gendarmes.

Discovery 'Very Significant'

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 20 Dec 80 p 1

[Editorial]

[Text]

YESTERDAY a "Times" exclusive scoop gave the nation its first real taste of the shocking details behind last October's coup plot against the Party and its Government. It was, to say the least, a dramatic story.

It showed that slowly but surely Zambia's security forces are uncovering the gory details of the diabolical plan, hatched in South Africa and intended to be effected by hired mercenaries in collaboration with local dissidents.

The security forces dug out 90 AK rifles and 112 magazines from the yard of a house in Ndola's Pamodzi township which is only a stone-throw away from Ndola's Kalewa Barracks.

They were led there by none other than one of the men being detained in Lusaka in connection with the coup plot.

The number of the seized arms cache is frighteningly awful. It shows the seriousness of the plot and the determination to ensure its success.

There is no telling the magnitude nor the horror of the ruin to Zambia had those weapons been actually used by the coup perpetrators. There is also no telling how many more weapons are hidden elsewhere in Zambia.

Our only hope is that the security forces will still get at them, if any are still hidden, however slow the long arm of the law might be.

The discovery of the arms cache in Ndola is very significant. For the security forces it is a major breakthrough in their rather slow, drab and often cumbersome investigations given the nation's eagerness for rapid results in this particular case.

More importantly it puts a lie to the many doubting murmurs and even voices, local and foreign, as to the true existence of a coup plot as revealed by President Kaunda last October.

Those who thought it as a mere political prattle have now been disabused of that notion. The plot did exist and, as the President promised, its sordid details have begun to come out.

Hopefully more will be revealed in open courts when the police, now under a new minister, have finished their investigations and bring well-prepared cases to court.

But Zambians must not be complacent and think that the matter is now dead and buried. The unity of the State is still very much at risk.

It must be painfully recalled that only 45 of the estimated 200 "dogs of war" were captured when the coup plot was exposed. The remaining 155 are still at large.

Some of their weapons may now have been discovered, and others may still be lying hidden in our townships. But they are not so stupid as to stand around waiting to be captured.

It is incumbent upon every Zambian to be vigilant and expose the remaining members of the murderous gang and their weapons.

REPORTAGE ON NATION'S ECONOMIC PROBLEMS

Chisupa Asks for Urgent Solution

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 17 Dec 80 p 1

[Text]

A CABINET minister yesterday called for urgent solutions to the country's economic problems as foreign exchange continues to dwindle because of low production and poor copper prices on the world markets.

Minister of Commerce and Industry, Mr Remmy Chisupa, said in Lusaka that the high cost of imported raw materials and rising unemployment had adversely affected the economy.

The minister, who was opening the fourth general meeting of the Export Promotions Council, said the dwindling foreign exchange was making it difficult for commercial banks to open letters of credit "within tolerable time."

Mr Chisupa said the country should look at the prospect of using local raw materials "because herein will lie our salvation".

He said relying on imported raw materials in the face of foreign exchange scarcity was not only bad economic planning but also showed lack of commitment to the interest of the country.

Commending the recently launched "operation food production", Mr Chisupa said as an import substitution measure, the programme would go a long way to assist the country save the much-needed foreign exchange.

"I have a feeling that if we did not spend K60 million in foreign exchange to import food, the injection of this money in manufacturing industry would have made much difference to our essential supply situation," the minister said.

Meanwhile, Bank of Zambia governor, Mr Luke Mwananshiku, will this afternoon address a news conference, his special assistant, Mr John Muchinga, announced in Lusaka.

Announce

It was not known whether Mr Mwananshiku would announce results of the discussions the bank had been holding with a team from the International Monetary Fund (IMF) which arrived in the country last month.

Zambia is negotiating for another loan from the IMF to help reconstruct the economy believed to be in a crisis. Zambia first obtained about K322 million from the IMF about two years ago

● Britain's industrial production, crippled by recession, is continuing to fall sharply with no early signs of improvement, it was announced in London yesterday.

The central statistical office said manufacturing output dropped by 4.3 per cent in the three months from August to October this year compared with the previous three months and was down 12 per cent on 1979 levels.

There was no sign of any change in the downward trend during the months ahead, sources said.

Comparison to UK Situation

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 17 Dec 80 p 1

[Editorial]

[Text]

IT is good to recognise that Zambia's economy is in the doldrums. It is even better to take vigorous steps to improve it.

It is bad to create an artificial plastic society that is ignorant of the state of the economy.

It is worse to allow that plastic society to orbit around from one economic crisis to the other not knowing what is going on, what people are doing and how lima is developing.

So while Zambia mulls over her economic woes she can take consolation in the fact that those woes are not hers alone.

Many developing and developed countries are in the same boat. Britain for example is in a far worse economic crisis than Zambia. Unemployment there, although cushioned by social security, is very high.

No wonder that British politics are coming to the fore once more. There is the sharpening of the knives in both the ruling Conservative and the opposition Labour parties.

The Conservatives are at their sixes and sevens as to how to end Britain's continuing economic problems. Rather than find short-term and long-term solutions they are instead looking for luckless scapegoats.

The Labour Party, on the other hand, is in disarray and desperately searching for party unity needed for the attack on the now tottering government of Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher.

To achieve that unity the new leader of the Labour Party Michael Foot has been engaged in a delicate balancing act.

His "shadow cabinet" is balanced between right and left of the Labour Party. The exchange of jobs between Dennis Healey as shadow foreign secretary and Peter Shore as shadow chancellor is very significant.

Shore is an excellent economist. He is likely to bring a sharper edge to Labour's attack on Thatcher's economic policy because he is not tainted by monetarism himself as Healey is.

But Healey has a long experience in international affairs. He will bring authority to the Labour Party's foreign policy. But it remains to be seen though whether he has developed an interest in the vital issues of the Third World.

The fact that Foot has not given either his defeated opponent Tonny Benn or his fellow left winger Eric Heffer any prominent "shadow" posts is likely to increase resentment on the left.

This will only be partially appeased by the appointment of new left wingers such as Robin Cook and Jack Straw.

Be that as it may, the first greatest test for Foot as the new leader of the British Labour Party is yet to come.

That will be on January 24 when the party holds its special conference in Wembley to decide on how its future leaders should be elected.

Meanwhile no solution is in sight for Britain's economic woes. In Zambia we are trying very hard through lima.

Bank Governor's Assessment

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 18 Dec 80 p 1

[Text]

THE Zambian economy is in a bad state and the nation must brace for austerity measures the Party and its Government might take in order to survive.

This grim picture emerged when governor of the Bank of Zambia, Mr Luke Mwananshiku, called a Press conference yesterday at which he announced the country's unhealthy foreign exchange and balance of payments positions.

He said foreign exchange reserves had dwindled because copper and cobalt were fetching low prices on the world market while oil and maize import bills were ever rising.

Mr Mwananshiku's Press conference was prompted by Times of Zambia Opinions of December 10 and 12 which urged the Central Bank to indicate to the nation just what the position was.

Reacting to the December 10 Opinion, a Freedom House spokesman said: "The Party and its Government has allowed a free society and no information has been kept from the public to which it (public) is entitled."

The spokesman said Zambia's credit worthiness monetarily was outstanding as evidenced by loan agreements and "its financial position is sound."

The governor said while the volume of resources available declined, the foreign exchange needs had grown and this had worsened the situation.

The oil import bill rose dramatically from K77.1 million in 1979 to K122.9 million by last December 12.

Succeeded

Commenting on the high oil bill, Mr Mwananshiku said the increase announced by OPEC oil ministers' meeting in Indonesia yesterday would be an extra burden on the country's foreign exchange situation.

In spite of this, however, he did not think fuel rationing would be necessary because the country had succeeded in cutting down on fuel consumption although the high prices have had a counter effect.

He emphasised that in dealing with present imbalances in the economy, it would be necessary for the Party and its Government to take some corrective measures which must be supported by the whole country.

Although he declined to say what measures he would like to see taken, it was clear that next year's Budget would be tough.

The country spent K9.8 million on importing maize in 1979. This year's bill is K49.2 million. These amounts do not reflect some maize imports obtained by credit, the governor said.

Mr Mwananshiku said the increased earnings from copper and cobalt in February were temporary and influenced by speculative activity as a result of the decline in the values of major currencies.

He said the United States and Britain had taken fiscal measures which had substantially strengthened their currencies.

As a result, speculators had moved their assets from base metals back into paper money.

"This has reduced the demand for these metals and has resulted in the fall in prices we have experienced recently," he said.

Copper prices were at their lowest last week when they were K1,426 per tonne, from K2,457 in February.

Faced with these problems, the Party and its Government were monitoring the situation closely in a bid to take corrective measures.

"These measures must be supported by the entire nation if the economy is to recover," the governor said.

Asked to indicate what the measures might be, Mr Mwananshiku said he did not want to speak for the Government or pre-empt the Budget, especially that it was just around the corner.

The governor emphasised, however, that the problems Zambia was facing were not new but a continuation of the experience the nation has been going through over the last five years.

The governor said the Government has proposed getting a substantial amount from the International Monetary Fund (IMF), as a second loan and that a favourable consideration was expected.

An IMF delegation visited Zambia recently and held discussions with the Government aimed at entering into another cooperation agreement intended to correct the imbalance in the economy. These discussions would be resumed next year.

Bank Governor Praised

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 18 Dec 80 p 1

[Editorial]

[Text] TODAY it is hats off to the governor of the Bank of Zambia, Mr Luke Mwananshiku, for displaying rare courage to tell the nation the truth.

Now Zambia knows where she stands. Her economy is in real shambles. Foreign exchange reserves "are dwindling" and perhaps may dry up altogether. The official reasons are obvious.

Copper and cobalt are fetching very low prices on the world market while oil and maize import bills are rising steeply.

Stiff austerity measures is the prescription Mr Mwananshiku prescribes if the nation is to survive, and survive we must otherwise all hell will break loose soon.

But come to think of it all. It had to take four Opinion columns in this newspaper before the nation could be told the truth. Without that persistent grizzle the nation could still be in the dark regarding foreign exchange and the state of the economy.

The chairman of the Lusaka Chamber of Commerce, Mr Jas Watson on Monday, and the Minister of Commerce and Industry Mr Remmy Chisupa on Tuesday, tried to shed some truthful light.

But it was the bold Luke Mwananshiku yesterday who put the final seal to the truth.

Contrast this with the earlier diversionary hyperbole from Freedom House on the matter and one begins to wonder if there is a deliberate move to misinform the nation on certain issues.

For our part we hope we will continue to be allowed to get at the truth even if that means using unconventional methods like treading on people's toes where they are slow moving, or cutting corners.

Now that the nation knows the truth, it must produce more through Lima and brace itself for the bitter pill to cure its economic illness.

Its willingness to accept Mr Mwananshiku's prescription should be matched by a sharp reduction in Government spending through quangos.

A quango is a semi-government organisation which consumes wealth without producing any. All over the world there are big and small quangos. The UN, the EEC, the OAU are big quangos.

Organisations like the road safety committee are small quangos. To that must be added all levels of Party and Government spending that represents mere consumption and not production.

Expensive foreign trips which always eat up foreign exchange are a case in point. We hope the austerity measures Mr Mwananshiku foretold will include a ban on foreign travel by Party and Government leaders. They should learn to rely heavily on our embassies abroad.

If Government spending is not sharply reduced Zambia will have high taxation, high interest rates, high inflation and high unemployment with their attendant political and social upheavals.

Kaunda Explains Ills

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 20 Dec 80 p 1

[Text]

ZAMBIA's economic ills are not a result of the socialist path being pursued by the Party and its Government, President Kaunda said yesterday.

"We admit the economy is in bad shape, but this is not a result of our socialist principles, but because of external problems which are completely outside our control," the President said.

Besides this, these problems were caused by internal factors like laziness, inefficiency and indiscipline.

The President was speaking at Chongwe Secondary School in Lusaka Rural where he opened the fourth National Youth Council and second general congress of the Youth League.

In his address, Dr Kaunda attacked capitalism and urged the youth of Zambia to reject capitalist propaganda if the people were to have an equal share of the country's wealth.

The President admitted there were a few people in the Party and outside it who had rejected socialism but accepted Humanism.

Such people felt uneasy at the mention of the word socialism, he said, adding that these were good and loyal members of the Party who genuinely believed it was not possible to have socialism in Zambia without the use of force and the denial of fundamental human rights.

"They associate socialism with violence and attribute our economic problems to the socialist measures that we have taken," the President said.

But Dr Kaunda said there was no reason why socialism in Zambia should come about through violence because this would be a negation of the concept of Humanism and Christian values.

"Violence is not intrinsic to socialism, it is capitalism that is intrinsically violent. Even where socialism had been maintained through violence, it is because imperialist forces were on the offensive," he said.

Many of the arguments advanced against socialism were fallacious and arose out of the fear for the unknown. They were a result of an intensive propaganda directed against Zambia by her enemies.

The President urged the youth to draw up meaningful programmes to promote peace, love and agriculture and to fight crime and tribalism.

The youth must guard against tribalism and regionalism. They must fight them wherever they raised their ugly heads.

"Tell those who tell you to hate one tribe because you happen to be of a different one that you belong to one tribe of revolutionary youth of Zambia," he said.

Meanwhile, Minister of Finance Mr Kebby Musokotwane was re-elected chairman of the council for the third time and of the congress for the second time.

Problems

Before the President's speech, Chairman of the Youth and Sport Sub-Committee of the Central Committee, Mr Nalumino Mundia, said the youth of Zambia were facing many problems which he hoped the new executive would help to solve.

Elections for the league executive will be held tomorrow, it was learnt yesterday.

The poll will be conducted by the Party electoral commission and posts to be contested are secretaries for administration, finance, publicity and social affairs.

A statement issued by commission assistant director, Mr Gabriel Phiri and electoral officer, Mr Shadreck Kamana, said nominations would be held today.

People who wish to stand for elections should be Zambian citizens, members of the Youth League, aged between 16 and 35 and should be supported by five persons.

"A disciplined person without a criminal record, literate and conversant with the official language will qualify for nominations," the statement said.

MP'S, MINISTER SEEK CONTROL OF YOUTH LEAGUE

Five MP's Declared Candidacy

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 21 Dec 80 p 1

[Excerpt]

MEMBERS of Parliament and a Minister of State came out in full blast to control the UNIP Youth League at Chongwe Secondary School yesterday.

As nominations came up five MPs declared their candidature, including Minister of State for Youth and Sport Miss Zeniah Ndhlovu.

The minister said in a statement that she still wanted to remain administrative secretary of the league.

Others contesting the four posts at stake are Kafue MP Mrs Batsheba Ng'andu who is bidding for Miss Ndhlovu's post.

Kalengwa Member of Parliament Mr Mathew Makayi is contesting the post of social and cultural secretary. Ten more people are contesting the post.

Samfya MP Mr Mathews Kasongo is challenging Mr Njekwa Anamela for the post of publicity secretary.

The other hot battle is for the secretary for finance which is being contested by Keembe MP, Mr Robin Chivuno. The post is presently held by Mr George Kateka.

The elections are being held today after the Youth League conference was opened by President Kaunda.

Asked why he was standing for the Youth League elections when he was already an MP, Mr Chivuno said:

"I have done enough for Parliament, now I want to do something for the youth.

"I am prepared to resign my seat in Parliament if the people want me to serve in the Youth League," he said.

The last Youth League conference was held in 1978 at Mulungushi Rock in Kabwe.

When opening the fourth National Youth Council last Friday, Dr Kaunda attacked capitalism and urged the Zambian youth to reject capitalist propaganda if the people were to share the country's wealth evenly.

He said there were some people within UNIP and outside who had rejected socialism which the Party and its Government was pursuing, but had accepted Humanism.

The President urged the youth to ignore champions of tribalism and regionalism.

"You must fight them wherever they rear their ugly heads," he said.

"Tell those who tell you to hate one tribe because you happen to be of a different tribe that you belong to one tribe of revolutionary youth of Zambia," he said.

Minister "Too Old"

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 22 Dec 80 p 1

[Text]

MINISTER of State for Youth and Sport and Youth League administrative secretary, Miss Zeniah Ndhlovu, has been disqualified from contesting youth elections because she is overage.

This was announced by League Chairman, Mr Bautis Kapulu, at Chongwe yesterday who said the elections scheduled for yesterday had been postponed to today.

He said Miss Ndhlovu could not contest because she was beyond the stipulated age limit.

"The constitution says that candidates who contest league positions should be youths, and the age limit is from 16 to 35 years. Miss Ndhlovu is more than 35 years and she cannot therefore stand," he said.

On Saturday, Miss Ndhlovu said in a statement that she still wanted to remain administrative secretary of the league and was understood to have filed her nomination.

But Mr Kapulu said: "Miss Ndhlovu is not contesting the post because of a technical problem."

On the postponement of the elections, Mr Kapulu said this was because the electoral commission received more nominations than "anticipated."

"The electoral process is a long one. The commission received too many nominations and with commitments like the State House function this afternoon, the commission felt elections should be postponed," he said.

He did not say whether the postponement would delay the closure date, but according to the official programme, Party Secretary-General, Chona is expected to close the conference today.

The delegates were busy yesterday after forming committes.

The post of secretary for social and cultural was the most heavily contested with 14 candidates.

It is followed by that of secretary for publicity which has eight candidates, secretary for finance (five) and administrative secretary (four).

The full list of candidates is with positions in brackets: (secretay for administration), Mr Wisdom Mvula, Mr Norman Chipakupaku, Mr Kennedy Shepande and Mr Wilfred Mfune.

(Secretary for finance), Mr Robin Chivuno, who is MP for Keembe, Mr George Kateka, Mr Daniel Jericho, Mr Elijah Sitali and Mr Kennedy Kalutwa.

(Secretary for publicity) Mr Mathew Makayi who is Kalengwa MP, Mr Fred Chaoma, Mr Donald Chiyaka, Mr Njekwa Anamela and Mr Patrick Simwanza. Others are Mr Joseph Hampandu, Mr Betram Kakumbi and Mr Oliver Thole.

(Secretary for social and culture) Mr Martin Limata, Mrs Batsheba Ng'andu who is Kafue MP Mr Abson Simfukwe, Mr Betrice Aunkutu, Mr John Nkole, Mr Andford Singongo and Mr Clement Kasengele.

Others are Mr Duson Kadoyo, Mr Joseph Kasongo, Mr David Jere, Mr Kamusati Chibanda, Mr William Chanda, Mr Jeffrey Simfukwe and Mr Isdore Mundungani.

Mr Kapulu described the big turnout as an indication that democracy was alive in the league and said he was convinced the elections would be free and fair.

President Kaunda yesterday hosted a reception for the delegates to the UNIP Youth League conference at Chongwe Secondary School.

The reception was attended by Party Secretary-General Chona and his wife Yolanta, Secretary of State for Defence and Security Zulu, Minister of Defence Mr Wilson Chakulya and Minister of Finance Mr Kebby Musokotwane.

The youth were entertained at the reception by the Zambian national dance troupe, Green Buffalo Combo and the Zambia Army bands.

The Youth League conference was opened by Dr Kaunda last Friday.

MUZ REFUSES TO REINSTATE FIRED LEADERS

Mineworkers Union States Intent

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 22 Dec 80 p 1

[Text]

THE Mineworkers Union of Zambia will not reinstate leaders who have been sacked from the union.

MUZ deputy chairman Mr Timothy Walamba said in Livingstone yesterday that the union had no intention of reinstate the officials who were sacked for contesting ward elections contrary to union instructions.

"The Government can use its power but we shall use our very little power to show that we are against the decentralisation system."

Mr Walamba was seconding a vote of thanks from the general secretary of the Zambia Congress of Trade Unions Mr Newstead Zimba.

And deputy general secretary of the Zambia Electricity Workers Union, Mr Brown Zulu said the regrettable coincidence of the union's resolution in Kabwe and the coup plot should not be blamed on the labour movement.

Mr Zulu said the labour movement was still behind the Party and its Government.

"When we were drafting the resolution we did not know that there were some people who intended to overthrow the Government. How can we allow such a situation?" Mr Walamba asked.

Mockery

Mr Zimba said the International Monetary Fund was a mockery to African countries. He said where it operated the recipient countries did not benefit anything.

Mr Zimba said the ZCTU was behind the Party and its Government.

"People find it easy to accuse us of acts which are not of our interests and concern, let them go ahead for we know we have no interest in the political leadership of this country unless asked as citizens to serve in it," Mr Zimba said.

Mr Zimba said his union knew what treasonable acts are within the context of the law. "If our stand on certain issues affecting the working people is treasonable — then this is suicide for us, and it needs no sympathy."

Sources close to the MUZ said union officials would this week meet outgoing Copperbelt Member of the Central Committee, Mr Shadreck Soko to inform him of the decision.

Last month the union met Mr Soko in his office over the issue and since then the executive has met more than three times to resolve the problem of the shop stewards following the UNIP National Council resolution which ordered MUZ to reinstate them.

The union has received backing from the ZCTU with Mr Zimba saying that no disciplinary action should be taken against the organisation for implementing a decision taken at its Livingstone meeting.

Mr Zimba was commenting on a remark made by Prime Minister Lisulo that MUZ officials would be disciplined for refusing to reinstate the sacked men.

In Chingola seven of the fired shop stewards have since threatened to renounce their membership of the union unless the problem was solved.

Party Supremacy Spurned

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 21 Dec 80 p 1

[Editorial]

[Text]

THE supremacy of the Party has been spurned left, right and centre by the Mineworkers Union of Zambia.

What is the Party doing about this union's defiance of President Kaunda's order and the recent National Council resolution to have the 16 shop stewards who were sacked for taking part in the UNIP ward elections reinstated?

MUZ leaders have been holding "emergency" meetings since the instructions for reinstatement were given but those palavers have always ended in a deadlock — the latest being last Friday.

Even the talks the MUZ held with outgoing Central Committee Member for Copperbelt Mr Shadrock Soko have brought no positive results. It is like hitting against a stone-wall.

Now Mr Soko has been transferred to Lusaka and from the look of things his successor Mr Alex Shapi will have to start all over again.

Certainly the MUZ must be playing for time or else it is being downright impudent to authority.

Its futile argument is that since the decision to oppose the decentralised system was made at a biannual conference it will wait until that conference is convened in its own time and as stipulated in the union constitution.

It goes then that what the Party orders the MUZ to do will cut no ice. If that is the case the MUZ must be dealt with and be brought into line.

Union Stand Rapped

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 22 Dec 80 p 1

[Editorial]

[Text]

WE are cocksure that all the say-so in public by some leaders of the labour movement about backing the Party and its Government are pure eyewash. We have said umpteen times before.

Today we don't mince words for the Mineworkers Union of Zambia. It appears now that its leaders can dictate to the Party and its Government — and hope to get away with it.

To us the matter of the dismissed shop stewards is no longer for MUZ alone. It concerns Zambia and sets a precedent because President Kaunda and the National Council of the Party are involved.

Their orders have been ignored.

According to one MUZ official yesterday "the Government (and that means the Party) can use its power but we (the MUZ) shall use our very little power to show that we are against the decentralisation system."

As if that were not enough, in Kitwe Mr John Sichone, the MUZ secretary now attached to the Zambia Congress of Trade Unions the decision of yet another MUZ emergency meeting last Friday will be disclosed to Mr Shadreck Soko, the outgoing Copperbelt Member of the Central Committee.

Why has there been no official action yet? Who is being hoodwinked or in fact belittled in this case, if we may ask?

The MUZ counts on its large membership and drawing of those numbers from the mining parastatal companies — NCCM and RCM — for its vaunted strength among the employed Zambian population and the ZCTU, which it may be pulling by the strings.

But the Party, to which the MUZ is child, has the majority of its faithful among the villager and non-union Zambians.

The Party and its Government are not delaying action against this rank, impudent and uncompromising attitude of the MUZ for fear of a miners strike as implied by the very-little-power use threat.

For letting the MUZ to be the hoyden of the labour movement's attempts to scuttle a national purpose — the decentralisation system — now the Party and its Government may be laying throwing open the door for any reactionary to come in.

The Party and its Government have been accommodating enough on the decentralisation issue.

That buffeting from minions is not necessary now that the Local Administration Bill has been passed. We must get on with the job.

The MUZ is fully aware of the changes to the original bill and if it still insists in its opposition the Party and its Government will remove the kid gloves and show it the way out.

Unless there is still room for an opposition party to UNIP we don't see how the MUZ can justifiably be let off the hook. The President's and National Council's instructions must be obeyed.

ZIMBA CALLS FOR REVELATION OF IMF TERMS

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 22 Dec 80 p 1

[Text]

THE Government must disclose the conditions the International Monetary Fund has laid down for Zambia's second loan application because it is the workers who will eventually foot the bill.

Zambia Congress of Trade Unions general secretary Mr Newstead Zimba said yesterday that the Government should not keep quiet while negotiations were going on for the loan.

"Many leaders in developing countries have spoken out on the terms given by this financial institution. We should not keep quiet while negotiating for the second loan are going on," he said.

Mr Zimba added that it was "necessary" for authorities to consult the leadership of trade unions, manufacturers, commercial groups, heads of State enterprises and other leaders on the IMF loan.

The ZCTU chief was opening a seminar for union deputy chairmen and deputy general secretaries in Livingstone.

"We would like to know the conditions Zambia has been given for its second loan application because in the previous one we only learnt from a parliamentary policy statement that the IMF had imposed certain conditions."

He charged that stabilisation programmes by the IMF were said not to have improved the economies of the Third World for more than 25 years.

"We should not rejoice in having heavy debts which do not benefit the economic growth of our nation apart from placing the burden of adjustment on the backs of the poor and the middle strata in the names of the wage earners, self-employed, unemployed, peasants and other service workers," he said.

Mr Zimba said the labour movement and other organisations had a great responsibility in serving the nation.

UNIP SECRETARY GENERAL'S LETTER TO EDITOR PUBLISHED

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 20 Dec 80 p 4

[Text]

IN ADDITION to the statement issued by a Freedom House spokesman on your editorial of December 10, we recognise the genuine anxieties expressed by the editorial and accept the need for our news media to raise the consciousness of the people of Zambia through criticism and effective dissemination of information.

However, allow me to answer a number of questions which were posed in the editorial since, if these questions are allowed to remain hanging in the air, they may create an unhealthy atmosphere in the nation, characterised by speculative juggling with issues pertaining to the efficacy of the Central Committee and the Cabinet, and could further create a great sense of unease among members of the public.

Some of the questions raised by the editorial were:

(a) Why some Members of the Central Committee were absent at the last State House Press conference on December 4.

(b) Why in the following week there was a "special" meeting of the Central Committee, and whether this was connected to the coup plot and the 15th National Council.

(c) Why there had been silence on the nation's foreign exchange position which was said to have led to the visit here, recently, of the IMF.

An immediate answer was sought from the Bank of Zambia and Central Committee regarding the truth about foreign exchange and whether the nation was broke.

I have always thought that journalists, by profession, are supposed to be investigative; that is to search for the truth without fear or favour in order for the nation to move forward.

It is, therefore, surprising that you failed to investigate and then inform the nation about the true economic position of the country by asking the Chairman of the Economic and Finance Committee, the ministers of Finance, Commerce and Industry, Agriculture, Mining, the governor of the Bank of Zambia, the director-general of ZIMCO, National Commission for Development Planning, and by analysing data from the monthly digest of statistics, Bank of Zambia and the annual report of the National Commission for Development Planning both of which are published for every Zambian to know of the true economic affairs of this nation.

Free

Our Press has never been censored, in our democratic country, as regards knowledge of our economic performance which is contained in abundance in the speeches of His Excellency the President, and those of the entire leadership and leading officials of the Party and its Government.

The Press in this country is so free that what is regarded as wrong today is to answer the way I am doing in this letter.

It is therefore astounding for us to see the level of the nation's high standard of journalism degraded by such cheap insinuations that there is some state secrecy being kept by the Central Committee and Bank of Zambia when, in fact, it is the Press that have failed to seek for the information.

The IMF were in the country just as the EEC, the British businessmen, the USSR economic delegation and many others (from the East and West) who came to help us develop programmes intended to minimise the impact on us of the world economic depression.

Zambia is an active member of the IMF and has contributed to its resources.

In line with the practices and objectives of the IMF,

Zambia is free to approach that body in order to draw from it the resources necessary to help with any balance of payments problems.

Consequently, their visit at this time was normal and made in accordance with previous practices.

In fact, it is the duty of the IMF to visit member countries at least once every year.

Before the end of our last programme with the IMF, it was our mutual understanding that we would consider another programme if the first one went well.

The recent discussions with the IMF were therefore partly routine and partly related to this mutual understanding to explore the possibility of another programme.

Self-reliance

The programme of our economic recovery is not with the IMF alone. The IMF caters primarily for problems related to balance of payments and looks at the structural adjustments in the economy in so far as these are related to improving the balance of payments and creating growth.

Our economic recovery programme goes beyond the IMF.

We have to look at our own self-reliant efforts through the Liuna programme, foreign and internal capital flows in industry and agriculture generally and in such areas as the development of the emerald industry, uranium, gold and the new operation food production.

The Government has never made its borrowings secret. As a matter of fact, every loan agreement has been publicly signed and the amount revealed.

At no time has the minister of Finance refused to answer a question in Parliament regarding Zambia's foreign exchange situation at a given time. Zambia's standing in the world money market is still good.

Honoured

Except for the trade and other related payments, our country has so far honoured her international obligations.

What is called a special meeting of the Central Committee is only "special" in the myopic gaze of a professional speculator-cum defeatist.

In fact, the Central Committee, by establishing patterns, meets once every month to conduct its regular business of policy-making and the follow-up of previous decisions.

Similarly, Cabinet meets once or twice a month to advise the President and make decisions pertaining to the operations of Government and translate Central Committee decisions into concrete action programmes.

The Central Committee meeting this week was an ordinary and monthly meeting of the Central Committee.

His Excellency the President made reference to the Central Committee meeting when he explained why he could not speak at length at the swearing-in ceremony on December 9. The reason was that he was due to attend the late Bishop Philemon Mataka's funeral.

It is regrettable that a mention of the meeting should give rise to unnecessary speculations. I should add that at times we do have special (and not special) meetings of the Central Committee or Cabinet.

Meetings of leaders at any level are the democratic processes that have sustained Zambia, obliterated the danger of economic collapse — a ghost moulded and fashioned in the fictitious minds of all ill-fall speculators who believe in imaginary features as constituting their own elements of Zambia's decision-making process.

In fact, we have an order of making decisions in this country.

Members of the Central Committee who were absent from that Press conference, including the Right Hon Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Defence and Security were attending Parliament, thereby demonstrating the importance and role of Parliament and the democratic processes of running the affairs of the State.

It should not be expected that the Central Committee should develop a dialogue with the Press over such matters.

Surely, it is up to members of the Press to solicit information for themselves from the appropriate channels.

Our journalists have easy access to His Excellency the President (through his special assistant for Press) and to the entire leadership.

They know they are always welcome to telephone us and they often do so even at our homes at weekends or in the evenings.

They would have got a clarification on all these questions if they wanted.

Journalists in this nation must be independent and critical in order to share the truth.

They themselves have expressed this democratic principle many times over. This means they must also be independent of rumours and speculations and search for the truth which the people of Zambia need most.

M. MAINZA CHONA,
Secretary-General of the Party.

FOOTNOTE: After the December 10 Opinion, there was another on December 12 and subsequently the Bank of Zambia governor called a press conference on December 17 at which he spoke on the country's economy. [illegible]

The letter [illegible] appears to have been overtaken by events.

KALOMO PEOPLE DEMAND RETURN OF LAND

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 19 Dec 80 p 1

[Text]

THE people of Kalomo in Southern Province want to go back to the land which was allegedly grabbed from them by the colonialists in 1921 and 1947 when they were moved from fertile land to a hilly and waterless settlements.

Chief Sipatunyana informed the land commission in Livingstone yesterday that in 1921, the colonialists moved 21 villages to a hilly place.

In 1947, they again shifted 25 villages to the same area when they were apportioning farms for South African "Boers," he said.

"When we attained independence in 1964, the people thought they would be given back their land which the whites grabbed from them, but to their surprise this has not been done," the chief said.

He added that the areas which the villagers vacated were now farms.

"My people are living in an area where there is no water. They are living on land which is not fertile," he said.

Chairman of the Zimba/Livingstone Farmers Association Mr petrus Johannes Combrink said the land occupied by his members was of poor quality — mostly rocky hills with little permanent water.

"The remainder consists of Kalahari sand, shallow soils with decomposed gravel underneath and black damboe.

"This brings us into class four and five soils which is mostly unsuitable for arable agriculture. Our poor and erratic rainfall does not help matters," he said.

Mr Combrink said his 400 members occupied less than two per cent of the area of Zambia and yet produced nearly half of the country's agricultural needs with the exception of cotton.

He informed the commission that the Cold Storage Board of Zambia was keeping 15,000 hectares of land on which nothing was grown.

The idea behind acquiring the land was to keep cattle but no animals were kept on this piece of land.

Southern Province Central Committee Member Mr Mungoni Liso told the commission during a reception he held in its honour on Wednesday night that there was no land shortage in the province.

What the people there were crying for was already developed land and this shortage applied to other parts of the country, Mr Liso said.

Commission chairman Mr Justice Ernest Sakala said the commission would not operate outside its terms of reference.

NEW RAILWAYS MANAGER NAMED

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 17 Dec 80 p 1

[Text] Minister of Power, Transport and Communications, General Kingsley Chinkuli announced changes in Zambia Railways yesterday in which he confirmed Mr Richard Veenis as general manager.

Mr Veenis, 59, came to Zambia from Canada in 1966 as assistant general manager for development. He has been acting Zambia Railways general manager since last February when Mr Anderson Mazoka resigned.

In the changes which followed a series of closed meetings with senior management officials and railway workers, General Chinkuli also appointed two Zambians as assistant general managers in-charge of technical operations and administration.

In a statement issued in Kabwe after the meetings, General Chinkuli said Mr Veenis, who is on leave in Zimbabwe, would serve for a year "at the end of which the Party and its Government hopes to find a suitable Zambian to replace him."

The minister appointed Mr Bernard Chewe, 44, as assistant general manager in-charge of technical operations and Mr Cyrus Ndyamba, 39, as assistant general manager for administration. All the appointments are with immediate effect.

Mr Chewe joined Zambia Railways in 1966 as a shunter, but rose through the ranks to the post of operations manager which he held until his new appointment.

Mr Ndyamba joined the railways in 1966 as a checker, rising to the position of manager for administration and company secretary.

He holds a BA degree in business administration from the University of Regina in Canada.

Gen Chinkuli called for dedication to duty, discipline and cooperation between workers and management.

Loan

On the K33 million loan to Zambia Railways from the World Bank aimed at improving the operations of the system, the minister thanked the bank for the offer and urged all the workers on the line to look after the company assets properly.

The minister appealed to railway workers to be safety conscious as derailments had cost the system, Government and the nation thousands of Kwacha in property and human life.

Gen Chinkuli also saluted the Canadian government for the assistance that country continued to give to Zambia Railways.

He announced that the board of directors for the unitary system of Zambia Railways and the National Railways of Zimbabwe were currently meeting in Salisbury to discuss the question of sharing assets left by Rhodesia Railways.

The assets, mainly rolling stock, were held in Zimbabwe after the fall of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland in October 1963.

Zambia Railways chief accountant and acting financial controller Mr George Sikazwe, is representing Zambia at the talks. But Mr Veenis, though on leave in Zimbabwe, is said to be taking part in the negotiations.

Gen Chinkuli could not say anything about Benguela railway line which linked Zambia, Zaire and Angola to the port of Lobito, considered as one of the cheapest and shortest routes for Zambia to overseas markets.

The route, closed during the bloody civil war in Angola in 1975, has been under constant attacks by UNITA insurgents operating in southern Angola under Dr Jonas Savimbi's leadership.

Asked whether the return to power of President Milto Oboto of Uganda had paved the way for the reopening of the disbanded East African shipping line to which Zambia was a member, Gen Chinkuli said: "I don't know."

The minister was accompaied to Kabwe by ZIMCO executive director for energy and transport, Mr Patrick Chisanga.

NUBEGW CALLS FOR END OF UNNECESSARY OVERSEAS TRIPS

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 22 Dec 80 p 1

[Text]

THE Government should cut down on "unnecessary" overseas trips and freeze all unproductive political appointments if the nation's economy is to be salvaged from the doldrums.

This was one of the resolutions passed at the National Union of Building, Engineering and General Workers (NUBEGW) general council held in Kitwe over the weekend.

The union called on the Government to refrain from further "Tika" type projects but induce practical financial discipline in Government and parastatal institutions.

The council said political appointments in parastatals had contributed "immensely" to disrupt the economy and that these should be stopped.

"Since the economy is reeling towards total collapse the Government should cut down on unnecessary overseas trips, freeze all unproductive political appointments, refrain from further "Tika" type of projects and induce practical financial discipline in Government and state institutions," the council resolved.

The union said it treated with contempt recent statements from former trade unionist now in Government who used the unions as stepping stones to further their material ambitions.

The union pledged its support for the Zambia Congress of Trade Unions' stand now and in future for action taken because of the Government's failure to revive the flagging economy.

The union declared its support for the Mineworkers Union of Zambia (MUZ) stand for imposing "a timely" ban on "trade union dissidents."

AIR FORCE OFFICER ATTACKS PARTY, GOVERNMENT LEADERS' 'INSINCERITY'

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 20 Dec 80 p 1

[Text]

A SENIOR Zambia Air Force officer has blamed insincerity among leaders in the Party and its Government for the failure of the country's many development programmes.

Major Niven Kombe of the ZAF headquarters in Lusaka has now called on President Kaunda to be tough with such leaders.

He was seconding a vote of thanks to Dr Kaunda's speech.

Leaders in the Party and its Government were misleading President Kaunda because they made him believe that they were committed to national programmes when they were in fact the ones putting "roadblocks" in the path of several projects, he said.

Major Kombe charged that in public speeches, these leaders pledged loyalty to Dr Kaunda and spoke the same language as he did on various issues, but they preached the opposite elsewhere.

"You have given advice to people in conferences and in private

"There have been many important decisions which have been taken at these conferences but they are never implemented," he informed the President.

"We have watched with dismay how some of the leaders who shout slogans of loyalty and yet the same people counteract your policies," he added.

In order for the youth to take over the reigns of power from the present leadership, they should be well prepared for the task.

He appealed to the next executive committee of the Youth League to actively mobilise and prepare the country's youth for future leadership.

Major Kombe is one of the five officers from the defence forces attending the conference as a delegate.

Northern Province chairman of the Youth League Mr Jones Chibesa who moved the vote of thanks said the youth had been unable to implement the programme of action because of numerous problems.

He pledged that the youth movement would do its best to mobilise the masses behind the Party and assured Dr Kaunda that there was no room for tribalism among the youth.

"We hope tribalism will die with the older generation," he said.

OFFICIAL CALLS FOR REORGANIZATION OF TOBACCO INDUSTRY

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 22 Dec 80 p 5

[Text]

THE tobacco industry will collapse unless the Government reorganises the Tobacco Board of Zambia, a top union official said in Kabwe yesterday.

General secretary of the National Union of Plantation and Agricultural Workers Mr Stephen Silwimba suggested that the Government should turn the TBZ tenant farming schemes into viable agricultural satellites.

"The tobacco crop is a foreign exchange earner. Doing away with it will mean taking the tobacco industry back to square one."

He was commenting on complaints by about 50 workers at the Chibwe tenant scheme near Kabwe.

Mr Silwimba said he and his union executive held a meeting with TBZ management and officials from the Ministry of Labour and Social Services in Lusaka last week at which the matter was discussed.

Among subjects covered at that meeting was the abolition of TBZ provincial offices and the withdrawal of extension services which would now be rendered by the department of agriculture in the Ministry of Agriculture and Water Development.

Mr Silwimba said his union welcomed the move to reorganise the TBZ because all along it had been the "child" of the Government.

But he deplored the fact that the reorganisation would render 1,992 of his members jobless.

Keembe Member of Parliament Mr Robin Chivumo has meanwhile accused ROP of sabotaging farmers who grow sunflower in his area.

He said ROP had issued a circular which said the company would not accept a type of sunflower called big giant because it had little oil content.

NAMIBIA INSTITUTE CHIEF HONORED BY FRANCE

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 22 Dec 80 p 5

[Text]

DIRECTOR of the United Nations Institute for Namibia, Mr Hage Geingob, was on Friday given the French "Plames Academiques" award in recognition of his contribution to the institute.

French ambassador to Zambia, Mr Jacques Gasseau, pledged his country's support in offering more scholarships for specialist training to equip Namibians with knowledge to run their country effectively when it becomes independent.

Mr Gasseau described Mr Geingob as an expert in international relations and education, whose reputation was world-wide. "By making you an officer of the Palmes Academiques — the most highly prized decoration in my country — the French government wished to express the esteem it holds for the work you have accomplished at the UN institute."

Mr Geingob had imparted valuable knowledge to Namibian students who would shape the destiny of their country when it joined other independent nations, he said.

"My government also wishes to bring you within the ranks of our famous ancestors who equally had to face the long and painstaking ordeals to reach a stage where a new society free from entrenched privileges and prejudices will be established," Mr Gasseau said.

Mr Geingob said he did not expect to win the award, saying there were many people with high level political and educational qualifications who deserved it.

He said only education could bring about the "decency and dignity" of the Namibian people, — they should be given such facilities at all costs.

He called for more cultural exchanges among nations, noting that "without language there can be no communication. You cannot learn from others."

Mr Geingob holds a masters degree in international relations which he obtained from the New York school for social research.

SUCCESS OF TWIN RIVERS FARM PROJECT REPORTED

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 17 Dec 80 p 5

[Text]

TWIN-RIVERS farm, an NCCM agricultural project near Chililabombwe, is expected to make a profit of K1 million from the sale of farm produce this year, manager Mr Edgar Sutherland disclosed yesterday.

The figure was expected to shoot up by K250,000 at the end of five-year plan in 1984.

Mr Sutherland informed the Chairman of Rural Development Sub-Committee of the Central Committee, Mr Kapasa Makasa who was on tour of the farm that NCCM was phasing out the beef and piggery units to make way for dairy animals.

The two units would be moved to NCCM's sister farm at Chambeshi where cattle and piggery for consumption would be stepped up next year.

Apart from dairy and poultry farming, the farm had embarked on citrus fruit growing. At the moment, it had 1,000 various trees including apples which were expected to bear fruit next year.

At Chambeshi Mr Makasa, who was accompanied by Centralised Services Division general manager Mr James Vergeer, learnt that the farm sold between ten and 13 beef cattle per week, but it had a capacity to produce 2,000 when fully developed.

Mr Makasa wound up his tour of the Copperbelt by visiting Kalulushi Farm College and is expected to leave for Luapula Province today.

● Senior Chief Musokotwane and a Zambezi Ranching Company representative yesterday gave conflicting evidence to the land commission.

The two men said this in submissions to the land commission sitting in Livingstone.

Chief Musokotwane said there are three farms which were idle in his area.

He wanted his people to occupy the farms since they were in a tribal area for which he was the traditional ruler. The irony of the matter was that his palace fell in State land and he could be evicted by the State any time, he said.

Executive chairman of the Zambezi Ranching Company, Mr Leonard Tuffin told the commission chaired by Mr Justice Ernest Sakala that having regard to its past record of achievements and its plans for development, the company considered that there were no grounds for its operations to be reduced.

While embarking on a K500,000 expansion programme which started in March this year, the company had undertaken a long-term development plan to intensify its operations.

Mr Tuffin said six farms leased to the corporation were well used for food production but the main constraint to proper land utilisation was the lack of extension services particularly to traditional subsistence farmers.

He added that in line with the Party and Government policy of increased food production, the corporation last year engaged international consultants at a cost of K80,000 to prepare a long-term plan for intensifying and maximising food production at its Mazabuka farms.

He asked for an endorsement by the commission of assurances already given by various representatives of the Government not to interfere with the corporation's operations.

Mr Tuffin said in view of the long-term plans and expansion programmes the corporation had embarked upon, it was imperative that its operations were left intact. — Zana.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE BACKS ECONOMIC FEDERATION WITH NEIGHBORS

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 16 Dec 80 p 2

[Text]

THE Lusaka Chamber of Commerce and Industry has expressed concern at the poor flow of letters of credit to the business community which has now come almost to a standstill.

It has now called for the formation of a loose" economic federation with Malawi, Zimbabwe and Zambia for the economic betterment of the three countries.

In an interview in Lusaka yesterday chamber chairman Mr Jas Watson said it was possible the country's foreign exchange position had worsened.

"For the past few weeks business houses have not been able to secure letters of credit. I have failed to secure one myself," he said.

He feared that if no concrete steps were taken to remedy the situation, the present reasonable stocks would run down.

Explaining his feelings about the economic performance of the country so far, Mr Watson said it was evident the country was going through a difficult period.

The fact that commercial banks were not issuing letters of credit was indicative that there must be a shortage of foreign exchange.

He said the pipeline, too, was showing signs of extending while the supply position was slowing down.

"We used to obtain things within eight weeks or so from South Africa a few months ago, but now this is taking 14 or 16 months and soon it will be like buying from Europe," said Mr Watson.

The chairman said although Zambia had a good record in honouring her debts it was wrong for people to be over-optimistic.

But he said the country only needed one good farming season to put the economy into the upswing again, and that now was the time to invest.

"I wish to appeal to both local and foreign investors that the time to invest in the country is now and the Government should speed up the release of the revamped Industrial Development Act," said Mr Watson.

He added: "The country has had worse periods before and has survived. We will survive. But this does not mean we cannot avoid some of this."

Turning to the federation, Mr Watson said that this would boost free trade among the three countries with safeguards for each country's producers.

ZAF ORDERED GOODS ILLEGALLY, COURT TOLD

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 19 Dec 80 p 1

[Text]

ZAMBIA Air Force has in the past bought goods, including vehicles, worth millions of Kwacha allegedly without the authority of the tender board, a Lusaka magistrates court heard yesterday.

ZAF warrant officer, Narayanaswamy Gopidas, stunned the court when he said ZAF authorities were allegedly not strict with their regulations regarding the purchase of goods.

Warrant officer Gopidas, who is assistant local purchasing officer was giving evidence in a case in which suspended ZAF commander, Major-General Christopher Kabwe, and three other men are charged with cheating, importing without paying duty and receiving property believed to have been unlawfully obtained.

Denied

They have denied the charges.

On the first count, it is alleged that Moses Mulenga, managing director of Swazam, and Major Elton Mumba last April 29 induced the Zambia National Commercial Bank to remit 72,000 Rand to Swaziland Radio International as purchase price for six Peugeot cars and one Mercedes Benz truck purportedly ordered by Mfuwe Investments of Lusaka.

The second count is that Mulenga and Mumba between March 13 and August 7 imported six Peugeot cars and a Mercedes Benz truck without paying K70,000 duty.

The third count alleges that Major Kaluba Mbeule, 34, a ZAF officer, between August 13 and 15 received a Peugeot 504 worth K16,000 from Mulenga knowing that it was unlawfully obtained.

Mr Gopidas said on March 14 Captain Yelesu Banda (then a lieutenant) allegedly instructed him to raise Local Purchase Order (LPO) for three Peugeot cars on behalf of Mumba.

He said he signed for the LPO but later saw it had been altered to read four cars and that there was no tender board authority to buy the vehicles.

He recalled that Mumba had allegedly instructed him to sign an LPO for the order of eight buses.

Cross-examined, Mr Gopidas said sometimes ZAF obtained goods after approaching the suppliers verbally.

Originally, Mumba and Kabwe were alleged to have received a Peugeot 504 worth K16,000 knowing it was stolen.

It was at first alleged that Mulenga stole five Peugeot 504s and a Mercedes Benz truck all valued at K96,000, but prosecutor, Assistant Superintendent Nickson Banda, withdrew the charges of theft against the four.

The trial was adjourned to January 6.

In our story yesterday, we said that Zambia Army officer, Major Ronald Christopher Chansa was found guilty on three counts of theft and jailed for three years with hard labour and that the sentence were to run concurrently.

Chansa, 31, was in fact jailed for three years on each count and the sentences are to run consecutively. That means he will serve nine years.

We regret the inconvenience the mix-up might have caused to parties involved.

MAJOR CHANSA JAILED FOR THREE YEARS

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 18 Dec 80 p 1

[Text]

A ZAMBIA army officer, Major Ronald Christopher Chansa, was yesterday found guilty on three counts of theft and jailed for three years with hard labour to run concurrently, by Lusaka senior resident magistrate, Mr Noah Kabamba.

Chansa, 31, of Arcadia Barracks was found guilty of stealing firearms and ammunition worth K1,480 belonging to ZAPU-ZIPRA forces last year.

Dressed in a grey suit, green shirt and spectacles, Chansa looked calm as he was led away by police to the cells while his wife looked on.

In his judgement, Mr Kabamba described Chansa's conduct as that of a dangerous criminal and his conviction was to deter army officers from committing similar offences.

Chansa pleaded not guilty to the three counts of theft by public servant.

The court heard that on August 27 last year, being employed as an officer in the then Zambia National Defence Forces (ZNDF), Chansa stole two rifles, a bayonet and 500 rounds of ammunition worth K570 from the Government.

The prosecution further testified that on August 22 the same year, Chansa stole another 500 rounds of ammunition and a rifle worth K360. The third count was that on September 30, he stole a sniper rifle worth K260 from his employers.

During a lengthy trial, a soldier, Ozby Mwaiji, said he was a storeman keeping weapons and ammunition for ZAPU freedom fighters when on August 17, Chansa asked for weapons pretending to have been sent by the army commander.

Mr Mwaiji led Chansa to the store where he took two new weapons, a bayonet and two boxes of ammunition. On August 22, Chansa went back to exchange one weapon since he claimed it had a bad sight and requested for another box of ammunition.

Mr Mwaiji said he did not have receipts nor register the items Chansa took because the latter always seemed in a hurry. He had no alternative but to give him what he had asked for because he was his superior.

Major Augustine Mutale of Arcadia Barracks who was holding other Zambian servicemen in the hospital, said while conducting a raid of Lusaka South Camp, he was informed by Mr Mwaiji that Chansa had collected these weapons and ammunition from the camp.

Detective chief inspector Pumulo Mayuma of Lusaka Central Police described how on December 23, he found a rifle and a bag of ammunition under a bed at the house of a Mr Wilfred Mwesa of Chilenje South in Lusaka where son, Godfrey, said the items had been left by Chansa.

Constable David Phiri of Mandevu police said he took a rifle belonging to ZIPRA forces after arresting Chansa for alleged possessing.

Lusaka lawyer, Mr Sam Amos Mumba, told the court that he bought a gun from Chansa and later demanded money back after discovering that the weapon belonged to the ZNDF.

Mr Kabamba said there was sufficient evidence from the prosecution to convict Chansa on all three counts although there were a few discrepancies in the case.

Mitigating for Chansa, Colonel Alexander Kawanga Mackenzie, said he had known Chansa since 1966 and later worked with him in the army and his performance had been "excellent".

Chansa's counsel Mr Weston Mwanamba, pleaded with Mr Kabamba to consider leniency since his client was a first offender. He was sacked and stripped of his property and to have been stolen by him had been recovered.

Mr Kabamba said Chansa's conviction was a disgrace to the army and wondered what he was going to do with the firearms and ammunition he had stolen.

This was dangerous if the items were allowed to fall into wrong hands.

SEDITION CHARGE DISMISSED--Two men charged with publishing seditious material calling on President Kaunda to resign have been acquitted by Ndola senior resident magistrate, Mr Claver Musumali. Mr Musumali said it was established the seditious papers were found with Chisala Mukonto, 38, of Washa farm on the Kabwe Road and Abel Mukuka Chileshe, 43, of Mwata Kazembe Crescent, Ndola. The circulars were sent to State House and to Chief Justice Annel Silungwe. The magistrate found the people mentioned in the preparation of the circulars, Mrs. Dainess Kunda, a typist at Zamox and Miss Lume Kolala of Burroughs Machines, had admitted in court they worked on the circulars. Mr. Musumali said the only issue at stake was the determination of whether the contents of the circulars were seditious. The magistrate described the meaning of sedition as: "A publication raising any word, sign or visible presentation expressive of a seditious intention." He said he understood seditious intentions to mean advocating the desire to overthrow the Government established by law or bring into hatred or contempt such a government. ZNUT OFFICE TO SHUT DOWN--The Zambia National Union of Teachers is to close down its Mongu office because of shortage of funds, a report by acting general secretary, Mr Albert Chibale has said. According to Mr Chibale's report presented to a ZNUT executive meeting at Chongwe near Lusaka, the decision to close the office was aimed at cutting down on expenses. The meeting was called to discuss the report of the Government administrative committee of inquiry which recommended pay rises for public servants. The report urges union accountants to help putting the union on a sound financial footing. The report says: "Do not hesitate to point out any mistakes or misuse of union finances when you notice any of these malpractices." Mr Chibale said his union had reorganised its farm in Lusaka's Chamba valley to generate funds for its operations. [Text] [Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 17 Dec 80 p 1]

ARMY VETS PROTEST--Members of the Commonwealth of Ex-Servicemen League of Zambia in Ndola have threatened to march to Lusaka and see President Kaunda to protest against the Ministry of Labour and Social Services' decision to restrict the age limit for Zambia After Care War Fund recipients to 70 and above. Administrative secretary of the league, former sergeant-major Yardley Mwanza, charged in Ndola yesterday that his members were "very annoyed with the ministry." "We have received a circular from the secretary of the board of trustees informing us that applicants to the fund who are below 70 will not get money from the fund until they reach that age," he said. Members were puzzled at this decision because all along 60 had been the age limit for applicants. Mr Mwanza said if the ministry did not reverse the decision, his members would ask Member of the Central Committee for Copperbelt Province Mr Alex Shapi, to allow them to go to Lusaka. "We want the President to see for himself in what condition old soldiers are in and whether they can still live for the next ten years. We want this money before we die," Mr Mwanza said. The decision was made in September and communicated to members of the league by the acting secretary of the fund, Mr B. Chileshe. He says in the circular members below the age of 70 would have their applications for funds rejected and that the board would only consider applications from 70-year-old and above or those who were incapacitated. GROWING RICE ENCOURAGED--People in Mulema village in Chief Chitimukulu's area in Kasama have been urged to make full use of facilities provided by the Party and its Government to grow sufficient rice to meet local demand and for export. Speaking at a meeting held at the village yesterday during the continued tour of his Lukashya constituency, Minister of State for Mines, Mr Fabiano Kalimaposo, said the area and other surrounding villages in the Chambeshi flats have potential for rice production for both local and foreign markets. Villagers in the Chambeshi flats produced 8,990 bags of rice last season. This accounted for about 90 percent of the production of rice in the Northern Province.--Zana [Text] [Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 18 Dec 80 p 2]

PORTUGUESE SCHOLARSHIPS--Zambia has accepted several scholarships from Portugal and is keen to increase areas of bilateral cooperation between the two countries. Foreign Affairs Minister Professor Lameck Goma said this in Lusaka yesterday. Prof Goma toasted Portugal's role in the Southern Africa liberation struggle. Speaking during a luncheon for outgoing Portuguese ambassador to Zambia, Mr Antonio Andrede, Prof Goma said the 1974 coup in Portugal had helped to speed up the independence of Mozambique, Angola and finally Zimbabwe. The events which had taken place in the aftermath of the coup had meant that Zimbabwean nationalists had been afforded a base in Mozambique from which they had launched a successful freedom war, he said. Reviewing relations between Zambia and Portugal, the minister told guests at the luncheon which was also attended by Minister of State for Home Affairs Chieftainess Nkomeshya, that existing cordial relations would increase international understanding since this would reduce confrontation between them at various forums. Mr Andrede said Portugal would continue to support the nationalist cause in South Africa and Namibia. "Portugal wants more countries to be free in this area. We have an important duty to accomplish in this sub-continent," Mr Andrede said. [Text] [Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 19 Dec 80 p 5]

RICE MILL OUTPUT LOW--The rice processing mill in Luapula is operating under capacity because of low rice production and poor handling in the province. Senior projects officer for Zambia Horticultural Products (Zamhort) Mr John Muzumara said yesterday that the mill was capable of handling 15,000 bags of 80 kg paddy rice. He said at present the mill is only handling 1,000 kg which is far below the required volume for operation. Mr Muzumara explained that the 1,000 kg of rice is bought from the Northern Province Cooperative Union in Kasama to keep the plant running. He said for the past three years Luapula Province statistics showed reduction of rice production. There was no improvement. Mr Muzumara said initially it was thought that by building the rice mill in Luapula, rice production would have improved tremendously but this was not so. Mr Muzumara said Zamhort faces a problem with the price control system.--Zana [Text] [Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 18 Dec 80 p 4]

NAKAMBALA 'RIOTERS' ACQUITTED--There was jubilation and dancing at Mazabuka magistrates court on Wednesday when 11 Nakambala Sugar Estate employees were acquitted of rioting. Relatives and friends carried the freed men shoulder-high while others shed tears of joy when magistrate Mr Rodrick Sang'andu, passed judgment. The magistrate said he could not convict them because of the conflicting evidence. Mr Sang'andu said the conflicting evidence had been compounded by mistaken identities and misconception of what constituted a riot by the prosecution. The men, who pleaded not guilty to rioting during the controversial K156 annual salary increase early this year, were Alfred Mubanga, Tandywell Mutonga, Lambi Chiliba and Warren Chimata. Others were George Mutelo, Raphael Mudenda, Lameck Kambela, Pius Hanyati, Mweemba Michelo, Henry Wachimanta and Edwin Simasiku.--Zana [Text] [Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 19 Dec 80 p 5]

SIAVONGA EXPECTS BOOM--With peace finally returning to the Zambia-Zimbabwe border, Siavonga, on the shores of Lake Kariba, is destined for a boom time and become a leading holiday resort. Siavonga authorities have urged the Government to extend the township's boundaries following a deluge of applications from businessmen scrambling to set up industries there, mainly holiday resorts. Outgoing district secretary Mr Petros Mbewe said there was a scramble for land after a ceasefire between Zambia and former rebel Rhodesian troops. And businessmen who have gone into the kapenta fishing in Siavonga have complained that lack of nets has hampered their business. Mr Norry McDougall, a partner in Kariba Enterprise Limited, said although there was potential that fishermen could catch 4,000 tonnes a year from Lake Kariba, they faced the nets problem because the manufacturers did not have enough foreign exchange allocations this year to bring in the necessary materials. KAUNDA MEETS BANK CHIEFS--President Kaunda yesterday met Bank of Zambia governor Mr Luke Mwananshiku and heads of commercial banks in the country to discuss the state of the country's economy, State House spokesman said last night. The talks lasted one-and-a-half hours and the President briefed the bank leaders on the state of the country's economy and the measures the Party and its Government were taking to reactivate the economy. The spokesman did not give further details, but added that bank leaders assured Dr Kaunda of their continued support. The spokesman said Dr Kaunda had lunch with the bank leaders, who included Bank of Credit and Commerce International chairman Mr Vernon Mwaanga, Bank of Zambia general manager Mr Michael Mwape, governor, Mr Mwananshiku, Zambia National Commercial Bank, managing director, Mr John Mwape and officials from Citibank, Grindlays, Development Bank of Zambia, Barclays and Standard banks. SWEDISH SURVEY OF COOPS--Two Swedish consultants recruited by the Swedish International Development Authority (SIDA) to probe the future role of the Zambia Cooperative Federation (ZCF) have prepared their preliminary report on their survey, a spokesman said in Lusaka. The two, Dr Sven Holmstrom, an agricultural economist and Mr Soren Anderson, a master in business administration, were recruited from Swedish Farmers' Service, a subsidiary of the cooperative federation of Swedish farmers and are expected to submit a final report next year. The spokesman said the survey had been carried out because of the apparent need for ZCF to build up resources in order to become the service organisation for its affiliated cooperative unions and societies. During their survey the two consultants visited Southern Province Cooperative Union (SPCMU) and held discussions with its members.--Zana [Text] [Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 20 Dec 80 p 2]

CHINESE PRAISED--Zambia is grateful to China for undertaking projects which the nation's critics considered as impossible, Minister of State for Agriculture, Mr Justin Mukando, said in Lusaka. He was speaking at a reception held in honour of Chinese vice-minister for state farms and land reclamation, Mr Chao Fan. He said China had undertaken projects which some countries and critics said could not be done. These projects included the Tanzania-Zambia Railways, Lusaka-Mongu road, radio relay stations at all provincial stations and the Kafusha rice scheme. It was against this background that Zambia regarded China as an all-weather friend, Mr Mukando said. "It is in this spirit that Zambia has once again called upon China to assist in enhancing the food production programme," he said. In reply, Mr Chao said Zambia had given a lot of support to China in her fighting against all forces of evil adding that his country should also strive to help Zambia develop her agricultural industry. He said members of his delegation were impressed by the arable land Zambia had and were willing to help develop it. Mr Chao and his delegation arrived in the country two weeks ago and has visited suitable areas where State farms will be set up.--Zana [Text] [Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 20 Dec 80 p 2] President Kaunda has hailed the Chinese government for the help it has rendered towards the development of the country. SOVIET AID PLEDGED -The Soviet Union has pledged to continue giving technical assistance to Zambia in all fields. Chief of the department of foreign relations in the Soviet ministry of education, Mr Nikolay Mishurov said in Kitwe at the weekend that his country was prepared to help Zambia in any field as long as requests were made in the proper channels. Speaking when he was welcomed to Kitwe by mayor Mr Sunday Chiluba, Mr Mishurov said his ministry was happy with the way teachers from his country were being treated in Zambia. "We shall remain in Zambia and continue to help in all fields as long as we are still needed. He said the Soviets were aware of Zambia's requirements. "We are still willing and we shall continue helping Zambia in any fields but such help can only come through contacts between the two countries in the established channels," he said. He said the Soviet Union was willing to assist school leavers get basic skills "which will eventually land them in the beginnings of their working life." He said he was aware cities like Kitwe were growing fast and as a result there was need for added services. Mr Chiluba said President Kaunda held the Soviet Union in high esteem because of the help that country had rendered to Zambia. "Our political systems are similar," the mayor said. STATE TO SAVE COLLEGE--The Government is to take over Kalulushi Farm College to save it from total collapse, director Mr Feston Kamaloni said yesterday. "The Government is in the process of finalising details of the takeover of the farm with various bodies involved in its operations," he said. He declined to elaborate but said the Government was expected to take over the college next month. Mr Kamaloni, who was attending an emergency board of governors meeting yesterday, admitted that the college was facing a serious financial crisis. He said the K60,000 annual grant from the Government was inadequate. The college's plight came to light on Tuesday when Chairman of the Rural Development Sub-Committee of the Central Committee Mr Kapasa Makasa, toured the premises. Mr Makasa said after the tour the situation was sad and that 300 pigs were being fed on layers' marsh meant for chickens while students and staff lived in dilapidated buildings. College sources said the institution had failed to admit new students this year because of lack of funds. Mr Makasa directed provincial agricultural officer Mr David Kajimo, to help the college obtain stockfeed from the National Milling Company to save the animals. MAIZE NEEDED--Zambia's consumption of maize now stands at 9 million bags per year, chairman of the Rural Development Sub-Committee of the Central Committee, Mr Kapasa Makasa, has said in a special working and policy paper. The paper, which is the basis of discussions Mr Makasa held with Copperbelt Commercial Farmers, Party and its Government leaders and agricultural officers in the Copperbelt Province, contains a detailed analysis of both the Lima and Operation Food Production Programmes to which the Party and its Government are committed. He will discuss the same paper in Luapula and other provinces he is visiting. Mr Makasa says in the paper that Zambia's estimated food consumption and requirements as at October 31, this year showed that the country is now consuming 750,000 bags of maize monthly putting the figure of maize consumption at 9 million bags a year. He said stocks of maize as at the same period, this year, were put at 3.8 million bags, and maize required for importation is now in the region of 2,822,333 bags and this works out at a cost of 38 million south African rand, which is the equivalent of K45 million in foreign exchange. He explains in the paper that approximately 55 percent of the maize production had come from small-scale producers in the rural sector. [Text] [Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 18 Dec 80 p 1]

TWO STATE FARMS--Two State farms will be established at Kambilombilo and Munkumpa in Ndola Rural, provincial permanent secretary Mr Jordan Munkanta has announced. Mr Munkanta said the two farms will cover a total hectarage of 90,000 and that the Ministry of Agriculture and Water Development was carrying out a survey on the soils aimed at establishing suitable crops to be grown. Mr Munkanta, who was speaking at this year's provincial chiefs council meeting, said with the wheat project at Mpongwe and the establishment of two farms, agricultural production in Ndola would be boosted. The permanent secretary explained that his province had registered its Marketing Cooperative Union which comprises 22 primary societies ready to take over the marketing functions of Namboard by next April.--Zana [Text] [Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 19 Dec 80 p 1]

MAGNITUDE OF LIBYAN INTERVENTION IN CHAD QUESTIONED

Paris LE MONDE in French 23-24 Nov 80 p 26

[Text] There is growing disagreement over the matter of the presence of Libyan troops in the capital of Chad, where confrontation is continuing between the partisans of Hissene Habre, leader of the Armed Forces of the North (FAN) and those of Goukouni Oueddei, president of the Provisional National Union Government (GUNT), the chief of state and leader of the Popular Armed Forces (FAP), who are now fighting in close collaboration with the Chadian Armed Forces (FAT) of Lt Col Kamougue, the vice president of the GUNT.

On the FAP side, they denied, on Friday, 21 November, that there was any direct involvement of the Libyan Army even though in the FAN camp they continue to assert that they "possess incontrovertible proof of Libyan presence alongside the FAP."

For their part several western journalists who, from the Cameroonian city of Kousseri, were able to go to Ndjamena, said on Friday that they could in no way confirm the presence of Libyan troops despite information recently reported by the Pentagon (LE MONDE, 21 November), noting the presence of from 3,000 to 4,000 Libyan soldiers in Chad. These journalists, it is true, were not permitted by the FAP to go to the combat zone. On the other hand, they were able to observe attacks, now daily, by a Tupolev 22 bomber of Soviet manufacture apparently belonging to the Libyan Air Force and the presence, in Chadian air space, of a Libyan helicopter of the Chinook class, of American manufacture.

On passing through Paris, Thiam Tidjani, spokesman for the GUNT, stated that his government "called upon Libya for help in putting down the rebellion" and denied that the leaders in Tripoli wanted "to destabilize the countries of the western Sahara region." Tidjani added, "If a country other than Libya intervened in Chad some governments would not have reacted unfavorably."

At the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, where we are reminded of the recent remarks by Jean Francois-Poncet, that France "is following with close attention" the developments in the Chadian situation, they assert that they are not in a position to confirm the presence, at the gates of Ndjamena, of an expeditionary force as large as that noted by the Pentagon. Moreover, French experts in African matters are showing skepticism with respect to Libyan capability of sending an expeditionary force representing nearly a tenth of the strength of of the regular army--to a distance so far removed from its rear--at a time when large concentrations of Libyan troops are also noted at the Tunisian and Egyptian frontiers.

ISLAM, STABILITY IN WEST AFRICA DISCUSSED

Paris DEFENSE NATIONALE in French Nov 80 pp 107-118

[Article by Jean-Paul Charnay]

[Text] In this article Jean-Paul Charnay, director of the Center for study and research on strategies and conflicts at Paris IV Sorbonne, evokes for us the realities of an African Islam which has its own characteristics, particularly as a result of the existence of great confraternities such as the Tijaniya and the Qadiriya; and its own sociocultural realities, arising in part from French and British colonization. This Islam, however, cannot remain isolated from the Moslem world. One can quite properly wonder what destabilizations will confront this continent, likely rather soon to become the theater of very harsh conflicts.

Various recent developments, John Paul II's trip to Africa, and declarations by Giscard d'Estaing on the three-sided developments in the Gulf, attracted attention to the cultural and religious factors in Black Africa's international relations. Without commenting on the above-mentioned developments, one can note certain elements of political equilibrium and of political destabilization which are the function of a contemporary phenomenon: the expansion of Islam.

1. Stratigraphy of Trends

African Islam is conventionally described as basically resembling an ethnic brotherhood. Even today most of the social and human fabric of the rural population is held together by traditional rural brotherhoods, Tijaniya, Qadiriya, moderate Hamallists, inspiring a popular mysticism serving to tranquillize a stable peasantry. The special case of Mouridism, for the rural peasantry of Senegal, can also be cited; it is outside traditional Sunnite orthodoxy, but seems to be strengthening its financial power, based on peanuts, through modern investments and encourages a proselytism extending beyond its place of origin, even, it is said, reaching American Blacks.

It is also usual to see tensions and conflicts between Moslems arising from the differences between ethnic groups, where each one wants its own mosque, and between brotherhoods. Various trends now weaken this system of alternate opposition and coexistence among localized communities, and reveal a new social stratification.

Islam revival seems to arise from an ideological union between the merchant class carrying out a primitive capital accumulation, a few members of the liberal professions, and certain parts of the peasantry seeking a cultural and socioeconomic advancement through urban emigration or agricultural improvement. Thus a stratum of middle-and-large planters, merchants and truck transport entrepreneurs assumes increasing importance. Without having to be systematically examined, their faith eludes close scrutiny. They secure their social standing and economic status through financing the construction and maintenance of mosques or medersas, either directly or through cultural associations. One can thus cite the Senegal Union for Moslem Progress, the Ivory Coast Moslem Cultural Center; the recent Abidjan Islamic Congregation of members of the Ivory Coast Republic, the Niger Islamic Association, the Upper Volta Moslem Community, the Cameroon Islamic Cultural Association, the Tanzania Muslim Council, the Supreme Moslem Council of Kenya (SUPKEM). These private law associations (the old law of 1901 in French speaking countries) operating in a context of state secularity, have at their head businessmen in the traditional style or the "entrepreneur" style, (beyond a certain economic threshold the distinction between the two becomes vague); learned religious men generally possessing a good understanding of the West; and intellectuals with European training: members of the liberal professions or teachers. These associations have rather extensive structures: they have their executive bureau, committees specialized in religious affairs, in national affairs, cultural, youth affairs and in teaching; there are also locally established sections. They appear to have little to do with, or only have correct relations with, the traditional brotherhoods of Tijaniya, with its popular mysticism or the nonextremist Hamalliya. Because of their more modern institutionalization, the makeup of their directive bodies, their economic vigor and their social welfare activities, they should achieve a level of intellectual depth and political action that can earn them the status of privileged interlocutors vis a vis their governments, the Arab countries already subsidizing them, and the cultural affairs branches of other countries.

Isolated from other movements, the wahhabite movement is made up of merchants having perhaps less economic influence but a great tenacity and a great antiwestern solidarity. Calling themselves Sunnite, and proclaiming a puritan, even rigid Islamic faith, this minority, both ingrown and activist, has broken off from other Moslem movements which condemn its intransigence. It seeks to preach in places where it is not established, condemning traditional modes of brotherhoods and of Islam, orthodox yet reformist, of cultural associations. [as written in text] The split is real in the Ivory Coast Republic. In Upper Volta, during the conflict with Mali in 1974, bloody combats occurred at Bobo Dioulasso. Since then this movement has been creating its own associations, having them legally recognized by the state for both independence and protection. The situation is thus calmer but psychologically, mutual hostility continues. The Wahhabites refuse to pray in mosques of other movements--very significant conduct and contrary to the claims of unity of the Moslem community.

Also to be noted is the appearance of an in-growing extremism which has developed in some villages taken over by a charismatic leader. This phenomenon, qualitatively if not numerically significant, certainly is not new. It is found, in fact, at the origin of a certain number of warring empires, when one changes from looking inward to a holy war. The Senegalese film maker, Sembene Ousmane, condemns it in his 1976 film Ceddo. Between the two wars it arose in a more limited way in the evolution of the Hamallah brotherhood, derived from the Tijaniya through the influence of a pious and enterprising individual, Shiek Hamallah, whose partisans were so restless that the colonial administration exiled them to France. The proliferation of these inward-looking groups could result in the destruction of the social fabric, confrontations with other movements or confrontations with governmental or administrative authorities. That, moreover, is what happened in the fall of 1979 at Dollé in north Cameroon at the very time that President Senghor in an interview in Afrique-Defense (No 20, November 79 p 20) denounced the activities in Senegal of a "little marabout...who wanted to act like Khomeyni."

In brief the stratigraphy of Moslem trends in West Africa can be synthesized by differentiating between a fundamentalist Islam and a popular mysticism. In the fundamentalist Islam there is a puritan movement (the wahhabiya), an intellectual movement (university level institutes, Dakar, and in Nigeria, Zaria and Kano), and a reformist movement (cultural and cultist associations). In popular mysticism one finds an open movement (Tijaniya, Qadiriya, moderate Hamallists), an austere movement (Mourides and extremist Hamallists) and an inward-looking mysticism, with charismatic leadership and an occasional reaccentuation of fundamentalism.

2. Progress of Islam of Arabization

The wealthiest part of the merchant stratum mainly supports cultural associations, generally of reformist orientation, accepting the existing government framework and the political and economic system. A fringe of this stratum, no doubt less powerful commercially, won over to a bedrock wahhabism, remains if not hostile at least very much reserved vis a vis governments, and considers itself the bearer of a pan-Islamic potential. Both of these groupings are influential. The internal and international balances of Sub-Sahara Africa depend in part on the intensification of one or the other of the two groupings, on the passing of generations and men. Beyond this, there are the conversions of certain leaders, such as Al Hadji Omar Bango of Gabon, or the Gambian ministers, certain high level officials and also the vague move toward official and constitutional affirmation of Islam in countries that are diversified religiously, as, for example, the discussion in 1977-78 of the possible transformation of Upper Volta into an Islam Republic because it was vexed over receiving quite scanty Arab assistance.

Even in the mass media age mosques and teachers of the Koran remain privileged vectors in the spread of Islam carried out by Arabs, brotherhoods and cultural associations. The proselytism of certain countries--Arabia, Kuwait, Libya, involves support of students, sending of books, awarding of grants, credits for the restoration and the construction of mosques. However, all Islamization presupposes an arabization, and one can wonder what the political fallout of this will be. Three institutions--cultural centers, Islamic scholarships and Franco-Arabic schools can have, in the mid-range, powerful effects.

Arab cultural centers continue to be established: Libyan in Mauritania, Mali, Niger, Upper Volta (in addition to those by Algeria, Turkey and Malta); Egyptian, in Nouakchott. The African Islamic Center in Khartoum has relations with certain cultural associations, and efforts of the Cairo Supreme Council for Islamic affairs should be noted, as well as the Pakistan ahmadiya missions in English-speaking countries (Sierra Leone, Nigeria, Ghana), which also seek to establish themselves in French-speaking countries. It appears that the Libyan centers are increasing their arabization efforts through practical secretarial courses, courses in typewriting and home economics, all of which attract wider participation.

On the other hand, a large Islamic center is needed in West Africa or at least in French-speaking Africa, since in northern Nigeria there are the universities of Ahmadu Bello at Zaria and Abdul Bahi Bayero at Kano. True, an Islamic institute was created in Dakar whose mosque and architecture suggests Moroccan financing. This institute issued a bulletin but currently it offers basic Moslem training more than conducting actual research.

For prayer the people of Dakar prefer familiar religious sites established in their neighborhoods. Plans are under discussion for a vast university of Islamic studies established at Say, a little historic town 50 kilometers south of Niamey, financed by oil countries, but by February 1979 construction work had not yet begun. Supported by its great economic strength and discipline the Mourides brotherhood is completing a center of religious studies and has installed a vast Koranic library at Touba.

Upper level Koranic studies are now being propagated through a system of "Islamic" scholarships. These scholarships are granted to students going to study theology and Moslem law in the Universities of Mecca and Medina, the two holy cities, whose prestige seems to grow side-by-side with that of the most illustrious and ancient of Moslem universities, Al Ahzar in Cairo, which perhaps suffers from the policies Egypt currently pursues vis a vis Israel. There are also scholarships in Libya, Kuwait, Algeria and Sudan.

Difficulties in adjustment nevertheless have arisen. Arabized graduates in religious and juridical sciences, less sought in the employment market than French- and English-speaking students, are forced back to the medersas. These are private, thus financed by the community itself, or subsidized by Arab countries which sometimes assume responsibility for paying them. These younger men, imbued with the literalistic Islamic purity acquired in Mecca and Medina, are especially shocked by the traditional thinking and life styles of the old immams serving the mosques, and want to replace them. The differences in education and in outlook causes sharp conflict over interests, and between generations. Cultist and cultural associations are aware that these conflicts are developing. Fearing religious activism, they argue that these puritan and earnest graduates are too young to assume the responsibility of the immam, that is the spiritual authority of the mosque who conducts prayers; this ought to be reserved for pious and grave personages who read the Koran, tell their beads at home, only going out to pronounce the Khutba (the sermon) and lead the great prayer on Fridays.

In its December 1978 Lagos Conference the World Association of Young Moslems dealt with the problem of openings for studnets of religious sciences and asked UNESCO to bring influence to bear on governments to secure the equivalence of their degrees with national or western degrees. Political and university circles, even Moslem circles, nevertheless have doubts about the practical effectiveness of this and fear a religious zeal whose strength is illustrated by Wahhabism and by Iran. The problem is very urgent in numerous countries and at various levels of instruction.

Governments themselves seem hardly anxious to extend Islamic studies. At Dakar Arab-centered oriental studies are being developed according to classical scholarship. At the University of Abidjan the plan for creating courses in Arab history and language should ensure neutrality toward all religious influences.

At the University of Dar Es Salaam the opening of a department of religious studies, desired by the Tanzania Muslim Council, is delayed because of lack of space (?) In Nigeria southern Christians condemn the strength of the illustrious Moslem university of Zaria, Ahmadu Bello University, but the malaise is equally obvious at the primary and secondary levels. In Nigeria, still, the UPN party, whose principal leaders, of western origin, not Moslems, declare they wish to harmonize without mixing them, in a system of "private education" Koranic studies for which certain hours would be set aside, and modern studies, provided in schools for western training. In Senegal the socialist party's national women's movement is concerned over the future and the training of talibés, students in Koranic schools, who are often poor. In Mauritania French-speaking "negro-African" students fear an extension into the secondary school of Koranic instruction in Arabic.

In fact the argument has been joined, and envenomed, since colonial times. Moslem communities, proud of their Koranic schools had, much more than the non-Moslem communities, kept away from the school opened by colonialists. Practicing a system of general education in closest touch with their collectivity, non-Moslem communities had less resistance to a system of specialized education which often provided them access to faster social and administrative advancement in the colonial system, and after independence. There were guilty feelings and conflicts, not only among Moslem Africans, but also among Moslem Indians, about their inadequate educational system. To overcome cultural handicaps and give their children better opportunities in the professional fields, Moslem associations themselves organize bilingualism. They "westernize" in part the students trained in the arabo-Moslem culture but using several procedures, the most simple being the study of French and English in Arabic itself. Another is to send students who are finishing their studies to a western university to obtain conversion of their degrees, or to Algerian universities where the teaching is still in French. Recourse is also had to bilingual education--Tunisians in Djibouti, for example. Thus for several years Moslem associations have created "Franco-Arab schools"--private, Moslem, primary and secondary schools which teach in Arabic but with certain material taught in French.

Thus there are strange interlocked cultural and financial triangles. From the west, petro-dollars provide producing countries an abundance of funds that their sociopolitical and economic structures cannot immediately absorb. They profit from short-term investments and short-term loans in the west, or they transfer part of these funds to Africa in the form of aid (but a large part of this aid goes back to the west for the purchase of technology, consumer goods and arms) and finally they devote a part to invigorate Islamic religious zeal, thus arabization. Through the weight of history, politics and job requirements, arabization is supported by study of or even a redeployment toward a western language: French or English.

Thus a paradox is born: the west finances Islamization through producer countries; it hence works for its own retreat; but in a second phase arabization goes hand in hand with re-westernization...

3. Destabilization

At present the situation well reflects the objective alliances formed, from the political point of view, against continental revolution and for stabilization of the world economic system, between liberal western regimes and regimes of petroleum monarchies; and against materialism, between the Christian and Moslem religions.

In fact most of the Afro-Moslem leaders, often coming from rather westernized reformist circles (intellectuals forming part of the government service, military persons, part of the members of the liberal professions), supported by the merchants of the cultural associations and the peasant masses still enclosed in traditional brotherhoods which have never sought a systematic arabization, need, in order to avoid their own destabilization, the "gun-technique" or "Jaguar"--brought by the west, since their own armed forces, by suspicion, by lack of interest, by insufficient technical training, cannot or will not assimilate the modern arms systems and the general strategies they entail.

The west--France--represents a force that from the military point of view is at the same time still credible and economically and culturally favorable to certain social strata. The problem acquires its own dynamic to the extent that some recent inter-African conflicts involved not only political and ideological, economic and ethnic conflicts, but also religious conflicts: Biafra, Sudan, Chad, Eritrea. It is obvious that these religious conflicts are not unique. But in the white heat of conflict their involvement remains poorly understood.

The Biafra war (1967-70) with such complex causes had first brought about pogroms, then reciprocal exoduses. The number of Christians who went back south from the north was estimated at one million; this helps homogenize the various regions, hence to make direct confrontations rarer. After its victory, the Nigerian central government circumscribed religious influence. It restricted the annual contingent of pilgrims and reduced the role of Moslem chieftains of the north, specifically the direct or political inheritors of Osman Dan Fodio, who through a holy war at the beginning of the 19th century built the Sokoto empire--inheritors who had their authority strengthened during the British period by the system of /Indirect Rule/ [printed in italics] They had already sustained a serious blow in 1966 by the assassination of leaders of the NPC (Northern Peoples Congress). The expansion of Islam in the Horn of Africa, Christianized since the Fourth Century, and which had remained in part Christian for geographic reasons (difficult entry, stormy mountain systems), and for cultural and linguistic reasons, is carried forward in an unusual way, sheltered from the great migratory or commercial forces. It was carried out, as in the rest of Africa, by merchants coming from nearby Yemen or from Arabia, but in a diluted way. It was carried out by dissemination among tribes, each one retaining or concealing its own special customs, its local ways and different emphases in a rather superficial conversion process. As a result of the elaboration of a specific language, the Swahili, mixing Arab and Bantu, Arabization did not follow Islamization. Armed conflicts between Islamized tribes and Christian tribes arose often more from a war of conquest of more fertile lands, with a better climate on the high plateaus, than a holy war with proselytizing aims. Currently, although Islam constitutes one of the links unifying tribes that are quite disparate because of their ethnic characteristics, language and geography, compared to Christian populations, certain Christians fight on the Somalian side for nationalist or revolutionary, ethnic and anti-Marxist reasons.

For Chad, and for the moment, African leaders from the north of western Africa are somewhat hesitant concerning Arab expansion. According to circumstances either leaders of Moslem or of Christian origin ask either for the maintenance of French forces in Chad, always declared to be temporary and in principal condemned by all, or for their immediate departure, as requested by the Kano conference and finally put into effect. Mauritania, wholly Moslem, which seeks to withdraw from the Sahara conflict, reveals the same alternations. Logically, in order to oppose any too marked progressive growth Moslem leaders, therefore, rely on the support of those Arab countries whose Islam is resistant, stabilized and whose policy is oriented toward the west.

The policy of Colonel Qadhdhafi, who is considered a political chief, and not a religious chief, despite his aid to teaching and constructing mosques and cultural centers, has resulted in the rejection of a too great Arab political domination, even exercised through religious channels. Beyond that there are the different Libyan attempts: economic aid to Upper Volta, support for the Central African Empire and Idi Amin Dada, armed intervention in Chad and Gafsa, a possible plan for a geopolitical regrouping of the great nomads in a "Federation of Sahel Islamic States." This last project can be seen in the context of the attack on the Mecca mosque, and seems to aim at destabilizing the system by installing on the north and south Saharan borders a zone of political renewal in a progressive and Islamic sense which would be fatal to certain modern governments and would hem in the Near East, its petroleum and its agreements with the west, between two wings, Iranian and African. Thus would the descent toward sub-Sahara Africa be strengthened? To the north certain attractions would be directed toward the west's internal splinters: Libya's policy toward Malta or Arab questioning concerning latent separatism in the outer provinces of Latin countries.

There is much overlapping of motives and one cannot escape the double relationship Africans/West and Moslems/Arab countries. For Christians relations with the West remain vital, at least for the mid-range. Despite their great vexation over it, shown, for example, by the African bishops' condemnation of certain methods of conversion, Nigerian Christians' condemnation of the pugnacity of the University Ahmada Bello of Zaria, and the long range worries of certain political leaders, Christians cannot openly oppose Islam's growth without the risk of turning Moslems against the west. Thus the trip of John Paul II comes perhaps as a stabilizing counter-offensive.

The most important fact, just the reverse of the situation in the colonial period, is that Moslems no longer feel inferior to Christians. However, in a less essential way for Christians, but still in a powerful way, the majority of the Moslems yet turn toward the west. More exactly, they feel the need to redress an imbalance by relying on the west for support and must take advantage of their cultural and economic establishments.

4. Religions Condemned to Remain Objectively United?

In the short term Islamization does not call into question relations with the west, so long as a progressive pressure exists and so long as communism appears the most opposed to ethical and religious values, to the interests of the strata--or clans--in power and to the interests of the west which sustains them. This major contradiction remaining, religions are condemned to remain objectively united in their struggle against Marxism. What they, Islam included, fear is, henceforth, less the interference into their theology and the ancient cosmogonies inspiring a canonically impure but viable syncretism, than a direct step from cosmogonies to materialist ideologies. What the merchant and bureaucratized strata who are in power fear is the change to a non-capitalist way of development. According to traditional Marxian analysis one could believe that the expansion of Islam would strengthen inter-African and Afro-western contradictions. In actual fact, paradoxically, it is rather the weakening of communist pressure, a greater antagonism among the religions, that could bring about a certain destabilization of the system.

Such a destabilization would take place also if qualitative or quantitative changes took place in the methods and movements of Islamization, if the wahhabite movement, lesser merchants, austere artisans, young imams, bearers of Islamic purity and professionally disadvantaged in relation to the westernized ones, got the majority. It would accentuate a literalism borne of recent conversions, of a more rigorous theological training out of Saudi Arabia, Libya or the Iranian Islamic Revolution. Then the confrontations among Moslems, aggravated by the conflicts of clans, of circles and of generations, could react on contemporary political, economic and strategic ties, and offer diminished resistance to Arab political influence—if the latter did not tear itself apart—in brief, bring about a geopolitical upheaval.

ANGOLAN-CONGOLESE FINAL COMMUNIQUE FOLLOWING LARA'S CONGO VISIT

Brazzavile ETUMBA in French 30 Nov 80 pp 1, 3

[Article by Congolese Information Agency]

[Text] The delegation of the MPLA-Labor Party left Brazzaville on 27 November after a 48-hour visit to the Peoples Republic of the Congo.

The Angolan delegation which was led by comrade Lucio Lara, member of the Political Bureau in charge of organizations, held talks, it is known, with the Congolese side which was headed by comrade Pierre Nze, member of the Political Bureau responsible for foreign affairs, minister of foreign affairs and cooperation.

The final communique published at the conclusion of this visit states:

The two delegations noted with satisfaction that relations between the two parties are continually advancing and becoming stronger on the basis of their fira attachment to the ideals and principles of peace, militant solidarity, and proletarian internationalism.

The two delegations, still maintaining the revolutionary commitment of the immortal Marien Ngouabi and Antonio Agostinho Neto, reaffirmed their resolute determination to dynamize still further their inter-party cooperation and to develop contacts between their respective mass organizations with a view toward better harmonizing their activities of mutual interest.

Also, the two delegation agreed to search actively for ways and means of establishing continuous and harmonious development between the Peoples Republic of the Congo and the Peoples Republic of Angola through guiding it resolutely with a view toward complementarity.

Examining in-dept the questions relating to defense and to the security of the Congolese and Angolan revolutions, the two delegations committed themselves to continue their cooperation in this field for the strengthening of defense and the security of common borders.

After having proceeded to a broad exchange of views on the experiences of the Congolese Labor Party and the MPLA-Labor Party, the two delegations reaffirmed their unanimous determination to work toward meaningful harmonization of their positions on all problems relating to the total liberation of the continent, the consolidation of African unity and the strengthening of ties of friendship, solidarity, and cooperation among the progressive countries for the betterment of the world.

The delegation of the MPLA-Labor Party was particularly pleased with the progress achieved by the Congolese Labor Party (PCT) in asserting the sovereignty of the Congo in all domains, particularly in the field of the building of a national, independent economy, the sole guarantee of a national and independent economy [sic] aiming at the construction of a socialist society in the Peoples Republic of the Congo.

The delegation of the PCT expressed its sincere appreciation for the achievements of the MPLA-Labor Party in the political and economic fields which constitute important steps toward the strengthening of national independence and the prediction of an Angolan socialist society such as was called for in the program and resolutions of the First Constitutive Congress of the MPLA-Labor Party.

The PCT delegation applauds the advent of organs of popular government and the creation of the Peoples Assembly in the Peoples Republic of Angola.

The two delegations expressed their complete satisfaction with respect to the quality of their talks, which were stamped by friendship, candor, and mutual understanding, and above all, by revolutionary fervor.

Approaching current international questions, the two delegations expressed their concern regarding the present course of certain international problems which are injurious to the freedom of peoples, to their rights, to dignity and to progress and which constitute therefore a threat to peace and international security.

Concerning Namibia, the two parties condemn the illegal occupation of this territory as well as the dilatory maneuvers of South Africa in its efforts to obstruct implementation of the United Nations plan. They support the United Nations plan and the application of Resolution 435 for the immediate independence of Namibia and reiterate their indefectible solidarity with SWAPO, the sole legitimate and authentic representative of the Namibian people.

The two delegations vigorously doncemned the acts of aggression and barbarity perpetrated by the racist South African regime against the Peoples Republic of Angola dnd the Front Line countries.

The two delegations are concerned by the situation in South Africa and reaffirmed their support for the ANC [African National Congress] and the South African people in struggle against the odious and retrograde system of apartheid.

The two delegations congratulate the Saharan people for their stunning victories in the political, diplomatic, and military domains under the leadership of the POLISARIO Front. They express their active solidarity and their unreserved support and of the right of the Palestinian people to build an independent and sovereign state.

Analyzing the tragedy of Chad, the two delegations were quite concerned. In this connection, they firmly support the resolution on Chad adopted at the 17th summit of heads of state and government of the OAU held in Freetown 1-4 July 1980 and pronounce themselves in favor of the GUNT [Transitional National Union Government] headed by President Goukouni Oueddei.

The two delegations expressed their deep distress at the armed conflict between Iraq and Iran. They wish that these two fraternal countries should quickly work to resolve this conflict through negotiation.

(We note that during his trip, comrade Lucio Lara was received on two occasion by the president of the Central Committee, comrade Denis Sassou-Nguesso.

ARAB DEVELOPMENT AID TO AFRICA REPORTED

Kuwait AL-QABAS in Arabic 14 Nov 80 p 14

[Article: "Arab States Pledge 4.3 Billion Dollars to Africa; Arab Aid Covers African Continent With No Strings or Conditions"]

[Text] The Arab Bank for Economic Development in Africa said that Arab pledges to Africa totaled 4.367 billion dollars at the end of 1979, not to speak of Arab participation in international financial institutions and organizations which provide aid to Africa.

The bank explained that seven Arab countries offering aid had pledged about two-thirds of the total Arab Commitments, of 2.838 billion dollars. The difference between the two sums represents commitments by the Arab Bank for Economic Development in Africa and the Arab Loan Fund for Technical Aid to Africa of 5.9 million dollars; the Islamic Development Bank, 158 million dollars; the OPEC Fund, 320 million dollars; the Arab-African Bank, 23 million dollars; the Islamic Solidarity Fund, 11.5 million dollars; and oil credits of the International Monetary Fund, 473 million dollars.

Beneficiary Countries

Eleven African countries benefited from Arab aid in 1973, 32 in 1974, 37 in 1975, 38 in 1976, 40 in 1977, and 41 in 1979. In other words, Arab aid covered the African continent 100 percent within 4 years after the Arab petroleum countries entered the circle of countries offering aid.

The bank said that Arab aid to Africa in the next period was offered directly with the exception of 404 million dollars offered indirectly to finance multinational projects covering the African continent or African financial organizations. Of the remaining commitments, West Africa received 2.181 million dollars, or 50 percent, while East Africa obtained 1.781 billion dollars, or 40.1 percent of the total commitments.

The bank explained that detailed analysis of Arab aid to Africa shows that 64 percent of the total financial transfers were directed to 24 countries which are among the most destitute in the Third World, that 40.5 percent of the transfers benefited 18 countries which are among the least developed, and that 23 percent went to seven African coastal countries.

Arab aid is characterized by not being restricted by specific conditions, in contrast to aid from the countries of the Committee for Development Aid or the countries of the socialist bloc, where every dollar offered as aid returns to its original source again through credits to suppliers and purchase of goods and services. Arab financing is considered final and in practice means only deducting the current amount of this financing for the donor state.

Flexible Conditions

The other characteristic which distinguishes Arab aid is that it is offered with flexible and easy conditions. Note that 69.2 percent of the total pledges were made with preferential conditions or include other phrasing amounting to a gift of at least 25 percent, according to the information of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development.

The Arab Bank for Ecomomic Development in Africa alluded to the fact that Arab participation in financing the development of Third World countries is a recent development, dating to 1973. However, its newness does not prevent Arab financing from carrying considerable weight in the field of international cooperation in behalf of development.

He added that the volume of the aid pledged by the Arab countries during 1975 constituted 45 percent of the total pledges of the bloc of countries of the Committee for Development Aid, that is, of the total pledges of countries granting aid with the exception of countries with a guided economy, whose aid is considered so small as to be nonexistent in comparison with that from the countries of the Committee for Development Aid or the OPEC countries.

CORRESPONDENT REPORTS ON SOUTHERN AFRICA DEVELOPMENT CONFERENCE

Paris LE MONDE in French 1 Dec 80 p 4

[Article by Jean-Pierre Langellier--passages between slantlines published in italics]

[Text] Nairobi--Two billion dollars to attentuate the economic grip of the South African giant: such were the stakes at the Conference on Development in Southern Africa, which was held in Maputo on 27-28 November (LE MONDE of 28 November). On one side, nine African countries haunted--over and above their differences--by the concern to reduce their varying degrees of dependence on their powerful neighbor: Angola, Botswana, Lesotho, Malawi, Mozambique, Swaziland, Tanzania, Zambia and Zimbabwe. (Zaire hopes to be admitted soon to this disparate club.) On the other side, 36 potential donors--countries and international organizations--cordially invited to transform this desire for emancipation into reality. These latter belong, in the main, to the capitalist world.

The promoters of the conference, who represent 60 million inhabitants, had prepared 97 projects covering the spectrum of economic activity: energy, agriculture, health, transport, telecommunications. Despite this apparent diversity, the "nine" give priority to three sectors: roads, railroads and ports. Projects concerned with the modernization and development of these kinds of infrastructure account for three-fourths of the funding proposals presented at Maputo. This triple priority is legitimate in the face of Pretoria's ambitions and assets. South Africa, in fact, has never hidden its desire to base its economic predominance on a "constellation" bringing together all the states situated south of the Zaire River. Now this communications network, dense and well organized, constitutes one of the best levers working to further its will to power.

For the "nine" the necessity then is above all to strengthen and modernize the "counternetwork"--road, railroad and port--at their disposal: electrification of railroads, purchase of new engines, extension of anchorage capacity, lengthening of piers, drainage of guttering, etc. The "nine" already have 1,300 km of railroads. Except for the /Tanzania Zambia Railway/ (Tazara), built recently by Chinese technicians, this network was the creation of the colonial powers, who had conceived it first of all in terms of their own commercial interests at the time. One example: the three principal lines of Mozambique have no link-up between them. No rail line links together the two biggest cities--and principal ports--of the country: Maputo and Beira. On the regional level, it is a question /grosso modo/ of promoting an East-West flow of trade, from Angola to Mozambique, to the detriment of the North-South flow, as the too-powerful neighbor is the one to the south.

With its three ports--Maputo, Beira and Nacala--and its energy potential--especially the hydroelectricity of Cabora-Bassa--Mozambique will be the principal beneficiary of this program of regional action. It is not just coincidence that the Mozambican capital is the headquarters of the "commission of transport and communication" created in April at a first meeting in Lusaka. The government of Samora Machel had also, more carefully than others, prepared for this conference.

Aware of the fact that the capitalist world is better placed to provide the money and technology they need, the "nine" invited all the western and Scandinavian countries, as well as Japan, Australia, India, Brazil, the World Bank and the IMF. Mr Stirn, secretary of state for foreign affairs, represented France. The supplicants could not hope, in [only] 2 days, to come away with the whole $2 billion. But they did get 650 million. Mr Honwana, spokesman for the "nine," contended that these commitments /"will snowball."/

With $400 million--or 20 percent of the total needs--the African Development Bank has shown itself especially generous. Over the next 5 years, the ABD will devote 10 percent of its budget to the "nine." Claude Cheysson, EEC commissioner for development, promised $100 million within the framework of the Lome Convention. But on one condition: this money cannot be spent either on Angola or on Mozambique, as these two countries have refused up to now to adhere to the convention. OPEC's special fund offered some assistance but did not specify how much. The Scandinavian states all responded positively. The Netherlands alone made $15 million available immediately.

Several wealthy countries, notably the United States, kept to a posture of waiting: they affirm their willingness to examine more closely the projects submitted at the conference. For Washington--which only pledged $25 million--these delaying tactics but poorly disguise underlying political reservations. For example, the Americans while welcoming Mr Machel's invitation to the investors this year have kept their distance from a country which is a candidate-member of CEMA and whose foreign policy is totally alined on that of the Soviet Union. For 4 years Mozambique has in fact been on the /"black list"/ of the American Congress.

In the medium term, one danger threatens the plans of the "nine." If it remains politically stable, Zimbabwe could quickly dominate its less-developed neighbors. It will be helpful, then, to avoid the appearance of too clear an imbalance between the partners, such as that which in 1977 shattered the East African Community, which benefited Kenya too much. As for South Africa, it hardly seems distressed over its neighbors' efforts to close ranks, even though this effort is intended to thwart its strategy of regional domination. Economically, these states will most assuredly remain for quite some time yet dependent on it. But does it accurately assess the political import of a regional grouping which can only aggravate its isolation?

PRESIDENT DISCUSSES NATION'S PRESENT SITUATION, FUTURE PRIORITIES

Cotonou EHUZU in French 13 Nov 80 pp 1,3,6

[Keynote speech by President Kerekou to opening session of central committee meeting, 12 November at the Palace of the Republic in Cotonou]

> [Text] The third meeting of the third central committee of our avant-garde party, the PRPB [People's Revolution Party of Benin], was begun yesterday morning at the Palace of the Republic in Cotonou. The opening ceremony was presided over by our great comrade in the struggle, President Mathieu Kerekou, who gave an important speech on that occasion, in which he reported on the eight years of revolutionary struggle and mentioned the priority tasks to be carried out with a view to consolidating and radicalizing the bases of our great National Liberation Movement. President Kerekou then appraised the present national situation, which is characterized by a real and total freezing of the activities of the local authorities of the revolution and mass organizations, before submitting to the members of the central committee the main points to be studied at the present session.

Comrade members of the central committee of the People's Revolution Party of Benin,

In proceeding today, Wednesday 12 November 1980 with the official opening of the third ordinary session of the third central committee of our avant-garde party, the PRPB, it seems to us indispensable to formulate for you certain general positions to be taken into account in examining the various subjects on the agenda of these sessions. This will enable us, we are persuaded, to strengthen the unity of our thinking and revolutionary action, in the face of the magnitude and complexity of the tasks that have devolved upon our avant-garde party, the PRPB, on the way to constructing, here in the People's Republic of Benin, a new society in which there will be a good life for every Beninese man and woman. The socialist society.

In plain words this means that during our discussions we have been led to decree bold measures and take radical decisions that require us to develop and strengthen our great National Revolutionary Liberation Movement of 26 October 1972.

In this context, therefore, there is reason to ask ourselves the following questions:

1. How can the current national situation, after eight years of revolutionary experience, be objectively presented to us, comrade members of the central committee?

2. On the political, economic, ideologic and socio-cultural levels, what are the important priority tasks that it is incumbent upon us to execute diligently in order to the necessary and favorable conditions for continuous and harmonious development of the Beninese revolution, which we want to be genuine, pure and social?

3. What are the conditions and the demands of the national situation of the moment, in the face of which it is our urgent duty, at the present stage of our great National Revolutionary Liberation Movement, to pay special attention, with a most acute patriotic and revolutionary feeling, to all areas and levels of national life?

These, comrade members of the central committee, are the basic questions that in our opinion faithfully express the content and importance of the various subjects submitted for our examination in the course of the present meeting. Moreover, all of these questions clearly point out the high national and historic responsibility incumbent upon our avant-garde party, the PRPB, as the supreme form of organization and political leadership of all the militant Beninese people in their long struggle to free themselves totally and permanently from foreign domination and any system of oppression and exploitation of man by man.

An Appraisal of the National Situation

Comrade members of the central committee,

Thorough examination of the national situation reveals that many problems, not yet resolved or newly created, on all fronts of our struggle for national liberation, are beginning insidiously to tarnish the beautiful picture of the spectacular accomplishments of the Beninese democratic and popular revolution.

This fact and this revolutionary truth, far from being a gratuitous and demagogic affirmation, are actually quite the opposite, the general conclusion drawn from our own realities, which unfolds objectively from scientific analysis of the national situation currently prevailing here in Benin.

In fact, logical and lucid revolutionaries that we are, comrade members of the central committee, we have neither the interest in nor the right to go against our consciences as free men by attempting to conceal the Beninese realities behind a guilty silence, as if we were all afflicted with the virus of revolutionary defeatism, whereas all our revolutionary action is aimed at radically transforming--in the sense of social progr ss--our attitudes, our realities and our retrograde, obscurantist and alienating flaws, inherited from the feudalism of colonization and neocolonization.

For this reason, comrade members of the central committee, we must be perfectly familiar with, and objectively appraise at all times, the real national situation in all its fundamental characteristics, that we may always be better able to perceive it concretely in its proper dimension.

So it is with regard for the correct and clear understanding, as well as perfect knowledge of the current stage of our revolutionary process of national liberation, that we propose to you, comrade members of the central committee, that you examine, as the first subject on our agenda, the dossier that analyzes the national situation, whose projection in time and space inevitably emerges into the international situation.

Comrade members of the central committee,

It is unarguable that the tours recently taken by the comrade political commissioners were valuable opportunities for direct inquiries in the field among the popular masses in our cities and countryside. As everyone knows, all of these tours had but a single objective, to evaluate, without any leniency, the level attained by our avant-garde party, the PRPB, in its national mission of the awakening, the organization, the mobilization, the training and the revolutionary education of our popular masses around the great permanent tasks of the Beninese revolution:

National production;

national building;

patriotic, ideologic and premilitary training for all at all levels;

the defense of the fatherland and the revolution;

making the popular masses literate;

sound management of all our production units.

Identification and Perception of All our Inadequacies and Gaps

At the conclusion of their tours into the 84 districts of our six provinces, our comrade political commissioners were unanimous and completely positive in their conclusion, which we summarize briefly as follows:

1. The situation in the field is characterized by a genuine freezing of the revolutionary activities of all the militant men and women of the Beninese democratic and popular revolution!

2. The relaxation of militant action is manifested in all areas and at all levels!

3. At the time for executing the new revolutionary tasks, which involves the implementation of our Fundamental Law, the militant men and women of the local revolutionary authorities and the various mass organizations are living in uncertainty, passivity or lethargy!

Consequently, comrade members of the central committee, it is easy to understand why the united reactionary forces within and outside the country have engaged, with unusual arrogance and impunity over the entire national territory, in counter-revolutionary actions. This has been done--alas!--with the culpable complicity of some political-administrative authorities who are profoundly undermined and paralyzed in their own ideologic opportunistic contradictions, even though our popular masses are actually completely behind the revolution, and always entirely receptive and resolved to conduct the revolution.

It is by courageously making a critical and responsible analysis of all the characteristic data of the present national situation at the level of our various structures of awakening, mobilizing, organizing, training and giving revolutionary education to the popular masses, that we must truthfully identify and correctly perceive all the inadequacies and gaps that have marked the militant and directing action of our avant-garde party, the PRPB; that we must clearly point out the responsibilities at all levels, and determine precisely on that basis the principal tasks to be methodically executed in all areas of national activity, enthusiastically and with sound revolutionary competitiveness.

This is the only way, comrade members of the central committee, for us to resolutely pursue the implacable struggle against all the pernicious manifestations of local and international reaction, if we want to guarantee effectively and gloriously the permanence of our great National Liberation Revolutionary Movement of 26 September 1972.

For this reason we also and especially believe that serious study of the dossiers relative to putting in place local organs of state government and judicial organs in our country, the People's Republic of Benin, assumes primary importance, whose correct and diligent resolution, we are convinced, will provide the adequate response to the demands of our present national situation. The two dossiers written into the agenda of our present session, therefore, must be scientifically analyzed; because of this they require the complete and special attention of the central committee of our avant-garde party, the PRPB.

Comrade members of the central committee,

Let us remember that the permanent committee of the Revolutionary National Assembly, in its fourth and fifth ordinary sessions, studied and adopted all of the concrete provisions relative to the organization, installation and regular operation of the local organs of state government, as provided for by our Fundamental Law.

And it was to satisfy that requirement that all the new revolutionary institutions stipulated by the Fundamental Law were put in place, that the dossier was submitted for examination and political appraisal by the permanent committee of the Revolutionary National Assembly to the central committee.

However, rational execution of the provisions and accurate execution of all the tasks calling for permanent institutionalization of the revolutionary, democratic and popular government in our country, presupposes subsequent resolution at the level of our avant-garde party and its central committee, of a number of acute internal contradictions and aberrant antagonisms, cynically stirred up and maintained in our people by our class enemies.

In a word, comrade members of the central committee, in the course of this meeting we will have to make a profound critical analysis of the dossier, and take objective and responsible decisions, always taking into account our own realities and the following considerations:

1. The dossier on the institutionalization of the local democratic and popular revolutionary government; as presented, has it been conceived and drawn up on the basis of the balance sheet of the experience accumulated by the National Council of the Revolution and its local authorities, since they were created and installed in October 1973?

2. Are all of the slection criteria, the method of election, the structure of the leadership organs of the Revolutionary Councils at all levels, as ordered in the dossier, aimed at effectively giving the power and all the power to the working people, before being submitted to the appraisal of the central committee?

3. Do the provisions relative to the method of electing the members of the Revolutionary Councils at all levels, to the composition of the leadership organs, especially the CEAPs [State Committee for Province Administration] and the CRADs [Revolutionary Committee for District Administration], as stipulated in the dossier, all reflect and actually guarantee the actual practice of the grassroots direction of our party, before being submitted to the central committee for study?

4. Lastly, what are the urgent tasks to be executed at the party level, and emerges from the programming and the scheduling of operations before ending up with the effective putting in place of the local organs of state government?

Comrade members of the central committee,

As you see, all these questions are important, and clear and precise answers to each of them must guide all of us together, in unity of thought and revolutionary action, at the moment when we take responsible and constructive decisions.

But in truth, just the subsequent enforcement of the provisions contained in the dossier is not enough in our opinion to establish in our country the radical change involved in institutionalizing the local, democratic and popular revolutionary government.

To Really Establish Popular Democracy

For the new kind of government, to be practised fully, effectively and in the exclusive interest of the broad popular masses of our cities and countryside, must be solidly supported by a judicial organization that is also of the new kind.

And for this reason, in the course of the present meeting, we will also examine the dossier relative to the organization of the people's courts in our country, the People's Republic of Benin.

Here again, comrade members of the central committee, we are talking about a question that is fundamental to the real establishment of the regime of popular democracy here in Benin. In fact, scientific analysis of this important dossier by the central committee must clearly reflect the major preoccupations of which the directing principles are:

1. Every judicial system always has a class content. Also, in its content as in its form does the project submitted for our examination faithfully express the ideology of the proletarian class, as defined in the general line of our avant-garde party, the PRPB?

2. Will the resulting setting up of the new judicial system affectively contribute to permanently smashing the feudal, colonial and neocolonial structures that up until the present time have favored the oppression and exploitation of man by man here in Benin?

3. Do the provisions of the judicial reform provide all the legal guarantees required to gradually establish the social justice to which the popular masses of our cities and countryside so passionately, so profoundly and so legitimately aspire?

Those, comrade members of the central committee, are the basic preoccupations that must inspire us and guide us in analyzing the dossiers.

In any case, to prepare scientifically for the advent here in Benin of a regime of popular democracy by executing all the tasks connected with the effective putting in place of the local organs of state government and the judicial organs, is the principal mission assigned to the third ordinary session of the third central committee by our avant-garde party, the PRPB, and on behalf of the entire laboring and militant Beninese people.

Also, in the happy prospect of great socio-political qualitative changes, it is incumbent upon us today more than ever, because of the high historic national revolutionary responsibility that falls upon our avant-garde party, the PRPB, under the firm, clear-sighted and centralized leadership of our great National Liberation Revolutionary Movement of 26 October 1972, to pay quite special attention to the no less fundamental question of the patriotic, ideologic and premilitary training given to all of our popular masses.

In fact, this is the time and place to ask ourselves whether our popular masses can effectively, from now on, truly and fully assume all the responsibilities now conferred on them by the democratic and popular revolutionary government institutionalized in our country, the People's Republic of Benin. It is obvious that the answer is no if those popular masses are not politically and ideologically armed to actively and effectively develop the class struggle in the field.

In those circumstances, we must in the course of the present session also study the dossier dealing with the question of the patriotic, ideologic and premilitary generalized training, not only because of its importance in the revolutionary education of the people, but especially because it is a favored instrument of continuous class struggle for the awakening and continued development of the proletarian class consciousness of the broad laboring masses of our cities and countryside, who alone are the true active, aware and responsible builders of the enlightenment of the new society, the new kind of Beninese society, the society of popular democracy, relieved of every system of oppression and exploitation of man by man, the socialist society.

Therefore it is this urgent political and ideologic necessity that also justifies the inclusion on our agenda of the dossier concerning the examination of the results of the first national seminar on patriotic and ideologic training, which was held from wl May to 2 June 1980 at the National Center for Instruction of our People's Armed Forces.

For us, comrade members of the central committee, it will be a concrete matter of consistently studying the programs and pedagogic documents drawn up by our national and provincial instructors at the first national seminar. And after we have amended and adopted these programs and pedagogic documents, we will have given our party, our national revolutionary education center and all our national and provincial trainers, a valuable instrument for the work of revolutionary education in gradual unification of the thinking of our militant working people.

Comrade members of the central committee,

Considering the importance of all the dossiers we have just listed, all of which deal, when all is said and done, with the primary question of completing the putting in place of all the new institutions of our revolutionary state provided for in our Fundamental Law, we fervently hope that the decisions and recommendations that will come out of the work of the third ordinary session of the third central committee will be commensurate with the requirements of the national and international situation, and equal to the great hopes that profoundly and legitimately nourish all of the laboring Beninese people, who are irreversibly committed in all responsibility and in full knowledge of the facts, to the great National Liberation Revolutionary Movement of 26 October 1972, with a view to building here in the People's Republic of Benin the new society in which there will be a good life for each Beninese man and woman, the socialist society.

Scientific socialism is our path to development!

Marxism-Leninism is our philosophical guide!

Death to the traitors!

Death to the mercenaries!

Ready for the revolution!

The struggle continues.

FINAL COMMUNIQUE OF CENTRAL COMMITTEE MEETING

Cotonou EHUZU in French 17 Nov 80 pp 1, 6

[Text] Final Communique

The Central Committee of the People's Revolution Party of Benin held its third regular meeting in Cotonou from 12 to 16 November 1980, under the presidency of our great comrade in struggle Mathieu Kerekou, chairman of the Central Committee.

The following points were prominent on this session's agenda:

1. analysis of the national situation in the light of the reports of the political commissioners of our six provinces;

2. the questions relative to the setting-up of local organs of the state power;

3. the questions relative to organization of popular justice in the People's Republic of Benin;

4. analysis of the international situation.

At the conclusion of its proceedings, the Central Committee of the People's Revolution Party of Benin decided to make public the following communique:

On the National Level

Examining the situation presently prevailing among us in the People's Republic of Benin, the Central Committee noted that despite difficulties of a socioeconomic nature connected on the one hand with poor organization and poor management of our production units, and on the other hand, with the international economic situation, characterized by rampant inflation, and despite the many problems that have not yet been solved or have newly appeared on the social plane, the popular masses of our cities and rural districts are continuing to exhibit great revolutionary availability, which testifies eloquently to their profound adherence to the revolutionary process under way among us since 26 October 1972.

Drawing a lesson from this objective truth, which emerges clearly from the reports of tours by the political commissioners in our six provinces, the Central Committee notes that the situation is favorable for our hard-working and militant people to advance boldly along the road of effective establishment of the regime of popular democracy.

In this framework, it has worked out and adopted the documents relative to the setting-up of the local organs of the state power on the basis of a critical balance sheet of the experience accumulated along the way of the democratization of power in our country by the local bodies of the National Council of the Revolution.

Consequently, the Third Regular Meeting of the Third Central Committee of the People's Revolution Party of Benin has decided that while the holding of their respective congresses is awaited, renewal of the mass organizations, which are the Youth Organization Committees (COJ), the Women's Organization Committees (COF), and the Committees for the Defense of the Revolution (CDR) will be effected, so that they can continue to fill effectively their roles as transmission belt and support for the local revolutionary power.

In conformity with its correct concern to link the universal principles of Marxism-Leninism closely and constantly with the concrete practice of the Benin Revolution, the Third Regular Meeting of the Third Central Committee of our vanguard party, the People's Revolution Party of Benin, has worked out and adopted the document relative to the organization, program and methodology of generalized patriotic, ideological and premilitary training of the women and men militants of the Benin Revolution, in the course of their first National Training and Review Seminar, held at the National Popular Armed Forces Instruction Center at Ouidah, from 22 May to 2 June 1980.

It has also prepared and approved the law enacting the organization of popular justice in the People's Republic of Benin, the implementation of which will make it possible to found a new justice at the service of the Benin people and of their democratic and popular revolution, and to develop revolutionary legality in all areas of national life under the leadership of our vanguard party, the People's Revolution Party of Benin.

In view of the importance and complexity of the economic dossier in its possession, the Third Central Committee, in its third regular meeting, has decided to hold a special meeting in order to pursue systematic study of it and take sound decisions aimed at creating the conditions that will favor the recovery and development of our economy in the direction of consolidation of our national independence and correct solution of the social problems of our popular masses.

On the International Plane

Analyzing the international situation, the third regular meeting of the Third Central Committee notes once again that it is characterized by the subversive intrigues to destabilize the progressive regimes of the Third World in general, and of Africa in particular, with the creation of zones of tension and of hotspots of war throughout the world, by hard-pressed international imperialism, in order to divide, oppose and weaken the progressive and revolutionary forces struggling for national independence, democracy and social progress.

This is the framework within which the campaign of intoxication and defamation cynically orchestrated by the international reactionary press against our country, our people and their revolution is being conducted--a campaign aimed at making people believe the Republic of Benin is interfering in the domestic affairs of brother and friendly countries.

The Third Central Committee of our vanguard party declares that this crude maneuver by international imperialism and its local lackeys is aimed, in the last analysis, only at discrediting the Benin revolution and at creating the psychological conditions for a new armed aggression for colonial reconquest of our country.

The People's Republic of Benin, which has suffered only too much from interference in its internal affairs and has recovered by high struggle its independence, its sovereignty and its national unity, remains firmly devoted to the principles of noninterference and nonmeddling in the internal affairs of other states.

Consequently, the Central Committee of the People's Revolution Party of Benin reaffirms once again that the internal problems of countries can be solved only by the peoples of those countries.

With regard to the conflict that is tearing apart the brother people of Chad, the Central Committee of the People's Revolution Party of Benin makes a fraternal and militant appeal to the brother people of Chad to stop the fratricidal war and settle their internal problems by negotiation on the basis of the Lagos agreement and the OAU resolution of Freetown, in order to build the Chadian nation in complete independence, unity and concord.

As regards the Iranian-Iraqi conflict, the Central Committee of the People's Revolution Party of Benin makes a fraternal and militant appeal to the brother peoples of Iran and Iraq to cease the hostilities and settle their differences by negotiation, in the interest of both peoples.

Furthermore, the Central Committee of the People's Revolution Party of Benin reaffirms militant support of the Benin people for the just struggle for national liberation by the Sahraoui, Namibian, South African and Palestinian peoples.

Finally, the Central Committee of the People's Revolution Party of Benin makes a patriotic and revolutionary appeal to all our people to redouble their revolutionary vigilance, strengthen their organization, mobilize, and develop, throughout the entire national territory, the struggle to safeguard and consolidate the achievements of their democratic and popular revolution.

Ready for the Revolution!

The struggle continues.

PRESIDENT KEREKOU CALLS FOR UNITY, REVOLUTIONARY ACTION

Cotonou EHUZU in French 17 Nov 80 pp 1, 3, 6

[Speech by Presiden Mathieu Kerekou to Central Committee of the PRPB (People's Revolution Party of Benin)]

> [Text] The third session of the Third Central Committee of the PRPB, begun on Wednesday 12 November 1980 in the Palace of the president of the Republic in Cotonou, concluded its proceedings in Cotonou yesterday under the effective presidency of our great comrade in struggle President Mathieu Kerekou.
>
> In the speech he delivered on this occasion, President Kerekou stated that the fruitful debates developed made it possible to bring out the serious deficiencies that are impeding the harmonious development of our revolutionary process.
>
> He recalled the theme of our first regular congress, held from 13 to 18 November 1979; he evoked the fundamental problems facing the popular masses--problems which our vanguard party, the PRPB, must cope with; and then he enumerated the specific tasks to be carried out at the present stage of our struggle in order to deepen our revolutionary movement of national liberation.

Comrade members of the Central Committee,

Here we are today, Sunday 16 November 1980, at the conclusion of the proceedings of the third regular session of the Third Central Committee of our vanguard party, the People's Revolution Party of Benin--a meeting during which, for 5 days, we have carried out a detailed and far-reaching examination of all the items on our agenda.

The indisputable positive results we have achieved are the fruit of the seriousness, objectivity, and spirit of great responsibility that all of us have shown throughout the work of the present session. These eloquent results also testify to our firm and common determination to do everything in order for our vanguard party, the People's Revolution Party of Benin, effectively to assume its high historic mission--that of leading the militant and hard-working people of Benin in their struggle to free themselves totally and definitively from foreign domination and to build among us, in the People's Republic of Benin, a new society in which there will be well-being for one and all, the socialist society.

It is now up to us, comrade members of the Central Committee, to draw the essential conclusions from our discussions and to bring out the priority tasks incumbent on us in view of the present national situation.

As we have been able to note in the course of our discussions, the principal cause of the serious deficiencies that are impeding the harmonious development of our revolutionary process lies in the lack of a scientific fraemwork for our popular masses, who are the only moving and creative forces for qualitative transformations of society, on both the economic and sociocultural levels. Indeed, our Marxist-Leninist revolutionary ideology teaches us that scientific organization of the masses cannot be achieved effectively without a new type of party, united, influential and capable of constantly raising its organizational level, and that of the masses through their own organizations.

Now it came through very clearly to us, in the course of our discussions, characterized by political and intellectual honesty, that our young party, the People's Revolution Party of Benin, exhibits some serious gaps in its organization, and continues, alas, to suffer cruelly from a lack of cohesion at the level of its directorate, despite the great hopes aroused by our first Regular National Congress helf 13 to 18 November 1979, the theme of which was:

"Criticism and self-criticism within the party with a view to improving the working methods and leadership methods of our party in order to consolidate its structures, guarantee that it is rooted among the popular masses, and enable it to carry out well the task of democratization of revolutionary power in the People's Republic of Benin."

It is these serious gaps and deficiencies that explain why our party has not been able to ensure, in good time and correctly, its firm, clear-sighted and centralized management of our national economy, with a view to creation of the material bases necessary to gradual satisfaction of the fundamental needs of the popular masses of the cities and rural districts. For appropriate solutions have not yet been found for such fundamental problems as:

--the problem of drinking water and the harnessing of water;

--the problem of housing, urban development and the electrification of our cities;

--the problem of proper food supply for the popular masses, in terms of basic food products;

--the problem of health;

--the problem of sound application of the reform of the national education system;

--the problem of popular justice, etc.

Thus, one easily understands why the level reached by our party in its tasks of sensitization, mobilization, organization, guidance and revolutionary education of our popular masses is still low.

Within this framework, correct understanding of the national situation thus analyzed makes it necessary for us, comrade members of the Central Committee, to acquit ourselves diligently, with spirit of steadiness and responsibility, of the following tasks:

1. achieving and strengthening unity of thought, revolutionary action and cohesion within the party and its leadership, by merciless struggle against sectarianism, fractionism, and the cultivation of tight little groups;

2. establishing within the party a spirit of militant camaraderie, loyalty and revolutionary frankness, by detecting, denouncing, and courageously expelling from our ranks the degenerate and irrecoverable elements;

3. strengthening the level of organization of the party by consolidation and development of its structures, and by establishing a truly democratic life within it.

But in order to achieve this, we must:

(a) carry out, in the immediate future, a replacement of the acting provincial secretaries of the party;

(b) adhere scrupulously to the periodic meeting schedule of the Central Committee;

(c) initiate regular weekly meetings of the rank-and-file organizations throughout the entire national territory;

(d) act to broaden the party's foundations;

(e) constantly raise the political and proletarian-class awareness of the members of the party.

4. organize scientifically the congress of the party's various mass organizations--specifically, the COJ's [Youth Organization Committees], the COF's [Women's Organization Committees], the CDR's [Committees for the Defense of the Revolution] and the trade unions, so as to make them effective instruments for liaison of the party with the working people.

It is correct accomplishment of all these tasks at the level of the party and its mass organization that will make it possible--we are convinced of it--to create the new favorable and indispensable conditions:

1--in order for the party and the People's Revolution of Benin to be capable of assuming firm, clear-sighted and centralized leadership in victorious conduct of the revolutionary process under way among us since 26 October 1972;

2--in order for the People's Revolution Party of Benin to act to set up, within the best times possible, local organs of the state power and for application of the reform of the judicial system among us, in the People's Republic of Benin;

3--in order for the People's Revolution Party of Benin to be capable of directing and controlling the steady application of the reform of national education.

For this purpose, a review seminar will be organized to evaluate the distance already traveled and to take adequate and urgent measures that are necessary. Within this framework, the question of upgrading of the teaching function must be considered as a priority revolutionary task and resolved boldly.

4--in order for the People's Revolution Party of Benin, through the second state plan, to solve correctly the crucial problems of housing, drinking water, and a proper food supply for the masses in terms of basic food products;

5--in order for the People's Revolution Party of Benin to approach correctly and settle rationally, taking serious account of the realities of our country, the question of judicious distribution and rational utilization of cadres at the national and local levels;

6--in order for the People's Revolution Party of Benin to be capable of assuming firm, clear-sighted and centralized management of the national economy, in the direction of revolutionizing all the old colonial and neocolonial structures, as well as in the direction of reorganization and sound and democratic management of all our units of production;

7--in order for the People's Revolution Party of Benin to organize the National Seminar on Feudality, always taking serious account of the realities of Benin.

Comrade members of the Central Committee, each of us doubtlessly assigns all due importance to the national responsibility incumbent on our vanguard party, the People's Revolution Party of Benin, in its historic task of building among us in Benin the new society in which there will be well-being for each and every man and woman of Benin: the socialist society.

Along these lines, we must take seriously the fundamental question of unity of thought, revolutionary action and cohesion within our party, the People's Revolution Party of Benin, the only guarantee of triumph of the Benin's democratic and popular revolution.

--Immortal glory to the People's Revolution Party of Benin!

--Scientific socialism is our path of development!

--Marxism-Leninism is our philosophical guide!

--Ready for the Revolution!

--The struggle continues.

DEVELOPMENT POTENTIAL OF FISHING INDUSTRY DISCUSSED

London WEST AFRICA in English 8 Dec 80 p 2489

[Article: "The Catch for Cameroon"]

[Text] Cameroon owes its name to its fishing industry. Portuguese explorers 500 years ago called the Wouri river the Rio dos Camaroès — the River of Prawns.

ROUGHLY speaking some 15,000 artisanal fishermen live off this activity and the industrial fishing sector, with its six shipping companies, provides jobs for almost 500 people. The authorities' concern with developing industrial fishing has led them to modernise the Douala fish port facilities around a harbour with a 560 metre quay. With an ice factory (150 tonnes per day) and a series of sheds (4,500 m. of them with refrigeration facilities), this port is able to handle 60—70,000 tonnes a year industrial fish production.

Small fishing concerns are by far the most active in the fisheries sector. The government fisheries directorate puts its catch at 35,000 tonnes per annum — 20,000 tonnes fish, more than half of it coastal pelagic species, and 15,000 tonnes of shrimp, most of it sold (after drying and smoking over a wood fire) to Nigeria. A large percentage of the artisanal fishing is done by Nigerians who send their catches home to satisfy their country's considerable needs. Artisanal fishing is mostly concentrated in the Ndian area, near the border with Nigeria, where there are many small boats.

The output of these small fishing concerns is low, perhaps 2—3 tonnes per annum per boat and 10—20 tonnes for boats equipped with engines. As only 10 per cent of the boats have engines it is easy to see the potential for development. The government, with Canadian aid, has started to modernise small fishing concerns through a Cameroonian fishing development mission, called Midepecam.

Industrial production expanded regularly between 1960 and 1970, with catches rising from 3,000 to 23,000 tonnes. Production remained steady for three years and then dropped, and has stabilised at around 20,000 tonnes for a number of years now. The problems of the industrial sector, are more easily understood if shrimping and trawling are taken separately.

The 17-strong trawling fleet is in the hands of five owners, three of whom own 15 of the vessels. All but a few are less than seven years old, which shows how much effort has gone into modernisation. The fleet is declining (there were 27 vessels in 1972), but the average gross tonnage has gone up slightly and, as things are at the moment, this is an unfavourable trend, as the biggest trawlers are the most expensive and they are less productive and more sensitive to rising costs (diesel fuel, repairs and harbour dues).

While the industrial fishing catch has levelled off at around 20,000 tonnes the percentage of fish is tending to rise and the percentage of shrimp to drop, largely due to the activities of the shrimp fleet. However, although the trawler fleet has increased its efforts and stepped up its time at sea, there has been no improvement in production. Yields are dropping and the fish caught are getting smaller.

The shrimp fleet, unlike the trawler fleet, made remarkable strides between 1970 and 1975, increasing from 10 to 18 vessels and stabilising thereafter. For a long time the catch was around 2,000 tonnes but it dropped to around 900 tonnes in 1978/79. What goes for fish goes for shrimp too — yields dropped from about 500 kg per day per boat in 1971 to 250 kg in 1978.

There is, however, less cause for alarm in the shrimp industry because the shrimp fleet has increased its catches of fish as shrimp catches have declined. Shrimping is only profitable during the rainy season, hard cash is required pending payment of the shrimps sold in America and the market has to be kept supplied after the bankruptcy of one of the biggest ship-owners. For all these reasons, people in the shrimp industry have, with official encouragement, begun to take fish as well and these now account for a third of the industrial catch.

As things stand, Cameroon's fishing industry faces contradictory demands. On the one hand, there are still immense demands to meet, in spite of more intense fishing in inland waters. Imports of fish have topped 13,000 tonnes per annum. The levelling-off of the catches suggests that maximum exploitation has been reached. So the authorities want, at present, to keep the fleet down to 40 vessels until new policies have been developed.

PORTUGAL, CUBA TRAIN LOCAL FISHERMEN

Praia VOZ DI POVO in Portuguese 3 Nov 80 p 2

[Excerpts] The training of Cape Verdian cadres in the fishing sector will provide our country with increased capability in this branch, which is moreover, regarded as of primary importance to the economic development of Cape Verde.

From this perspective we see the need to train people so as to decrease and later eliminate human shortcomings in this sector. Thus, on the basis of state agreements, in strict cooperation with the fishing office, the training of Cape Verdian cadres in this sector began in 1977 with the sending of seven students to the Pedroucos Fishing School in Portugal. For various reasons, among them the inadequate background of our students, only two of our students in that year were able to complete their training. The following year steps were taken to insure that only students with the minimal educational level equal to the preparatory cycle were sent. In 1978, another 15 students departed for the Pedroucos School for training which all of them completed in 1979. Following the courses they took there, these students enrolled in the Sao Vicente Coastal Shipping School or boarded the Icelandic training vessel to serve an apprenticeship. With this apprenticeship completed, they could qualify in Cape Verde as coastal vessel masters. In 1979 eight more students departed, and this year the seven existing vacancies were entirely filled.

Cuba, which in 1979 accepted nine students for a 4-year middle level course, is also contributing to training in this sector. Following their training, the students will staff the fishing sector on the central level. The basic training here is more rigorous, with the requirement that the students complete technical school (preferably) or high school, as the minimum requirement. For example, three more students will go to Cuba this year. Two of them attended the technical school and one high school. When we inquired about the criteria for selecting the student, we were told at the DGP that candidates had been dispatched from all of the country's islands. In the fishing training sector, Cape Verde currently has two students in Cuba, pursuing marine biology (higher level) and two others are studying fishing economics in the Soviet Union. The first two will join the future scientific department of the General Fishing Office, which will engage mainly in research, cooperating with specialized international organizations such as the International Commission for the Preservation of the Atlantic Tuna (ICCAT), with which we already maintain relations, and the Fishing Committee for the Central-Eastern Atlantic, a scientific organization concerned with our area, ranging from Gibraltar to the mouth of the Congo River.

In his interview with the Lebanese newspaper AL-SAFIR President Goukouni said that the Arab reactionary regimes are trying hard to (?bring) back the Chadian traitor into power to serve the imperialist interests. But the Chadian people, he said, will confront these attempts and foil their plots. ADF RURAL DEVELOPMENT LOAN

Brazzaville ETUMBA in French 30 Nov 80 p 8

[Article by Oko Mbouala]

[Text] A loan agreement was signed between the African Development Fund [ADF] and the Peoples Republic of the Congo on 21 October 1980 at Abidjan, headquarters of the African Development Bank [ABD], by the Congolese finance minister, Comrade Henri Lopes, member of the Central Committee of the Congolese Labor Party [PCT] and the president of the bank and of the African Development Fund, Mr Wila D. Mung Omba.

This agreement, by the terms of which the African Development Fund loans a total of 8 million UCF [expansion unknown] (1,944.16 million CFA francs) to the Peoples Republic of the Congo will enable it to finance plans for the rural development of the Bouenza region. Approved by the ADF board of directors at its 70th meeting held in Abidjan on 12 September 1980, this loan is reimbursable over a 50-year period which includes a 10-year grace period.

The project is composed of two complementary categories which are on the one hand the development of the Bouenza region and on the other hand assistance to the Office of Food Cultivation, which is responsible for promoting the cultivation of food, to help it strengthen its organizational and administrative capacity.

The first category consists in the implementation of a regional program for the improvement of food cultivation from the traditional sector, the supply of support services to this sector, and the rehabilitation of rural infrastructure. It concerns some 18,000 small growing operations of 1.5 hectares each in size, 12,000 of whom will receive real benefits from the steps taken to organize and popularize this project. On the other hand, the second category consists in endowing the Office of Food Cultivation with organizational and administrative capacity sufficient to allow it to fully play its role in promoting the food sector in the Peoples Republic of the Congo.

We see that the total cost of the project, exclusive of taxes and customs, amounts to 2,509.4 million CFA francs, or 9.73 million UCF, of which 1,447.95 million CFA francs, or 5.61 million UCF are in hard currency.

The ADF loan will serve to finance all hard-currency costs and a part of the local-currency costs of all the components of the project.

It should be noted that the project will be financed by the ADF conjointly with the government of the Peoples Republic of the Congo.

The execution of the project will be phased over a 5-year period, that is from 1981-1985. The executive agency is the Office of Food Cultivation "OCV" whose headquarters is in Brazzaville in the Peoples Republic of the Congo.

This loan, which constitutes the eighth instance of involvement of the African Development Bank and the first for the African Development Fund in the Peoples Republic of the Congo is a lever, to be used to promote rural development in the Congo. To this end, the total of ADB's commitments to the Congo reaches to 38.31 million UCF.

SIXTEENTH ANNIVERSARY OF ESTABLISHMENT OF CSC CELEBRATED

Brazzaville BULLETIN QUOTIDIEN DE L'ACI in French 10 Nov 80 pp 1, 2

[Text] Brazzaville, 10 November--The 16th anniversary of the CSC [Congolese Trade Union Confederation] was marked Saturday by 2 major events: the inauguration of the Hotel of 8 November 1964 in the morning and the meeting at CSC headquarters at Mpila in the afternoon.

The ceremony of the official dedication of the Hotel of 8 November 1964, located opposite the radio building, took place under the leadership of Comrade Jean-Michel Bokamba-Yangouma, member of the Political Bureau responsible for organization and secretary general of the CSC. In the presence of comrades Albert-Servais Obiaka and Raymond-Serge Mviri, members of the Central Committee of the PCT [Congolese Labor Party], responsible respectively for party life and for mass organizations in the department of organizations. [sic] Also present were all the permanent secretaries of the CSC, the members of the Executive Committee of the CSC [COCONEX].

The objective of this production unit, as was stressed by Comrade Sylvestre Bongo, permanent secretary for the economy and CSC social affairs, is dictated by two concerns:

--to strengthen revenues of the CSC which previously have consisted only of workers' dues,

--to create jobs in order to participate with the state and the party in the struggle against unemployment which is becoming a national scourge.

During the meeting which followed in the afternoon at the headquarters of the CSC in Mpila, Comrade Jean Michel Bokamba-Yangouma, member of the Political Bureau responsible for organization and secretary general of the CSC, broached the problem of national unity before the very numerous assembled militants.

In this connection, he stated that it was not a question of unity for the sake of unity, but rather of unity of thought, action and struggle. Also it is necessary to struggle against tribalism and regionalism. It is also thanks to this unity that on the 3 glorious days of 13, 14 and 15 August 1963 [dates of labor unrest resulting from resignation of President Youlou] the 3 labor confederations which between them account for all the workers in our country--African General Confederation of Workers (CGAT), African Confederation of Believing Workers (CATC), and the Congolese Confederation of Free Trade Unions (CCSL)--formed the merger committee.

"Thus we must guarantee this organizational unity," he continued. "We have this unity because even if the workers in our country are divided into 15 vocational unions we know that all are moving forward within a single national confederation which is the CSC.

"We must also struggle against regionalism. Here also we know that election to such and such a level within the labor hierarchy has never been related to belonging to such and such a region. And we have never taken the fact of being from the South or from the North, or from the East or the West, into account. Within the syndicate we have only one criterion: being a worker and a militant of the CSC."

We emphasize that 8 November 1964 was the date of the merger of the three great confederations (CGAT, CATC AND CCSL) which gave birth to the CSC. ACI [Congolese Information Agency].

PREMIER ADDRESSES NATIONAL ASSEMBLY'S BUDGETARY SESSION

Djibouti LA NATION DJIBOUTI in French 4 Dec 80 pp 1, 3

[Speech by the Prime Minister—passages between slantlines published in boldface]

[Text] On the occasion of the celebration of the third anniversary of independence, His Excellency the President of the Republic has recalled the achievements already made by the government that he heads with the very broad and necessary collaboration of our assembly:

--Independent, unity, and stability in our republic have been established. If these acquisitions may be the object of constant concern on the part of some, they can [in any case] no longer be challenged.

--We have undertaken to give our youth the means to choose for themselves their intellectual and technical future, and we should continue to do so.

--But the Djibouti people do not want alms: they are demanding jobs and national production.

To do this, we want:

--To make our capital city a great maritime and commercial city.

--To diversify our economy in the different sectors of production.

--To allocate activities over the whole territory in accordance with the unique capacities of each region.

These are the concerns that reigned in the preparation of this proposed budget, and I am sure that they will guide our deliberations and improve them.

The ordinary budget for the fiscal year 1980 was established at /12.12225 billion francs,/ then in two legislative amendments revised up to /13.15524 billion (Djibouti) francs./

The special budget was fixed at 1.5003 billion francs; the amount carried forward from the capital equipment appropriation voted in 1979 and not expended on 31 December 1979. The vote for new appropriations raised this special budget to 4.887327 billion Djibouti francs.

This advance during the year 1980 was made possible by the surpluses from the year 1979 and the increases in value noted at the beginning of 1980, in particular on TIC [expansion unknown], the surtax on tobacco, oil products, and products not originating from the EEC.

This development made it possible to present this proposed 1981 budget as balanced at the level of 15.07541 billion francs, an increase of 2.95116 billion francs over the original 1980 budget, or a /24.3 percent increase./

The increase in the price of imported products which continued in 1980 brought with it the increase of tax revenue linked to consumption. Also it was believed useless and harmful to increase the tax pressure by creating new imposts and taxes or by raising the rates of duties already in force.

One-fourth of 1981 revenue will come from direct taxes and more than three-fifths from indirect taxes, which shows to what extent their total is tied to the level of national economic activity and to the international situation.

Personnel costs are increased by 10 percent, as a result of:

--The increase in budgeted positions (162 positions in 1980 and 124 in 1981); this has been reduced to a minimum, and largely benefits national education.

--Providing for the promotion of a certain number of agents and personnel of the FNA [expansion unknown].

--Raising the lowest wages starting 1 July 1980.

/Equipment and maintenance expenses/ should make possible an efficient functioning of the services and preservation of the patrimony of the state, taking into account the real needs and the observed increases in prices (25.8 percent).

/Expenses for subventions and participation/ are increasing, in particular because of the necessity to participate in international organizations, the financial counterpart to Djibouti's entry into the community of nations (8 percent).

But the greatest emphasis was laid on the /infrastructure budget/ which goes from 1.0505 billion francs to 2.025263 Djibouti francs, or 13.4 percent.

Djibouti is asking for and getting substantial aid from international organizations and friendly states to whom I here convey our thanks for their understanding of the needs of our nation.

But Djibouti is making a major effort, the biggest effort possible, to finance its infrastructure and its development.

The toughness shown by the government and the administration is shown by the following percentages in the different categories of expenditures:

—Public debt, 1.5 compared to...	1.86 in 1980.
—Public authorities, 1.3 compared to...	1.60 in 1980.
—Personnel, 46.9 compared to...	52.71 in 1980.
—Equipment, 25.8 compared to...	25.57 in 1980.
—Maintenance work, 3.1 compared to...	3.31 in 1980.
—Operating subsidies, 8.0 compared to...	6.29 in 1980.

In 1980 the national infrastructure effort found concrete expression in:

—The ground station which improves relations between Djibouti and the outside world by means of telecommunications.

—The solution, which will become final early in 1980, [to the problem] of transporting vehicles across the Gulf of Tadjourah, creating greater unity in the national territory.

—The opening at the end of the year of the bottled water plant at Tadjourah.

—The completion of major program of school construction.

In 1981, the principal expressions of this effort should be:

—Opening of an international-class hotel permitting Djibouti to play its role as a meeting center.

—The laundhing of work on a major program to modernize the port of Djibouti.

—Construction of a dairy producing 12,000 liters per day.

—The beginning of an extensive project to rehabilitate the Peltier hospital.

All this in addition to the great effort expended throughout the national territory aimed at:

—making the public services more efficient;

—improving internal communications;

—furnishing the people the services (water, health, education, in particular) which they expect of the state.

This budget expresses the fact that development demands more courage and effort every day, and that the fourth year of independence must be, as stated by the president of the republic, a year of struggle and work.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF RPP PERMANENT SECRETARIAT

Djibouti LA NATION DJIBOUTI in French 13 Nov 80 p 5

[Text] The prime minister, head of the interim government and first vice chairman of the People's Rally for Progress, Mr Barkat Gourad Hamadou, last Saturday presided over the ceremony inaugurating the permanent secretariat of the RPP, at the headquarters of the party, on Avenue 13.

Many leaders of the party and the government attended the ceremony, among whom there were in particular the second and the third vice chairmen of the party, Mr Omar Kamil Warsama and Mr Aden Robleh Awaleh; the secretary general, Mr Moumin Bahdon Farah; and the treasurer of the party, Mr Idriss Farah Abaneh, as well as other members of the political bureau and the executive committee of the party.

During the ceremony, the prime minister and frist vice chairman of the party, Barkat Gourad, gave a speech during which he called particular attention to the history of the RPP and reviewed the various objectives of the party.

Mr Barkat, referring to the structure of the party, recalled that during the first constituent congress of the RPP, which took place in Dikhil on 4 March 1979--on the date it was created--a central committee was elected. A short while later, a 25-member executive committee was named by the chief of state, the president of the RPP, Hadj Hassan Gouled Aptidon, which made up the political bureau of the party.

Continuing its organizational activities, the party set up annexes in the various sections of the capital and in the capitals of the districts of the interior.

"The first objective of the party was the strengthening of national unity," declared the prime minister. This goal has largely been attained and now we must attack the second goal, that of building a nation and developing the country," the prime minister said in substance.

Finally, in conclusion, Mr Barkat, after having sketched out the results of the steps which have been completed, described the role that the permanent secretariat of the party will be asked to play.

That bureau, whose principal role is to coordinate the masses and the higher authorities of the party, will have at first the task of setting up the administrative apparatus of the party.

The permanent secretary of the party, Mr Omar Chirdon Abass, who was officially installed last Saturday, will, in addition to his present functions as secretary of defense, be responsible for the cells of the various social organizations: that is, the offices of the Workers' Union, the Women's Union and the Djibouti Youth Union, etc.

He will also head the party's press service and the cell for cultural development.

[Text] The Vietnamese delegation, led by vice prime minister and political office member of the CP Central Committee, Gen Vo Nguyen Giap, and 25 members strong, has had a day full of fraternal and friendly meetings in Madagascar.

Several interviews and work sessions were planned permitting our ministers to go over governmental policy based notably on democratization, decentralization and "Madagascarization" to successfully carry on the class struggle and to hasten development for justice and equality; the two parties also reaffirmed the common identities of their views.

In the morning Gen Giap paid a courtesy visit to the head of the government, Prime Minister Desire Rakotoarijaona. Minister George Ruphin of Information; from ideological orientation and relations with institutions was Minister Phan Hien and Ambassador Doan Van was also present at the interview.

Identity with the colonial past, identity of views, ideological identity, identity of struggle toward the same objectives--independence and peace: these are the essential points of the exchange between Prime Minister Rakotoarijaona and the Vietnamese Vice Prime Minister Giap.

The premier was to effectively declare in substance that the visit of the large Vietnamese delegation to Madagascar--a visit welcomed with joy by the people and the government--could only serve to reinforce the bonds of friendship which have existed between the two countries and their people for decades and are well established. This is all the more true because the two peoples have fought and continue to fight the same struggles for independence and peace.

After this statement, Gen Giap recalled the objectives of the patriot and leader Ho Chi Minh, one of whose comarades was Jean Ralaimongo, which permitted the Vietnamese people to be victorious over the different aggressors from all sides who wanted to bend the Vietnamese nation to their will. This victory, Prime Minister Giap emphasized, belongs to all people attached to independence and peace and among them, the people of Madagascar, who have undergone, like the Vietnamese, French colonization.

So many points in common have favored the establishment of friendly relations between the two peoples that the present generation has the duty to strengthen them.

After having admitted that he never thought he would visit Madagascar, Gen Giap, praised the efforts undertaken by the revolutionary power, directed by President Didier Ratsiraka and supported by the Malagasy people, to achieve democracy and the promotion of the interests of the people.

The highly placed Vietnamese touched on President Ratsiraka's suggestion of making the Indian Ocean a peaceful zone: Vietnam was one of the first countries favorable to holding a summit conference in Madagascar of concerned chiefs of state, because the Vietnamese people understand the wishes of the Malagasy, having greatly suffered and struggled for peace.

Gen Giap also recalled, to support the idea, the suggestion made in 1979 in Havana by President Ratsiraka to carry on an international struggle against underdevelopment, beginning with a "South-South" cooperation.

After the chief of state, it was Lucien Xavier Michel Andrianarahinjaka, president of the popular national assembly, who received Gen Giap. This interview gave the two leaders the opportunity to talk over the wishes on both sides to reaffirm the friendly relations existing between the two countries and peoples.

The role of the representatives of the two peoples was also explained during this discussion.

At the same time, Hoang Xuan Tuy, vice minister of higher and professional education, was received his Malagasy homologue, Rakoto Ignace, while Hoang Dinh Cau, vice minister of health, was talking with Dr. Jean-Jacques Seraphin.

The first interview, as might be expected, was centered on university and higher education...

In the second discussion, between Dr. Jean-Jacques Seraphin and Professor Hoang Dinh Cau, promotion of social causes and the development of health services, notably in the most favored sectors, were treated.

It was learned that General Giap and his party spent a part of their afternoon yesterday at a work session on Ivato's military base.

[14 Nov 80 p 2]

[Text] Yesterday afternoon Gen Giap met Malagasy officers at the aeronaval base at Ivato. On this occasion he was surrounded by Col Desire Rakotoarijaona, prime minister; Sibon Guy, minister of defense; the minister of information, of ideological diffusion and relations with institutions; Col Rakotoarison, chief of staff of the popular armed forces; and Col Jean Philippe, commander of the "Zandarimariam-Pirenena." Commander Jean de Dieu Randriantanany, LtCol Ferdinand Jaotomobo, Ratsifehera Arsene, Manandafy Rakotonirina, supreme councillors, also honored the meeting with their presence. Opening the discussions, the prime minister first introduced the main guest, retracing his life, full of patriotic examples. Taking the podium, Gen Giap stated that a military struggle always demands great devotion and courage.

The armed struggle of the Vietnamese is full of examples and lessons that those seeking peace can learn. "Today," he declared, "I accept this great honor with joy in giving you some advice for the success of the Malagasy socialist revolution."

[Text] The visit of the Vietnamese delegation to Madagascar, led by Vice Prime Minister Giap, is to be marked by the signing of an economic and technical cooperation agreement between the SRV and the DRM.

The ceremony took place yesterday afternoon at the office of the prime minister, at the conclusion of a work session between the Vietnamese delegation and the national front.

Ministers Phan Hien and Georges Ruphin signed the agreement in the presence of Prime Minister Rakotoarijaona and Gen Giap.

This agricultural and industrial agreement, as the two signators pointed out, is in addition to the cultural and postal agreement signed 3 November 1980 between the two countries; it shows the quality of the relations between our two countries which have rejected colonialism and fight against capitalism. It expresses the will of the two countries, devoted to peace and liberty, to cooperate and proves that "South-South" cooperation, which President Ratsiraka initially suggested in Havana, is not a myth but a reality.

This agreement is also a demonstration of the will of our two peoples to strengthen their relations. All the more so because a heavy task awaits them in bringing about the social and economic progress of their countries.

Peoples struggling for the same cause, having shared the same past and present in combat against the same enemies; they will share the same socialist future: this is what came out of the cordial and fraternal talks between the chief of state and Gen Giap.

"First," said the chief of state, receiving the Vietnamese delegation. "I welcome you to Tananarive, and I am happy to be able to receive you in the capital of Madagascar for several reasons: first, because for us Malagasys, Vietnam is sacred; secondly, because you represent a brother people, member of the movement of non-aligned countries, a people who symbolize national liberation struggle, a people who threw off the colonial, neo-colonial and imperialist yoke. For all these reasons the people of Madagascar, the revolution and myself are happy to welcome you to Madagascar."

The chief of state went on to say that in fact the Vietnamese and Madagascar people have fought together in the past without knowing it: in 1947, when the Vietnamese were in the midst of their war of independence, the people of Madagascar had begun an armed struggle against their colonizers: the French expeditionary force sent to Indochina was then turned back to Madagascar. It must be said that the Malagasy and the Vietnamese have always struggled for the same causes, for the same objectives.

President Ratsiraka asked Gen Giap to convey to President Nam Nguyen Huu Tho and to Prime Minister Pha Van Dong the expression of his highest and most sincere esteem.

As for Gen Giap, he began by thanking once more the revolutionary powers and the Malagasy for the cordial and extremely fraternal welcome which had been bestowed on his delegation. He then expressed the warmest, most respectful greetings from the people, the national assembly and the president of the SRV.

"In history," he added, "there are similarities, destinies which are the source of a sense of community between people. This is the case for our two peoples. In our struggles, we benefited from the support of progressive peoples like the Soviets and our brothers, such as the Malagasy."

Gen Giap recalled that in 1947, during the armed struggle in Madagascar, his country men demonstrated in the streets against the colonists' repression of the fraternal Malagasy people. And it was during the bombardment of Hanoi that diplomatic relations were officially established between Madagascar and the SRV.

Addressing the chief of state in particular, Gen Giap affirmed that the former is known as being the champion of liberty and independence of Madagascar and as a supporter of the liberation struggle and the reunification of Vietnam.

President Ratsiraka and Gen Giap then spoke of the common struggle led by Ho Chi Minh, Jean Ralaimongo and Joseph Raseta, companions in struggle who had formed the solid and durable bonds between our two peoples. And even more today, our common objectives and our common ideal contribute further to strengthening these bonds. The visit of Gen Giap is the first sign contributing to the strengthening of these ties.

The chief of state, importantly, recalled his trip to Vietnam, at the time of President Thieu's regime, when he visited Hanoi and other towns, seeing the misdeeds of neo-colonialism: yesterday he demonstrated his happiness at the liberation and the reunification of Vietnam.

This affirmation was responded to by Gen Giap who saluted President Ratsiraka as the torchbearer of the struggle led by Jean Ralaimongo and the experienced architect of the solidarity between our two peoples.

During the president's discussion, it was also a question of the pawt struggle against colonialism and neo-colonialism and, in the future, against new strikes by imperialism, the struggle for peace, for the economic independence sought by the movement of non-aligned countries. The efforts of progressive peoples for the good of humanity, for human values, and the efforts of President Ratsiraka to make the Indian Ocean a peace zone [were discussed.]

It is to be stressed that Gen Giap took advantage of this meeting to invite, in the name of the Vietnamese Government, a delegation of the members of the supreme revolutionary council and the government, led by the chief of state, to the SRV. The invitation received an affirmative response.

[Text] "Ho ela velona ny firaisankinan'ny vahoaka vietnamianina sy malagasy!"

The large Vietnamese delegation, upon these words from Vice Prime Minister Vo Nguyen Giap, member of the political office of the CP Central Committee of the SRV, left the DRM Saturday morning, after a three friendship visit.

This brief Vietnamese visit to Malagasy soil was marked by talks between Gen Giap and President Ratsiraka, between President Andrianarahinjaka or the ANP, Prime Minister Rakotoarijaona and the front, by the signing of an agreement of economic and technical cooperation covering key sectors of agriculture and industry, by work sessions between our two ministries of higher education and health, by a joint communique and by banquets offered successively by the "fivondronana" of Tananarive, the revolutionary powers, the PNA and the Front.

It was Minister Phan Hien who made the first summary of the Vietnamese friendship visit to Madagascar, last Friday.

"We have made a friendship visit to a fraternal country where we have received a warm and cordial reception, where we felt at home.

We can say that everything is going well: the conversations and contacts that we have had, the discussions between Gen Giap and the president, the president of the PNA, the prime minister, as well as the contacts between our ministers of high education and health; everything has gone well.

There is a total understanding between our two groups as to the international situation, the regional situation and our bilateral relations."

Saturday morning leaders of the revolutionary powers, directed by Prime Minister Rakotoarijaona, accompanied Gen Giap and his party to the international airport of Ivato.

On that occasion, Vice Prime Minister Giap stressed his great regret and that of his delegation to be leaving "this radiant isle, populated with friends, brothers, who were so welcoming and who seem to have an afro-asiatic character."

"We have to leave," he said, "and our visit has been brief. One always regrets leaving when one leaves friends, brothers: the people of the radiant isle of Madagascar"...

"We will never forget the words of President Ratsiraka regarding our people, words of a brother, or the eminent leader of the brave people of Madagascar and the fraternal solidarity between the Vietnamese and Malagasy people."

Gen Giap said he was very impressed by Madagascar, its people, its flowers and the obvious optimism of the people.

He also spoke of the extremely cordial talks that they had with the leaders of Madagascar, talks which took place in a friendly and fraternal atmosphere, which revealed a unity of views on the great problems which interest us and which prove the similarity of our views on international problems and our bilateral relations." Gen Giap mentioned as well the economic and technical cooperation agreement signed Friday which is only a first step in the strengthening of our bonds.

"I believe," he said, "that the cordial and fraternal welcome given to the Vietnamese delegation says a lot about the health of our relations of the past, of today and of the future, and about the friendship between our peoples. I firmly believe that our visit will have contributed to the common cause, to the happiness of our two countries and to the peace in Southeast Asia, in the Indian Ocean and in the world.

We, Vietnamese and Malagasy, love peace more than any other peoples. We will do anything for peace, friendship, the happiness of the peoples. Peace and friendship, friendship and peace."

AKFM-KDRSM YOUTH STATEMENT

Tananarive MADAGASCAR-MATIN in French 20 Nov 80 p 2

[Editorial: "Statement by the AKFM [Congress Party for Malagasy Independence]-KDRSM [Democratic Committee to Support the Malagasy Socialist Revolution] Youth"]

[Text] The national executive office of the Federation of Revolutionary Youth AKFM/KDRSM (KDTM [Democratic Committee of Youth and Students for the Defense of the Malagasy Socialist Revolution]) states, in support of statements from the First Congress on the complementary nature of national and international affairs, and that these important dates not be forgotten, that:

The October Socialist Revolution in Russia is 63 years old, a revolution that eliminated the exploitation of man by man, changed the balance of power in the world, thus opening the door to socialism, and spread the forces of freedom and peace. This came as the result of the wish of the Soviet people.

The KDTM also congratulates the Soviet people and the youth through the Komsomol, and strengthens the solidarity and collaboration that exists between the two organizations since 1957.

This victory of the socialist revolution was echoed in several European, Asian, Latin American, and African countries, including Madagascar, who chose socialism for their national development and progress.

Still, the struggle is a difficult one. Imperialism and its lackeys do not accept this situation and continuously provoke conflicts and disturbances in various countries. For example, the Second World War provoked by Hitler's fascism. Millions of people were killed and hurt, among whom the Soviet people had the most victims. The Soviet people lost 20 million of their countrymen.

Opposition to war, its atrocities and its consequences led all youth and students the world over to rise up against the use of terrifying and sophisticated weapons, to oppose imperialism, fascism, colonialism neocolonialism, racism, Zionism, and apartheid. The union notably led to the formation of the World Federation of Democratic Youth (FMJD) on 10 November 1945, in London, bringing together all progressive youth in the world to fight imperialism and build a happy future.

There is also the International Student Union (UIE), established on 17 November 1946, and whose aim is to sensitize the youth and the students of the world so that they use their knowledge in the service of democracy and social progress.

The KDTM, a member of the executive committee of these two associations, pays tribute to all the youth and students who gave their life for the independence of the nation, the freedom and solidarity of the youth and students in the world. It also salutes the WFDY [World Federation of Democratic Youth] and the UIE for their actions on behalf of the people and the youth who still suffer from the injustices of imperialism, as well as for the 10 November international youth day and the 17 November international students day.

The FDTM reminds us that the youth and the students are not a separate class but a part of the people. It emphasizes the fact that, these days, when socialism and imperialism are in a state of confrontation, it is the duty of the youth and the students to fight for world peace and to help eliminate atomic weapons. That is why the FDTM is seriously preparing for the conference on peace to be held in Helsinki (Finland) in 1981.

The FDTM also salutes the 13th Congress of the UIE.

It reminds the Malagasy youth and students that Madagascar is at present at the stage of a national democratic revolution, building new structures while destroying old ones, and facing imperialism at the same time.

In all areas much has been achieved by the Revolutionary Authorities, and the youth and students were privileged and cannot fail to notice these achievements. It points out to them that certain false ideas can lead to unreasonable demands, which may be too big a burden for the nation and forget the interests of the majority.

Finally, the FDTM will give priority to the sensitization of everyone so that rumors and provocations launched by imperialism and its lackeys will have no influence.

REPORT ON AREMA SEMINAR ON SOCIAL, ECONOMIC ISSUES

Seminar Begins

Tananarive MADAGASCAR-MATIN in French 18 Nov 80 pp 1, 2

[Article: "A Week-Long Seminar of AREMA in Toamasina"]

[Text] Tamatave--The seminar on ideology, of the AREMA [Vanguard of Malagasy Revolution] militants of the Tamatave I and II fivondronana began yesterday in Madagascar's most important port. The opening ceremony took place in the morning, in the presence of a substantial delegation from the national headquarters of the AREMA of Ambohitsorohitra; Mrs Celine Ratsiraka, wife of the chief of state, Prime Minister Desire Rakotoarijaona, member of the AREMA's political department, and his wife, the CSR [Supreme Revolutionary Council] members Etienne Mora and Jean Baptiste Ramanantsalama, Minister Ampy Portos Augustin, member of the AREMA political department, the national administrative secretary, Desire Radimiharison, member of the AREMA political department, Mrs Hrotense Raveloson Mahasampo, coordinator of the AREMA national headquarters, as well as the wives of Ministers Geroges Ruphin, Bruno Rakotomavo and Simon Pierre.

AREMA At All Levels

Mr Stephen Jacques, president of the executive committee and AREMA first secretary of the fivondronana [as published] of Tamatave I, after emphasizing that the AREMA exists at all levels of the decentralized communities, stressed the achievements of the AREMA militants in the economic and social spheres.

In the economic area, it means the setting up of socialist production and trading precooperatives, in particular in the fivondronana of Tamatave II. These facilities, which he said are the responsibility of the AREMA militants, are in full expansion in spite of some maneuvers by reactionaries and enemies of the revolution to undermine it.

In the social area, the AREMA militants have also assumed responsibility as the vanguard of the revolution by establishing schools for basic education, the CEG [General Education Certificate], and nurseries.

National Objective

The president of the faritany executive committee, Mr Lahady Samuel, stated that these achievements are a reflection of all that is undertaken by the AREMA of the Tamatave faritany as well as of the militants of organizations affiliated with it: SEREMA [expansion unknown], MAREMA [expansion unknown] and VAREMA [expansion unknown].

In speaking of the faritany's economic life, Lahady Samuel stressed the rise in agricultural production, particularly in that of rice. That is a national objective, he said, and it is also the objective of every AREMA militant.

He announced that, to this end, the revolutionary authorities granted a large sum of money for the construction and the maintenance of roads, in order to improve the transportation of product and supplies.

With regard to schools and universities, the president emphasized the fact that the country needs competent and efficient technicians, and that there is no question of handing out diplomas.

In conclusion, he appealed for real and efficient collaboration between all revolutionary organizations that are members of the National Front for the Defense of the Revolution.

1981 Plans

Then came the turn of Mrs Celine Ratsiraka who, after singing the song of the revolutionary women of the AREMA, with the militant AREMA women of Tamatave I and II, fivondronana introduced Mrs Olga Ratoandro, national director of nurseries, and Mr Jean Manarivo, national director of supplies, from the KOPAREMA [expansion unknown].

Then she emphasized the national importance of the activities of the AREMA Militants, who have assumed responsibility in different areas in accordance with the directives for the struggle given by Comrade President Didier Ratsiraka.

The wife of the chief of state then spoke of the plans of the AREMA revolutionary women for the year 1981, within the context of the "international year of the handicapped." She said that it is better to prevent than to cure, and with this in mind the revolutionary women of the AREMA were able to get 1,300,000 polio-myelitis vaccines in tablet form, which were to be given to children under the age of 6.

She emphasized that this operation would be started in the nurseries, for which the AREMA women are responsible. It is our duty, she continued, to make our sisters aware of the need for children to be vaccinated.

Mrs Celine Ratsiraka announced, besides, that the delegation from the AREMA national headquarters had brought a batch of vegetable seeds to be distributed to the militant women Tamatave I and II fivondronana, still within the context of efforts to be made for increased productivity.

Revolution and Liberation

In his speech, Prime Minister Desire Rakotoarijaona first brought greetings from President Didier Ratsiraka, secretary general of the AREMA, to the militants of Toamasina I and II. Then he spoke of the national democratic revolution, stressing that it is a necessary step towards becoming ideologically mature, because revolution implies victory over oneself, victory over egotism and an equivocating mind, in order to insure socialistic edification.

There is no revolution without liberation, continued Prime Minister Rakotoarijaona, and he recalled the effort of President Didier Ratsiraka, who since his tenure as foreign minister has worked mainly to free Madagascar from any foreign domination, among them the new agreements for Franco-Malagasy cooperation, because the socialist revolution presupposes political independence and the running of the economy by the people.

Then the prime minister spoke of the time when the AREMA was established on 21 December 1975, after the people had adopted the charter of the socialist revolution with President Ratsiraka as leader, because a clear voice was needed, objectives had to be achieved, and we work, for all regions, towards these objectives and principles as defined in the Red Book.

With this process, indicated Col Rakotoarijaona, the AREMA militants must always be in the vanguard of the revolutionary struggle, for the national democratic revolution cannot last forever.

In closing, the minister emphasized the need for each and everyone to make an effort for increased productivity. On this subject, he gave information on talks he had with different delegations that had stayed in the RDM [Democratic Republic of Madagascar], which recently included the Chinese, Korean, and Vietnamese delegations who gave information especially on their experiments in agriculture.

From all these talks, the prime minister said, the conclusion was reached that the most important thing is the will to succeed and confidence in all that is being accomplished.

This seminar of the AREMA militants of the Toamasina I and II fivondronana will last a week.

Seminar Ends

Tananarive MADAGASCAR-MATIN in French 25 Nov 80 p 2

[Editorial: "End of the AREMA [Vanguard of Malagasy Revolution] Seminar in Toamasina"]

[Text] Toamasina--The ideological seminar of the AREMA militants of Toamasina, led by Prime Minister Desire Rakotoarijaona, ended on Saturday, with many members of the political department from national headquarters present. Mrs Celine Ratsiraka, president of the women's revolutionary branch of the AREMA, was also present at the ceremony. The occasion allowed for a general appraisal of the debates.

In his closing speech, Desire Rakotoarijaona, member of the political department, was very pleased at the serious tone and the determination that marked the seminar. He then insisted on reminding his audience that the historical phase of our revolution is today in the one that precedes socialism itself: the national democratic revolution. In order to succeed in this long-term task, the speaker asked that all those attending the seminar transmit to all AREMA militants patriotism and a willingness to serve the sovereign people; a patriotism which, he emphasized, makes many martyrs in the Toamasina faritany, as it does all over Madagascar. Besides, the desire to serve the people is nothing more than the determination to help this people find the solutions to its problems. Among these problems, Mr Rakotoarijaona picked those inherited from all stages of our country's history. Consultation, dialogue and solidarity, he continued, are indispensable tools for facing all problems. Yet he recommended vigilance because of subversive acts by enemies of the revolution. The last words of Mr Rakotoarijaona exhorted those present to promote production, for its potential is not negligible.

The members visited an exposition of floral art and some nurseries.

...And From Mananjary

The ideological seminar for the AREMA militants of the Mananjary fivondronana also ended on Saturday. CSR [Supreme Revolutionary Council] member, Marson Max, in the presence of Boto Victor, judge at the High Constitutional Court, presided over the closing ceremonies.

CSR member Marson Max, in his speech described assets of the fivondronana obtained since the advent of the revolutionary authorities, citing among others the husking facilities, the silo, and the Vohilave Bridge. In conclusion, Marson Max exhorted the militants to always persevere in their work to develop the country.

Providing Revolutionary Determination Through Action

Minister Geroges Thomas Indrianjafy, member of the political department, spoke on Friday, in Mandritsara, with the AREMA militants of the Andohajambo firaisana. The vanguard role of the AREMA, he stated then, must not remain a demagogic one, but it must prove itself through achievements in all aspects of social life. With this in mind, Geroges Thomas Indianjafy warned the militants to guard against all machinations by enemies who have not yet been disarmed and who are doing everything to negate all efforts already made. For their part, the militants of Andohajambo have reiterated their loyalty to the secretary general of the AREMA, President Didier Ratsiraka. A discussion concerning the problems of the firaisana and the fivondcnana ended the session.

The Class Struggle

A delegation from the political department of the AREMA, consisting of Messrs Manjakatsara Remi, Rarango Vincent, and William, recently met with the AREMA militants from the Vondrozo fivondronana in the Fianarantsoa faritany. During the meeting the militants, members of the delegation, explained that the meaning of class struggle is not to be confused with tribalism or with other reactionary ideas with which enemies try to poison public opinion. They recommended, moreover, collaboration and solidarity between all organizations affiliated with the AREMA, in order that all efforts succeed, starting with the political department's directives.

...And the Precooperatives

On Saturday, a delegation from the national headquarters consisting of Messrs Rajaonarivelo Marcel Victor and Andiamparany, led a session for ideological action in Ambatolampy-North, Ambohidratrimo firaisana. The structure of the AREMA, the collaboration and solidarity to help establish a just and equal society, the need to set up precooperatives, their organization and operation, were the subjects brought up during the meeting. The objective, they said, is the well-being of all Malagasy in a just and united society, from where all exploitation of man by man will be banished.

SECRET FUNDS SEEN SUPPORTING MMM

[Editorial signed 'Moving Finger': "Secret Funds"]

[Text]

This paper recently suggested that Mr Bérenger should tell the electorate where and from which countries he would obtain the funds which he says will be made available to Mauritius if he takes over the government. We are still waiting for that information

Meanwhile Mr Bérenger and his friends continue to talk about auto-gestive socialism as the objective of the MMM. Perhaps they, and we, should look more closely at today's example of auto-gestive socialism in action. The Polish government, and you can't be more auto-gestive than Poland, wants to borrow $ 3,000 million. And from whom? The liberal uncle Sam. If the auto-gestive government of Poland has got the country into such a mess that it needs to borrow this kind of money why does not it apply to its auto-gestive partner, the Soviet Union?

The short answer of course is that what Poles want to buy is food and not ideology and the Soviet government has only the latter on offer. Since they can't buy food with roubles the unfortunate poles have no alternative but to seek where the real money is obtainable even if this means demonstrating to the whole world that comecon is a fake and that Eastern bloc aid is a myth.

Perhaps Mr Bérenger, having digested these evident truths, will now let us know where these foreign loans are going to come from or, and more to the point, admit that they don't exist at least in any real financial sense.

Finally we ought all to reflect on how vulnerable our economy is and how often in the past when we have asked for help where it has come from. A fully auto-gestive socialised Mauritius aligned to the eastern bloc would find itself in the same position as the Poles today and perhaps it would also find uncle Sam less obliging.

DECLINE OF INDIAN INFLUENCE SEEN

Port Louis THE NATION in English 9 Nov 80 p 1

[Text] There was a time in the history of Mauritius when India was the fatherland of many people settled in this land. No wonder then when a very huge crowd turned out at Plaisance airport in 1948 to welcome the first Indian commissioner to Mauritius. Next to the British governor, the man with the Gandhi cap was the most important man of the realm. Village notables made it a point to have a picture taken with the Commissioner. Pictures of Hindu gods, Mahatma Gandhi and King George VI and later the Queen were standard ornaments in many homes.

Only Amitabh Bachchan can now attract a big crowd at Plaisance. The pictures of Nehru, Gandhi and British royalty are gone, pressured out by gaudy calendar displays of Hema Malini and Neetu Singh. Children of yesteryears had to learn the Indian anthem by heart in the baitka. Children of this generation would rather watch cartoons on FR3. How many people who can afford a foreign trip would make a pilgrimage to the land of our ancestors? You will meet them not on the bank of the Ganges: they are busy checking in and out of Terminal 3 at Heathrow Airport.

India was passionately loved by many. It was also subjected to a hate campaign by many. India is now another country, no more loved or hated than England and France. Mauritians have now come to regard India as dispassionately as possible. Of course, friends and critics have not disappeared altogether but surely India kindles no fire in any healthy heart. This, we believe, is one of the most positive developments in the difficult task of nation-building in Mauritius.

Hindi plays produced by Mauritains often portray a spineless, dhoti-clad, parasitical servant ministering to the whims and caprices of the "seth" and his "bibi". This fortunately is but an Indian situation. Mauritians have acquired social characteristics of their own. Not only have male servants disappeared long ago but Mauritians are clearly emerging as a breed of tough, proud and sophisticated people. Mauritius is now Mauritius and India is India. The twain met in the past; they are now falling apart.

The creolisation process, started 150 years ago when the first coolies came, has now gone a long way. Indian languages are fast disappearing; so are the social mores and customs of the first settlers. Religion and ritual have so far survived in spite of massive conversions but this has been possible only because of the sheer numerical strength of Oriental settlers. Their ranks have been heavily depleted through external assimilation.

In a matter of generations, the creolisation process will be churning out of our melting-pot another breed of Mauritians. Divali will become more spectacular still with an increased participation of the Catholic church. But what would remain of our Indian heritage will be the curry, the sari, some form of religion and ritual and the Indian cinema. Indian movies, it is reported, are very popular in African and Arab countries where of course, no one understands a single word of Hindi.

FUTURE COAL TERMINAL AT MAPUTO PORT PLANNED

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 22 Nov 80 pp 1-2

[Text] A new terminal to be used exclusively for the handling of anthracite coal will be built in the next five years at the port complex in Maputo, Matola zone, in a great undertaking carried out by the Mozambique National Office of Ports and Railroads.

This construction project, budgeted at about 1.6 million contos (estimate made in 1979), will provide a great increase in handling and goods transport capacity, estimated at between 5 and 7 million tons per year.

Bids will be solicited internationally early next year, following which the bid will be awarded to one of the competitors, giving him responsibility for the execution of the project. Construction as such will begin in 1982, and is expected to last about three years.

The construction of a new coal terminal will involve the better equipping of the port in the capital of the country, including each respective access channel. This is the case because the future terminal will be provided with equipment enabling it to accommodate vessels with a capacity of up to 80,000 tons of freight.

With this in view, other improvements to be made in the port of Maputo must be contemplated--the dredging of the access channels, as a function of the greater freight capacity of the vessels which will dock in the new terminal. Currently, the Maputo port terminal is equipped to accommodate vessels with a capacity of up to 60,000 tons of freight.

Characteristics of the New Terminal

The future coal terminal, with a loading capacity of 3,000 tons per hour, will be provided by stacking and recovery machinery, with a capacity of 1,600 and 2,500 tons per hour, respectively.

The complex will also be equipped with an unloading system capable of handling the equivalent of 50 freight cars, or 1,600 tons, per hour. Moreover, with the use of another type of freight car with a greater capacity, this operation may reach 2,500 tons per hour.

On the other hand, the new anthracite coal terminal will also be provided with operational improvements involving the building of a rail network which will make the constant movement of the freight cars possible, thus saving the freight car handling time before and after loading and unloading. In addition, the future coal terminal will have a larger goods storage area, which will make possible substantial expansion in the future and with it, increased coal handling capacity, coming within the general plan for the development of the port of Maputo.

The future coal terminal will be equipped with machinery similar to that at the present terminal, except that the new ore complex will be capable of handling a greater volume of this product.

CASHEW PRODUCTION AREAS ASSURED ADEQUATE SUPPLY OF OTHER GOODS

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 22 Nov 80 pp 1, 3

[Excerpt] Supplying the cashew marketing areas with other goods has been a predominant concern of agencies involved in the present harvest season, so that success not achieved since 1975 can be insured. Within this framework, the provincial domestic trade officers have been made responsible for establishing the quantities of consumer goods needed to support this campaign and integrating them into the territorial supply program. At the same time, conditions must be established to allow better supervision, so that these products go to the production areas at the proper time and in adequate quantities.

On the other hand, the various agencies involved in this important project must create the conditions necessary for supplying the production areas with soap, batteries, bicycles, radios, sandals, clothing, aluminum panels, hoes, lamp oil, blankets, school materials, matches and many other products which the school students as well as the peasants need.

With this in view, plans have been made for the delivery shortly of imported products to support the cashew marketing campaign, including among other things sewing thread, needles, pocketknives, flashlights, kerosene lamps and other articles essential to the rural population. These types of goods will be distributed in all the provinces of the country, with priority for support of the campaign. The provincial domestic trade officers will allocate the products not included in the supply plan to warehouses and tradesmen in the cashew areas on a priority basis.

Decisive Importance of Marketing

Great efforts have been made in connection with the national cashew marketing campaign, with a view to involving ever more participants and making yields greater than those in earlier years possible. Reports from Nampula indicate that the ninth session of the Provincial Assembly, which met several days ago, ratified the decision of the provincial government to establish a cashew campaign office, which will at the same time be responsible for the socialist emulation campaign during the cashew marketing season.

COLLECTIVE DEFENSE NEEDED AGAINST LIBYA'S THRUST INTO AFRICA

Niamey LE SAHEL in French 17-18 Dec 80 p 1

[Editorial: "The Time of Uncertainty"]

[Text] Far from solving the Chad problem, Monday's "takeover" of Ndjamena by the coalition forces of the Transition National Union Government (GUNT) supported by 200 tanks and almost 3,000 Libyan soldiers, if anything, adds to the confusion.

In Chad, the time of real uncertainty is beginning. And all the countries of central and west Africa now have reasons for concern. There are two basic questions about the future. First, who will be governing in Ndjamena. In view of the reverses inflicted on the government forces by Hissein Habre's FAN [Northern Armed Forces] since the beginning of the fighting, it seems evident that Oueddei Goukouni's "control" of the Chad capital is not due to his own troops but rather to the Libyan "Islamic Army." And will that army (and this is our second question) be satisfied with simply maintaining "order" in the "liberated" former Fort Lamy, or will the army make this town the main base for future redeployments in the south of the continent.

Libya's major commitments in men and materiel, and its leaders' recent statements, lead to the conclusion, for the present at least, that Chad is only the first phase of a thrust which, though crazy, is no less certain.

Therefore, our countries should no longer be meeting at summit conferences in a futile effort to unite a country which is now more divided than ever, but rather should be organizing collective defense capable of blocking the devilish ambition of those who are established in the streets of Ndjamena, and against whom Chad patriots, if they still exist, should turn their weapons.

INSTITUTE DISCUSSES REAGAN'S POLICY FOR AFRICA

Lagos DAILY TIMES in English 10 Dec 80 p 3

[NIIA Seminar Report by Kayode Soremekun]

[Text] Last week, the Nigerian Institute of International Affairs (NIIA) at Victoria Island, was a meeting point for quite a motley of people — university lecturers 'cut and dried' researchers, members of the armed forces, senior police officers and budding academicians in the form of post-graduate students from the University of Lagos.

These members of the country's foreign policy elite came together for the purpose of brain-storming issues on a one-day seminar which was appropriately titled 'Reagan and Africa.'

The Director-General of the institute, Dr Bolaji Akinyemi, kicked off on a rather spirited note by appropriately identifying why the seminar was being held. He was of the view that given the country's relative proximity to events in certain parts of Africa Nigeria could not afford to be indifferent to happenings in those parts of the world.

He went on to delineate the parameters within which the Reagan administration would work. In this respect he focused on the linkage approach, that the tendency to judge African issues not on their own merits but from a bi-polarity of vision characteritic of the super-Powers. He also pointed out that the special advisers of Reagan had been preaching the sanctity of peaceful resolutions — a move at variance with the strategy already sanctioned by the Organisation of African Unity.

He delved into the strategic domains by contending that these same advisers had promised to give a strategic role to South Africa in the defence of the South Atlantic sea lanes. In this respect he asked rather rhetorically. "Does this mean a lessening of American pressure for charges in South Africa in order to secure South African military support in the global contest between the Soviets and the United States?" All told, it was a good curtain-raiser.

Dr Ate of the institute, in the first of the two papers presented, enjoined the audience not to be eager as regards casting Reagan into predictive moulds, since he might even come in with some rather contrasting policies. In this respect, he cited Nixon, who against all expectations pulled America out of the Vietnam war and also pioneered the playing of the China card in relation to the Soviet Union. In the same vein, he opined that Reagan might even behave like a Democrat. Some hope that! Dr Ate went on to state three discernible themes of Reagan's African policy.

The first of these devolves on Human Rights — that the way Governments treat their nationals should not really concern anybody; that it is the belief of Reagan that statesmen should operate in the world as they found it, and not as they want it to be — an apparent allusion to the fact that the structures of apartheid are best left as they are. He also touched on the attractive lures of minerals and economic activity that are bound to shape US perceptions.

The presenter also gave some thought to the rebounds that are likely to ensure from Nigeria's pursuit of a policy that is antithetical to that of America. In this respect he asks how will our lucrative trade balance be maintained without sacrificing the country's political principles? In conclusion, Dr Ate succeeded in giving the much needed policy relevance to his paper, by contending that we can always sustain a Domestic Coalition which will act as an effective pressure-point. Obviously, Dr Ate must be envisaging something along the line of the Jewish body — a lobby so strong that it is capable of affecting the currents of American politics — rather than the reverse.

Changes

The second paper was presented by Dr Adele Jinadu of the University of Lagos. He started of on a rather comical note by saying that he was not one to reject invitations from the institute, given the body's knack for providing sumptuous foods and grand cocktails.

The basic thrust of his thesis was that no fundamental change should be expected from US African policy under Reagan. According to him this becomes obvious from the structure of constitutional powers and the logic of International Politics. He backed this up with the contention that Carter had embarked mainly on cosmetic reforms during his tenure; that US policy had been consistent since the Second World War. This writer feels that this is just one of those textbook theories. If Carter had ensured the kind of continuity that the don was talking about why the absolute shift to the right by the American electorate?

However, he went on to make a rather perceptive observation, when he said that Reagan's policies might have a boomerang effect on the American domestic scene. And such policies might result in a backlash, like an upsurge of the radicals in the American domestic scene. Are also that such radicals will be tempted to link happenings in their own domestic bases with the racial repression in South Africa. But where he went completely off side, was where he suggested that Nigeria could always prevail on Western Germany to help tone down some of Reagan's myopia as regards liberation on the African continent.

In this respect he offered the reason which bordered on the fact that Germany's stature had risen considerably under Chancellor Schmidt. The rationale is very sound, but methinks it is not just right. In fact, it is impolitic. This becomes obvious when it is realised that Otraz — a German-based company has rented one-third of Shaba province in Zaire under very repulsive terms. The company has irrevocable rights until the year 2,000. In addition, the German company has absolute sovereign rights over the area. The aim, according to its director, is to use the area for launching missiles and testing fire powers. All these at the approach of the 21st Century. Moreover, during Schmidt's visit to the country sometime ago, he said it loud and clear that Western Germany would continue to maintain its strong economic links with South Africa.

Now, given such a track record, can Western Germany be a credible and honest broker in African-American relations? The answer is obvious enough.

Of all the European countries Sweden is most suited for such a role. For one, the country has proved to be a friend of Africa in terms of meeting UN-motivated and commitments to the continent. Moreover, the country has since divested itself of all its economic investments in South Africa.

Priorities

Dr Nweze also of the University of Lagos, started by spiking the two papers. He pointed out that both exhibited some depth in the area of naivette. He also said that Nigeria should begin to mobilise African opinion at the continental level. In addition, he recommended a number of policy options for the Federal Government. The most important of these bordered on the diversification of the country's economic relations, such that the US, will stop being a near-absolute customer of our oil.

Another speaker pointedly directed his questions not to the writers of the two papers but to the chairman. He asked: "What are Africa's priorities in the next four years. How does the US fit into all these? What are the structural contexts that might swing Reagan? Dr R. A. Akindele — chairman — kept mute but Dr Akinyemi saved the day for him by painting a rather awesome picture of the Super-Powers. He said inter-alia: "the superpower has the capability to disarrange your house. You are likely to react to him, rather than other way round."

Dr Nnoli of Nsukka, condemned this power politics approach as rather defeatist. He attempted to emphasise the historical perspective, by pointing out that History is a whole load of repetitive moods, and that efforts should be made to locate Reagan's place in the consciousness of History. When this is achieved, he said, then the means of dealing with him becomes easier. The chairman, with his typical laconic humour, asked how this was to be done.

Dr Ralph Onwuka after several attempts to catch the chairman's attention next came in. He started off by stating the rather obvious — that Reagan will prefer South Africa to the rest of Africa. He went on to list a number of constraints on Reagan's African policy. He then made rather perceptive contribution about the leverage from oil. He said that, our muscle in this area is very minimal as we need every Kubo from this asset. He then suggested that we can still make use of the oil power, through OPEC.

According to him Africa can forge an identity of interests by trying the Palastinian situation to the South African problem. This means calling on the Arabs, through OPEC in a coalition of interests to influence US policy towards South Africa.

A female speaker recommended that our efforts should not be solely directed at America; that other countries like France and Germany should also be prevailed upon, in a kind of multi-pronged endeavour.

They are also said to be questioning the rationale behind the alleged ₦5,000 compensation due to them which has been paid to the Ondo State Government.

Another cause of disaffection, from the area stemmed from the separation of the Tsekelewu community from their kith and kin in Opuma, in Bendel State and their merger with Ondo State.

According to informed sources, Tsekelewu is one of the villages which constitute the Opuma community in Warri Local Government area of Bendel State.

It was further disclosed that although the Bendel State Government had been responsible for the provision of essential amenities and payment of teachers deployed to the area, the Tsekelewu town is officially in Ondo State as indicated in a recent map.

Peanut Production

Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 8 Dec 80 pp 1, 11

[Article by James Akande, Aliyu Modibbo]

[Text] GROUNDNUT production in Kano State has improved considerably this year as compared with the previous year.

This is because the quantity of the crop available so far in the state this year, is highly encouraging. An increase is being envisaged in the very near future.

Disclosing these facts in an interview with the New Nigerian in Kano last Thursday, the Kano Zonal Manager for the Nigerian Groundnut Board (NGB), Malam Abubakar Monju, said that the Kano depot was able to purchase only a few tonnes of groundnuts last year.

This year, he went on, the depot alone had over 1,000 tonnes of groundnuts being stacked into pyramids. According to him, Kano depot had an average daily reception of about 30 tonnes, adding that "the number of groundnut tonnage in the state is expected to rise soon".

The zonal manager explained that efforts are now being made to revive the past glory of groundnut especially in Kano State. He further said that pyramids often seen in the state in the past would also be restored.

The Nigeriam Groundnut Board, he stressed, had also intensified efforts aimed at encouraging farmers in the state to grow more groundnuts "because there is a ready market for the crop in the state".

He explained that groundnut farmers in the state are now responding favourably to the board's appeal for the planting of more groundnuts in all producing areas of the state.

Conducting me round the depot later, the zonal manager said many other depots in the northern states are receiving many tonnes of groundnuts from the Licensed Buying Agents just like the Kano depot.

Malam Abubakar described the change in groundnut production in Kano State as "dramatic", adding that the sudden improvement in its production was made possible through the board's persistent efforts to revive the crop and also the encouragement being given to its farmers by the board.

In another development drought and pests have destroyed groundnuts, wheat and guineacorn planted on about 80,000 hectares of land in different parts of Borno State this year.

This fact was disclosed by a member of the Borno State House of Assembly Committee on Agriculture, Alhaji Sule Abubakar Galadima, at the inaugural meeting of the ten northern states House of Assembly Committees on Agriculture which took place in Kaduna last Friday.

Alhaji Sule Abubakar said shortage of foodstuffs in the state is imminent.

He said little harvests were made from the crops that survived the disaster. He appealed to the Federal Government to assist the state in whatever way it could to relieve the farmers of the natural calamity.

Alhaji Sule Galadima said other problems facing the farmers in the state were that the irrigation farming they adopted at the river banks suffered because of the fall in the flow of water into River Yobe as a result of construction of dams in Kano and in Bauchi states.

According to him both Rivers Hadejia and Jama'are used to flow directly west of Gashuwa in Borno State and form River Yobe where farmers in the state benefited through irrigation on the banks of the river. He, therefore, called on Kano and Bauchi state governments to release the water during the months of May and June to enable the farmers to utilise it in growing wheat before the rains commence fully in the state.

He said the shrinking of the Lake Chad River Basin has also reduced the fishing activities on the lake. He, therefore, suggested that the government should dredge a channel to connect both Baga and Malam Fatori with open water to facilitate fishing on the lake.

Alhaji Sule Abubakar urged the Federal Government to distribute fertilisers in good time in order to prepare the farmers for the next planting season.

He suggested that a mechanical workshop be opened in all the local government areas of the state to look after the tractors allocated to them on hiring basis and training programme be arranged to acquaint the operators of the tractors with their technicalities.

Alhaji Sule Abubakar was optimistic that the Federal Government Green Revolution programme would be a success especially if it consulted the state governments on suitability of certain machinery to be used in the states.

Making the call at the end of a national meeting of the council in Calabar, Professor Martin Ijere, chairman of the council, emphasised the need for co-operative farmers, who are the principal executors of the Green Revolution programme, to receive formal training in the different facets of agriculture.

"For the council to meet the nation's high expectations in the programme," said Professor Ijere, "the three tiers of government must help in the the training of co-operative farmers."

The National Advisory Council on Co-operatives Development was set up last year to establish a working relationship with co-operative associations in the country with a view to getting them involved in the Green Revolution programme.

Fishing Industry Plans

Lagos DAILY TIMES in English 9 Dec 80 p 32

[Text] Local fishermen in Nigeria belonging to Cooperative Societies now have the opportunity to go into big time fishing. This is because various Cooperatives all over riverine areas of the country were recently the happy recipients of 45 new, modern fishing Trawlers purchased by the Federal Government.

This brings to over 303, the number of fishing Vessels licenced by the Federal Department of Fisheries, as the Minister of State for Agriculture had disclosed last year that 258 fishing Vessels had been licenced.

These new, medium-sized trawlers, the Minister had said, in addition to the Outboard engines, modern fishing nets, and other accessories acquired and sold to Local Fishermen and Cooperatives at subsidized rates last year, were meant to give them the opportunity of joining the commercial fishing industry instead of continuing with their individual subsistence fish-farming.

As at now the fishing industry consists of 32 registered Fishing Companies and the locals and some Cooperative Societies, in riverine and sea-fringed areas and according to an inside source, these companies are responsible for up to 1 million tonnes of fresh fish caught annually in Nigerian Territorial Waters.

He said that with the completion of infrastructural facilities such as fishing jetties, terminals, processing and storage facilities, and the acquisition of more modern fishing trawlers by companies and Government capable of handling 20,000 tonnes of fish per day, the annual fish production in the country could double in less than two years.

Our source also disclosed that as at now, more than 200 Vessels of the fishing fleet go for deep sea-fishing while about 103 of them do shrimping and inshore fishing.

This he added, is necessary if the country's schools of fish in our immediate vicinity waters is not to be depleted and that, he said is why the Government is encouraging even local fishermen to get involved in trawling.

Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 10 Dec 80 p 24

[Article by Yaro Ali Maiduguri]

[Text] THE Savannah Sugar Company in Numan, Gongola State, will start production early next year. Its production capacity is 100,000 tonnes of refined granulated sugar per annum.

To this end, all physical development and technical details for the take-off of the factory had been completed.

Speaking at Numan during the visit of the Minister of State in the Federal Ministry of Industries, Dr. I.J. Igbani, the Chairman of the company, Mr. Elias Natsan, said that an integral part of the project was the construction of Kiri Dam to provide water for irrigation purposes during the dry season.

He also said that 1,850 hectares of sugar cane were almost ready for harvest and the production of sugar would commence within a few weeks time.

The chairman observed that since the company was established in 1977 it had to struggle against severe financial constraints which started in late 1978 and waded throughout 1979 adding this had prevented the implementation of the financial plan to draw loan on schedule.

Mr. Natsan said that the company had provided direct employment to over 3,000 Nigerians of various grades and this would increase to about 6,000 when the company is in full operation.

He also announced that contracts had been awarded for the construction of the company's housing development programme.

Replying, the Minister Dr. Igbani urged the members of the board to ensure that they maintained the tempo of physical development of the industry so that the project would be completed on schedule.

"You are aware that huge sums of money have already been invested in physical development of the project and you should make sure that the project is result oriented," he added.

PLATEAU STATE BANS MUSLIMS' USE OF DEROGATORY WORDS

Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 5 Dec 80 pp 1, 7

[Article by M. A. Aliyubiu]

[Text] THE use of derogatory words such as "munkirai", "kafirai" "mushirikai", "wahabiyawa" and "dujal" (all meaning infidel) among muslims which contribute to the breach of peace, has been banned in Plateau State.

Government, therefore, appealed to all muslims in the state to desist from using such words in the interest of peace, unity and tranquillity.

This was the decision of the Plateau State Government on the report of the Committee on Darika and anti-Darika movements.

It will be recalled that following persistent conflict between the two sects, Governor Solomon D. Lar of Plateau State appointed a committee on the two movements on January 24, this year, to enquire into the cause of friction between the Darika and anti-Darika movements in the state and to recommend ways and means of removing them.

After the committee had toured the 14 local government areas and received oral and written memoranda from equal members of representatives of the two groups, it submitted its report in two volumes to the governor on April 11, this year. The chairman of the committee was Alhaji Ismaila Adamu, a judge of the state's Shari'a Court of Appeal.

A statement issued and signed by the Secretary to the State Government, Mr. S.S. Gofwen, in Jos yesterday, said the state government accepted the committee's recommendation that the widespread use of recorded cassettes containing "Darika and anti-Darika" abuses in public places which precipitated unhealthy relationships and breakdown of law and order be banned.

Henceforth the statement said any individual or group of persons found using such recorded cassettes in contravention of section 210 of the Penal Code shall be dealt with in accordance with the law.

It stated that the government, being aware of section 35 of the constitution of the right to "freedom of thought, conscience and religion" would support the provision and ensure that all the people in the state practice their religion without fear of molestation.

The government also accepted the committee's recommendation that an Islamic committee of learned muslims be established and charged with the responsibility of ascertaining the suitability of Islamic preachers who are knowledgeable in Islamic standards and make recommendations to the Jama'atul Nasril Islam for the issuance of preaching permits.

Members of such committee, it explained, would be appointed by the JNI who will entertain certain recommendations made by the Darika and anti-Darika movements for consideration and appropriate action where necessary.

'INDISCRIMINATE' RECRUITMENT OF ASIANS DEPLORED

Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 10 Dec 80 p 16

[Article by Abubakar Umar]

[Text] THE National Union of Bauchi State Students has condemned the indiscriminate manner by which Asians, especially Filipinos and Indians were being recruited into the services of the state.

The union said that by this practice, the state is made to employ "drop-outs" from other countries, as no nation would allow its best products to be engaged in the services of another nation.

This was contained in a communique issued after the fifth annual convention of the association which was held at the Advanced Teachers' College, Azare, recently.

The asociation has, therefore, appealed to the Bauchi State Civil Service Commission to embark on local recruitment of staff in our institutions of high learning. It said this should be done at the third term of each academic session.

Commenting on the activities of the state government, the union said though it realised that the government was making efforts in the spread of development projects in the state evenly, the students, however, expressed discontent at what they termed the concentration of such projects in three urban towns of the state. This has caused neglect of other springing urban towns in the rest of the 13 local government areas, the union further said. It advised the state government to copy a leaf from the Rural Resettlement Scheme being practised in Sokoto State.

The union noted with dissatisfaction the way some federal government institutions located in the power vested on him under violating the recent Federal Government directive on admission." It threatened to take legal action against any institution which failed to comply with the directive.

The association called for the re-organisation of the state scholarship board in order to ensure better productivity. It also appealed to the governor and his deputy to ensure that a student is included in the composition of the scholarship board.

DENIAL OF COTTON SHORTAGE--The General Manager of the Nigerian Cotton Board (NCB), Alhaji Abubakar Tunau Gusau, has denied that textile mills are not being provided with sufficient cotton lint. A Kaduna-based textile factory--Norspin Limited--which closed down last Monday, had alleged the "unavailability of sufficient quantity and quality of Nigerian cotton lint" as one of the reasons for its closure. In an interview with the News Agency of Nigeria (NAN) in Kaduna, Alhaji Abubakar said that during the 1979 cotton season, about 220,000 bales of cotton lint went to the mills as against the 250,000 required by them. He said that the deficit of about 30,000 bales was provided through imports. Alhaji Abubakar said that in recent years, the cotton board had always been filling-in stock for the mills which was later sold in the world market when the mills failed to clear them. He stressed that the cotton board had never "stood in the way of any mill that wants to import long staple cotton to supplement the short staple supplied by his board," adding that the NCB had recommended that the Federal Government should allow such mills to import cotton lint. He noted that while there had been a shortfall in the production of cotton lint this year, the board had always taken measures to ensure that textile mills were never short of the commodity. The General Manager further disclosed that the producer price of cotton would increase by 20 per cent and that cotton seeds would now sell at 400 Naira per tonne as against 330 Naira in the previous year. The presidential adviser said that the Federal Government had earlier provided shelter, food, clothing, health care and educational counselling for the refugees. The Saudi Arabian Ambassador in Nigeria, Mr. Muhammed Faki, said that while President Shagari was in Mecca recently, the Islamic league had a meeting at which it was agreed that Nigeria's relief efforts to the Chadian refugees should be supplemented. It was then decided that the tents should be sent to the Federal Government in appreciation of its humanitarian efforts. The Pakistani Ambassador in Nigeria, Mr. Mohyuddin Ahmad, and the Special Assistant on Statutory Boards, Alhaji Buba Ahmed, were at the ceremony. [Text] [Lagos DAILY TIMES in English 8 Dec 80 p 18]

PLATEAU NPN GAINS FOLLOWERS--More than 7,000 supporters of the Nigerian People's Party (NPP) and the Great Nigerian People's Party (GNPP) in Plateau State, have decamped and declared for the National Party of Nigeria (NPN) in the state. This time, the people decamped from Wamba District of Akwanga Local Government area of the state during a mammoth rally organised by the NPN to welcome the "escapees" at Wamba, at the weekend. Addressing the crowd, an executive member of the party in the area, Alhaji Abdu Waju said that the entire people of Makere, Magga and Unguwan Maiganga have declared for the party. Giving reasons for their action, a spokesman Malam Madaki Makere said that both the NPP and the GNPP as well as the UPN consisted of narrow-minded and inward looking people. Malam Madaki said that they have been deceived and lured into voting for the wrong party and that they have now discovered that NPN was the best political party in the country. In his contribution, the state Director of Research and Publicity, Alhaji Yaya Abubakar said that his party will sweep the polls during the forthcoming local government elections in the state. MORE MONEY FOR ABUJA--The President had found out that the initial cost of developing the new federal capital of Abuja estimated at ₦553m. per year from 1981-85 was rather insufficient. He therefore said that ₦259m. would be allocated to Abuja from the Federal Share of the Federation Account, while ₦350m., representing the 2.5 per cent earmarked for it, was expected to be made available additionally. The summary of the total allocations to the ministries (as contained in the 1981 Appropriation Bill now being discussed by the National Assembly) is as follows: Ministry of Defence--₦725.1m., Education--463.6, Police Affairs--405.6, State House--369.9, Works--278.2, Finance--133.7, Health--119.8, National Assembly--42.4, Science and Technology--99.0. Other highlights in the budget include a proposal to build five new airports at Onitsha, Bauchi, Minna, Owerri and Akure, further development of the Murtala Muhammed Airport Ikeja, to which ₦20m. was allocated, ₦5m. for further development of Calabar Airport, ₦1m. for Enugu Airport, and ₦2m. for Abuja Airport. A nautical college will be established at Oron in Cross River State at the cost of ₦4m. A major project on water transport was a proposal to construct a ferry terminal at Festac Town to ease transportation problems between the Lagos Mainland and the newly grown area of Lagos inhabited by many civil servants who come to work in Lagos. LAGOS TECHNICAL COLLEGE--A Technical College to be established in Lagos State will take off in September, next year. Ketu, on the outskirts of Lagos has been named as the temporary site of the college. The Lagos State Commissioner for Education, Dr Olawale Idris made this known in Ikeja while inaugurating a "Task Force" Committee for the proposed State Technical College. The committee consists of the chairman, the deputy secretary, the chief inspectors of planning, education and test. Others are the assistant chief inspector of education (secondary), Chief B. Adebowale, Professor Ayo Ogunseye and Chief Oladapo. As the Technical College would be the first of its kind in the state, Commissioner Idris continued, a lot of short-comings of technical education in Nigeria would be solved. In his opening address, the Commissioner remarked that the motive for inaugurating the Committee was to make the impossible possible and to make a dream of a living reality. BENUE STATE BANK--The Benue State Government is to establish a commercial bank to cater for the economic and commercial development of the state. Announcing this in an interview on the Radio Benue programme "Guest of the Week" in Makurdi, last weekend, the state Special Adviser on Economic Planning, Mr. Toryima Orga, said the government had entered into an agreement with a Korean banking organisation for the effective implementation of the venture. Mr. Orga disclosed that the Korean body had studied the proposal. When fully established, he said, the bank would help both the private and government sectors in their various development programmes with a view to boosting the industrial, social and commercial activities of the state. SOUTH AFRICA INCREASES INTERNATIONAL BORROWING

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 1 Dec 80 p 20

[Text] LONDON — International borrowing by South Africa has been growing at a much faster rate than generally appreciated.

After a slow-down in foreign fund-raising in the wake of the Soweto uprisings in 1976, South Africa had reportedly made a cautious return to capital markets in 1979 and 1980.

But, according to new statistics from anti-apartheid groups, this understates the facts by a sizeable margin, with South Africa raising money on 16 separate occasions in 1980 alone.

The feature of South Africa's fund-raising on international capital markets has been the relatively small sums borrowed each time.

For example, the latest loan — a private bond issue for the Escom electricity utility — puts a tiny R12m into Pretoria's coffers.

MOTIVES

Such modest sums can be set against South Africa's strong economy, with a projected 1980 growth rate of 7 percent, massive inflows of capital because of the gold price strength and a balance of payments surplus of at least R3 000-million.

This prosperity when measured against the modest funding programme adds weight to the belief that South Africa's motives for rasing money are not entirely financial.

The general view is that while South Africa does not immediately need to raise extra funds, it may in future need the support of the international banking community. Raising money now at a time of financial strength will enable the Government in Pretoria to extend its obligations and tie itself closer to foreign banks and governments through the role of debtor.

Outside the sophisticated bush telegraph of the international banking community, South Africa's fund-raising has appeared cautious and modest.

Whereas the 250m dollar syndicated loan and DM120m Eurobond issue in the late European summer drew the South Africans into public gaze, a further nine separate loans have been raised privately. A further nine had been raised privately in 1979.

Ostensibly the syndicated credit and the D-mark bond were seen as part of South Africa's rehabilitation on capital markets following Soweto.

However, it is now clear that, judging by the rate of borrowing in the past 18 months, South Africa has not needed to rehabilitate itself.

The list of banks involved in funding Pretoria in the past "quiet" year and a half includes Barclays, Hill Samuel and Standard Chartered of Britain, Citicorp of America, Swiss Bank, Credit Suisse and Kredietbank of Switzerland and Deutsche Bank Dresdner of West Germany.

PRESS COMMENT ON BOTHA REFERENDUM DECISION

Pretoria SOUTH AFRICAN DIGEST in English 5 Dec 80 pp 22-24

[From the "Comment & Opinion" section]

[Text]

DIE BURGER

The referendum option

The Prime Minister's decision to call a referendum if the President's Council should make drastic constitutional proposals, is a further unfolding of the process of constitutional development tackled at his initiative. It is acceptance of yet another democratic mechanism to ensure that the voters lend their support to important steps in creating a new dispensation for South Africa.

The creation of the President's Council itself is an effort to obtain the greatest possible agreement on constitutional and other changes or reforms, so that South Africa can keep abreast of the demands of the times. The position now is that as soon as the President's Council comes up with a consensus proposal which necessitates deviation from an important and established principle, over which differences of opinion might exist, it will not only be the Government and party congresses which will decide on the issue, but the will of the voters will be tested in a referendum.

In this the Prime Minister makes a very wise move. He allows voters to have a say in important decisions regarding the changes to an existing dispensation, decisions which will affect their future. Just how important the opinion of the voters is, was shown in the last referendum, held in 1960 concerning a Republic. It became clear that there was no surer way of testing the approval or disapproval of a drastic constitutional step. The result, although not overwhelming, showed above all doubt that most voters favoured a Republic. The referendum assured acceptance.

We assume that the President's Council will, among other things, consider and make recommendations on the burning question of a new constitutional dispensation for the Whites, Coloureds, Indians and Chinese, a part of the country which they occupy together. Their political rights and representation in official bodies in such a dispensation is already being discussed and it is clear that divergent views exist. An important matter such as this, should the President's Council make a recommendation concerning it which contained a new principle, would be a good example of the type of question on which the voters will be able to decide by way of a referendum.

The Premier did not indicate the parameters within which the referendum would be applied, but it is scarcely imaginable that it would be confined to only one population group, as the interests and the future of all the population groups will be affected. That is, however, an aspect of the matter on which clarity still has to be obtained.

THE CAPE TIMES

Mr Botha's choice

The Prime Minister indicated at the weekend that he would call a referendum to test opinion on any far-reaching constitutional proposals which the President's Council might put forward, as for example a proposal for direct Coloured representation in Parliament. If a referendum were to endorse such a proposal, Mr Botha would be better placed to lay it before his provincial party congresses with some hope of success. It remains doubtful, however, whether the Transvaal congress of the party would go along with any scheme which proposed a single Parliament for White and Coloured (and Asian) South Africans. The Transvaal leader, Dr A P Treurnicht, almost certainly would not. In this, Dr Treurnicht could probably command the support of the majority in the Transvaal congress. Unless Mr Botha is prepared to bypass the Transvaal congress, therefore, such a proposal would remain on the drawing boards. It is doubtful whether the President's Council, which is already low on credibility, could survive a reverse of this kind or the spate of resignations which would follow. So Mr Botha is going to have to choose at some stage between restoration of the Coloured franchise in some acceptable form — and Nationalist unity.

A referendum will bring Nat showdown nearer

As the feud in the National Party deepens, the trend towards drastic measures by one faction against the other increases. And most dramatic of such moves is the commitment by the Prime Minister, Mr P W Botha, to take any greatly revised constitutional plan to the people at a referendum, instead of to the party formations.

But in threatening to by-pass the conservatives by going over their heads to the people, Mr Botha is also admitting publicly that the conservatives in his party may be strong enough to block caucus and congress support for major constitutional changes. To get such changes through, Mr Botha may thus be forced to rely on outside (Opposition) support.

Such a move could well precipitate a split in the National Party, but it is a risk which circumstances are forcing Mr Botha to take. His Government has given the go-ahead for the multiracial President's Council to make constitutional proposals, and if that council is to do its job to any effect at all, it cannot propose less than full political participation for coloureds, Indians and Chinese in the same system with whites.

Mr Botha would be bound to heed such recommendations — even at the expense of party unity. We, for our part, would welcome a referendum if it helped achieve meaningful change towards full political rights.

In another part of his Ladysmith speech, Mr Botha was on weak ground. That was in his attack on newspapers for publishing reports on alterations to the Erasmus Commission document.

Mr Botha contrived to twist an exposé of a right-wing plot against him into a Press "cover-up". He also seemed to think, at this late stage in the Nationalist feud, that there is only one man "stalking the country with a dagger to stab the Prime Minister". In the sense of trying to destroy his power, we believe there are many more than he suspects.

The Star

Yes, let's vote — for the right reasons

A referendum to give the Prime Minister a mandate to make dramatic reforms in South Africa is to be welcomed. It could eliminate the cut-throat party power struggle and consign the right-wing to limbo where it belongs. Massive support for radical change could set South Africa on the road out of the dark ages. The Prime Minister has provided himself with a glorious opportunity.

We are talking about a referendum designed specifically to rescue South Africa — not just the ruling National Party. A referendum should not be used merely to blow out the right-wing, or to protect the status quo in government. White South Africa, to survive, has to avoid the preoccupation with white political party in-fighting when dealing with national issues that affect far more people than the relatively minute electorate.

The referendum could be a disaster if the wrong questions are posed — and the wrong questions are tempting to arrange. Instead any referendum should be daring, forward-looking and unequivocal. It would be easy, for instance, to win a referendum to get Coloured people on a separate roll. That would put this country back where it started a quarter of a century ago, a generation of opportunity down the drain. If there is to be reform, it has to be far more convincing.

Most of all, the Indian and Coloured people must be involved because it is their political future that is being tossed into the arena. There is no technical problem there because elections to the Coloured People's Representative Council and the Indian Council required voter registration. Fair play is one good reason for including the Indian and Coloured people. Another is that it would be a symbol of the Government's earnest of good faith and willingness to consult rather than dictate. A third convincing reason is that it would be an act of enlightened selfinterest.

A referendum to beat the right-wing would be enormously satisfying, but if it is based on the wrong issues, it would alienate the Indian and Coloured people. Then White South Africa would really be up the creek.

Johannesburg E — December 1

Die Transvaler

The Coloureds and a referendum

In the existing turbulent political climate in the National Party, especially as regards the road ahead for Coloureds and Asians, the Prime Minister, Mr P W Botha, at the weekend in Ladysmith, emphasised three important guidelines.

The Government itself would decide on proposals for minor changes;

NP congresses would be consulted about changes of principle:

Radical changes would be submitted to the people by means of a referendum.

The basic truth of South African politics is that suitable political structures will just have to be devised for the Coloureds and Asians. Other than the Blacks, the Whites, Coloureds and Asians together possess the same fatherland — and a true and visible configuration will have to be given to this reality one way or another.

The Prime Minister's announcement that he would arrange for a referendum in the event of the President's Council putting forward radical proposals, should be seen as a further step in this approach.

In politics the question as to what the nation feels about a certain matter is often bandied about. Depending on the speaker's own personal attitudes, he can use a public platform to present the view of the people as being one thing while another speaker is claiming, with equal force, that the people are really saying something else.

It is equally true that the nation should not be hoodwinked as regards future constitutional developments. Any nation needs leaders who are prepared to lead the way and provide single-minded leadership.

But there are also times in the history of a nation when top leadership has to engage in dialogue with the people and submit its initiatives to them in order to take the nation with it along this road. It is therefore beneficial for a people to be truly tested at times in order to ascertain its will — by means of a referendum or an early election, thus obtaining clarity regarding the political direction which has to be pursued.

Johannesburg A — December 1

Oggendblad

Clarification needed

No fault can be found with the basic idea of holding referenda or plebiscites for testing the will of the people. It is, indeed, through a referendum that we became a republic — to our everlasting benefit.

The latest idea of a referendum on thorny political decisions creates a number of questions which we would like to see answered with greater clarity.

As we understand it, such a referendum can be held if the President's Council makes a highly controversial recommendation such as, for example, common voting rights and representation for White, Brown and Indian without it having been approved or accepted by National Party congresses.

The question which arises is what the National Party's recommendation to the voters would be as to how their votes should be cast — and who is to decide what that recommendation should be? We can envisage the theoretial possibility that the Cape NP congress recommends a "yes" vote and actively works for such an answer, but that the Transvaal or the Free State congress — or both — ask their supporters to vote "no".

Add to this the fact that the Progs and the NRP will side with one group against the other and a divisive factor, never before seen in the party, would be created. Another question — what is meant by a people? Is this to mean purely the White voters, or will Coloureds and Indians also cast votes on such thorny questions and will all the votes be cast into the same ballot box?

Just the possibility of such plebiscites has immediately produced sharply divergent viewpoints. It is important, in the interests of unity, to quickly obtain clarity on these issues.

'DIE BURGER' PFP SUPPORT OF REFERENDUM SHOWS WEAKNESS

Capetown THE CAPE TIMES in English 3 Dec 80 p 12

[Reprint of 2 December 'DIE BURGER' editorial: "Also a Boycott Test"]

[Text] HOWEVER qualified, the way in which the Opposition leader, Dr Van Zyl Slabbert welcomed the prime minister's intention to have drastic constitutional reforms tested by a referendum, will be interpreted by many people as an attempt at escape — to get away from the boycott standpoint over which serious misgivings have arisen even within his Progressive Federal Party.

Although a little Prog propaganda sheet only recently preached that it was not only the PFP's duty to boycott the President's Council, but its honour, Dr Alex Boraine, MP, in his capacity as acting leader of the party subsequently conceded that this boycott standpoint had damaged the PFP.

This standpoint is based on the objection that blacks would be excluded from the proceedings of the President's Council. Although it was repeatedly clearly stated at the highest level that, whenever necessary, black people would indeed be involved in the constitutional process, the Progs persevered with their boycott.

What justification could there be then for the Progs to participate in a referendum on constitutional changes recommended by the President's Council — except as an escape from the boycott morass in which they had allowed themselves to get bogged down?

The Opposition leader glides lightly over this dilemma, except that he warns of "the great danger if a dispensation for coloureds, Indians and Chinese should be created against another dispensation for blacks."

It is this kind of reasoning which makes the political arguments of the official Opposition so incomprehensible. After all, is there not already another irrevocable dispensation for a large section of the black people — with three independent homelands and other semi-independent homelands with their own government system and leadership? And this cannot be argued away or undone.

The existence of the already independent or semi-independent national states which are expected to come fully into their own in the planned constellation of states, is the one rock against which the Opposition's boycott standpoint gets shattered time and again.

The other rock is white public opinion, as recent by-elections have shown, in which the PFP's boycott standpoint was tested. Apparently the voters accept the assurances that the black people concerned will be consulted by the President's Council when their role in the process of constitution-making becomes topical. However, it is expected that priority will have to be given to a new dispensation which offers meaningful representation to whites, coloureds, Indians and Chinese.

The Progs have excluded themselves from these exciting constitutional processes. The Prog leadership's sudden excitement over a referendum can only be ascribed to growing concern over the damaging consequences to the party itself as a result of the prevailing boycott mentality in its ranks.

PRETORIA COUNCIL APPROVES SOME MIXED FACILITIES APPLICATIONS

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 28 Nov 80 p 3

[Text] Pretoria's City Council approved half of the 24 applications for mixed facilities received over the past year.

Among the venues given the green light are restaurants, private hospitals, a swimming bath, sports grounds, a church hall of the NGK and trading areas near the station and in Pretoria West.

Applications for drive-in cinemas were unsuccessful, while the city's soccer row and parks dispute were held over for early next year.

At their monthly meeting last night, the councillors passed all the recommendations for open amenities made earlier by the management committee.

Applications for mixed facilities by several sports bodies were also approved--some with strings attached.

--The NT Women's Hockey Association will be allowed to host matches between whites and a team of coloureds at its Pretoria West headquarters, which are leased from the council.

--The NT Women's Bowling Association will be able to affiliate a black club in Atteridgeville/Saulsville. It means the club members can compete in NTWBA competitions on municipal greens if the host clubs give their consent.

Restaurants given the go-ahead are at the OK Bazaar branches and at Wonderboom Airport, which will only be permitted to cater for black air passengers and not blacks generally.

NEW BANNING ORDERS CRITICIZED

'MUSLIM NEWS' Comment

Capetown MUSLIM NEWS in English 28 Nov 80 p 20

[Editorial: "Bannings"]

[Text] The banning of Jamaluddin Hamdulay, Johnny Issel and Henry Ferris has once again created feelings of suspicion, expectancy and uncertainty in the minds of people. Is this the beginning of another clampdown by the security police, similar to the one in October 1977 when 18 organisations and two newspapers were closed down and some 42 people were banned and detained?

At the time the actions of the government were seen, here and abroad, as acts of ruthless tyranny because of the untold harm it did to people. These recent spate of bannings are aimed at dealing fatal blows to those committed to change in this country. The indiscriminate action of the government in carrying out these bannings on people who are really concerned with peaceful change is driving all these people to complete disillusionment and the acceptance of the inevitability of violent confrontation.

The collision course the Nationalist government is leading this country to can be avoided if they start listening to the people who really matter instead of silencing them with arbitrary measures such as bannings and detentions. No amount of repressive measures will provide an answer.

Furthermore, bannings may attempt to silence critics of the racist and exploitative system in this country, but the flame of truth and justice will forever glow in the hearts of the banned. No amount of state harassment can still the ideals of those who wish to see a country where basic human rights are respected, where pigmentation is not the criteria for judging the worth of a human being, and where millions are not humiliated and exploited to fill the coffers of a few — in short a system that is civilised in the true sense of the word. Not a system that resorts to the cowardly act of bannings and detentions, incarcerating people without giving them the God-given right to defend themselves in an open court of law.

And those voices of freedom that are still not gagged: will they allow themselves to succumb to the threatening stance the state has now adopted? Will the fate of Jamaluddin, Johnny and Henry, and others similarly restricted, deter other voices of liberty?

The answer seems to be an emphatic NO! Those who have thoughts of succumbing should take heed of the Qur'anic advice:

'Be not weary and faint-hearted, crying for peace, when you should be uppermost; for Allah is with you ...' (47: 35)

SOEKOR STRIKES OIL NEAR MOSSEL BAY

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 23 Dec 80 p 1

[Text] MOSSEL BAY. — Soekor has struck oil near Mossel Bay in a "significantly higher quantity" than anywhere else in the Republic so far, according to a statement yesterday.

The statement said Soekor was evaluating a gas find located 80 km south of Mossel Bay, where three porous sandstone layers totalling 70m were intersected at a depth of about 2 700 m.

The lowest layer had already been tested and flowed at a rate of 11 million cubic feet of gas a day and about 200 barrels of gas condensate, or very light oil. The two remaining zones would be tested during the next fortnight.

"The amount of gas produced so far is less than that found in the best hole in the Plettenberg Bay field, but one should take into account that only a tenth of the reservoir thickness has been tested so far.

"The amount of oil produced is significantly higher than that from any other hydrocarbon occurrences which have been tested so far in South Africa, both on land and offshore.

"It is still far too early to speculate about the possibility that this is an economically exploitable discovery and a lot will depend on the size of the field, which has yet to be established, and the quality of the results obtained in follow-up wells," the statement said. — Sapa.

INFORMATION DEPARTMENT TO CONCENTRATE ON INTERNAL PROJECTS

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 8 Dec 80 pp 1, 3

[Article by Peter Sullivan]

[Text] South Africa has recalled a number of information officers abroad in a major redirection of the department's energy towards internal rather than foreign tasks.

One of the top priorities in the revamped department is to "sell" concepts like the President's Council, the Wiehahn Commission and the Development Bank internally.

In a major shake-up of overseas postings, top officials have been recalled from most of Europe's capitals and replaced with people from the Department of Foreign Affairs' head office.

While a few of those recalled are disgruntled by the move, there seems to be an acceptance of the fact that the marriage of Foreign Affairs to Information meant a shake-up.

One of the information officers recalled is Mr Chris van der Walt, a product of the Eschel Rhoodie Information Department era, and there is talk that he will head the new internal team.

Among the plans being weighed up by the department is one to send special information teams across the country.

These teams would use slides, maps, graphs and other visual aids to "enlighten" the public on the Government's latest initiatives.

The Minister of Foreign Affairs and Information, Mr Pik Botha has denied reports of friction between his information and foreign affairs wings.

He said information officials could hardly be dissatisfied with the new deal because they would now be able to reach the position of ambassador for the first time.

Dr Johan Visagie, of the New York embassy, has resigned to take up a lectureship at Pretoria university, and Dr Johan Adler, information director at South Africa House in London, has resigned to take up a top public relations position with a brewery in Johannesburg.

ZIMBABWE SITUATION GIVES REASON FOR HOPE

Capetown THE CAPE TIMES in English 8 Dec 80 p 8

[Editorial: "Zimbabwe Normalizing"]

[Text] IT WAS gratifying to note the constructive remarks about the new Zimbabwe made by Dr J G van der Horst, chairman of the Old Mutual, at the society's annual meeting on December 4. There are people around — faint-hearted, destructive or whatever — who would present Zimbabwe as on the brink of disaster. Although there have been distressing events across the Limpopo, and there will no doubt be more, at least 40 people are not dying each day in warfare, a statistic that is not easily lost on insurance companies. There is ground for believing that if Western governments backed by big business will pitch in and help, Zimbabwe could signal hope for Southern Africa. The process has been slow, but there are signs of improvements in foreign aid. A heavy responsibility rests on business people (particularly South Africans) to give Mr Mugabe's fledgling state a reasonable chance. At least there is something to go on, using the insurance industry as a barometer. The facts and figures come from Dr Van der Horst's chairman's statement. He spoke of the "very welcome" reduction in the war claims in Zimbabwe.

Since the escalation of the war in Zimbabwe in 1976 the society has had to meet war claims amounting to over R10m in Zimbabwe. This has been one of the major causes of the reduced bonus rates that the society has declared in Zimbabwe since 1978. The cessation of the war in Zimbabwe and the return to a more stable situation has enabled the society to resume more normal bonus rates there.

He noted that as a result of the settlement in Zimbabwe mortality rates had virtually returned to normal and the investment climate had improved substantially. The Old Mutual's improved bonuses in Zimbabwe "clearly demonstrate the society's confidence in the future of Zimbabwe".

● People who are really interested in peace in the sub-continent can only say: Well said, Dr Van der Horst, and amen.

DEFENSE DEPARTMENT RATES MEDIA ON POSITIVE, NEGATIVE ATTITUDES

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 28 Nov 80 p 2

[Article by Mike Derry]

[Excerpt] Press support for the "Free Mandela" campaign is regarded by the Department of Defence as subversive, the Steyn Commission of Inquiry into the Mass Media was told yesterday.

Brigadier G M C Wassenaar, one of the officers giving evidence for the Department of Defence, said the department took this attitude because the campaign was against the will of the State.

Another officer, Brigadier G van Rooy, said that in a survey of attitudes in the Press, it was found that 18 percent of the Press's attitude to the Prime Minister, Mr P W Botha, was positive. Nelson Mandela scored 41 percent.

The commission heard that the Department of Defence kept a close statistical watch on the attitude of the media to various issues.

However, the evidence led yesterday was specifically on the Press, and no figures on the broadcasting media were led as evidence.

Brigadier Wassenaar said there was the negative and the positive media. The positive media was defined as supporting the army and the Government.

Positive or negative attitudes of up to 35 percent were regarded as normal. If a newspaper had a negative attitude of substantially more than 35 percent, it was regarded as "revolutionary," he said.

Brigadier Wassenaar said the media had a right to report on an event, as long as the reporting was objective.

The Department of Defence had no argument with negative reporting, as long as it stayed within the 35 percent norm.

HNP LEADER ATTACKS NP'S HOMELAND POLICY

Johannesburg RAND DAILY MAIL in English 5 Dec 80 p 4

[Text] KING WILLIAM'S TOWN. — National Party policy in South Africa was leading to black majority rule, Mr Jaap Marais, leader of the Herstigte Nasionale Party, said in King William's Town this week.

Addressing a meeting of about 400 people in the town hall, Mr Marais said the present National Party policy was communist inspired.

In his address, relayed by loudspeaker to blacks and other people in parked cars outside the hall, Mr Marais said the present government was taking over the policies of the Progressive Federal Party and, for that matter, the Communist Party.

"P W Botha said in 1973 that Russia was making use of change agents to undermine people's will. In 1979, the Sunday Times said in a report that Mr Botha was one of South Africa's change agents, along with Piet Koornhof, Gerrit Viljoen and Magnus Malan."

He said they wanted the white man to accept the black as a social equal and this would lead to black majority rule.

"The government believes every time they give a town away, the people's resistance will be lower and lower. He added South Africa would follow "the same disastrous path that resulted in Zambia, Kenya and Zimbabwe".

Mr Marais said: "You here will be incorporated in a black state where there will be no development."

Mr Marais said blacks would not be satisfied with King William's Town, but would want more and more towns.

"We can add half of the country to the homelands and all that will happen is that within three years there would not be enough food left in the homelands to feed an insect."

Mr Marais criticised the government for giving independence to homelands when they were not yet in a financial position to maintain themselves.

"Not one of the black homelands in this country can claim economic independence," he said.

Mr Marais said the only honest thing the government could do was hold a general election in which the issue of change should be made prominent. He also called for a referendum so that the people of King William's Town could decide their own future.

"By adding King William's Town to the Ciskei, not a single problem will be solved but a lot of problems will be created," he said. — Sapa.

REPORTAGE, COMMENT ON LABOR DEVELOPMENTS

Industrial Health, Safety Legislation

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 10 Dec 80 p 7

[Text] The Minister of Manpower Utilisation, Mr Fanie Botha has announced that the Government has reconsidered the recommendations of the White Paper in connection with parts three and four of the Commission of Inquiry into labour legislation and had decided that:

--There will be a separate Act on industrial health which will be administered by the Department of Health, Welfare and Pensions.

--That a directorate for industrial health be established in the Department of Health, Welfare and Pensions.

--That the Department of Manpower Utilisation remains responsible for industrial hygiene and safety.

Auto Industry Labor Progress

Capetown THE CAPE TIMES in English 10 Dec 80 p 5

[Text] PRETORIA. — There has been considerable progress in black employment opportunities, education, training and advancement in the automobile manufacturing industry over the past two years, according to surveys conducted by the University of South Africa's Institute of Labour Relations.

The results of the surveys, held to establish the extent to which vehicle manufacturers in South Africa are adhering to and support the Urban Foundation's code of employment practice, were released yesterday by the Automobile Manufacturers' Employers' Organisation (Ameo).

The chairman of Ameo, Mr R J Ironside, said that the surveys "clearly confirm the industry's positive approach to the code of employment practice, and highlight progress as well as areas to which greater attention must be given by employers".

By comparison with 1978, the overall employment in 1979 showed an increase of 14,3 percent. As this percentage was less than the increase in motor vehicle sales, productivity in the industry had "clearly improved" over previous levels.

Of the substantial number of job opportunities opened since the previous survey, 91,7 percent were filled by Asian, black or coloured people.

The smaller increase in white employment reflected the demand for skilled and professional personnel, and pointed to the essentiality of training human resources to support industrial growth.

Although whites still comprised the core of the managerial and sales categories, Asian, black and coloured (ABC) employment increased by 120 percent.

In the office and clerical category, employment for all groups increased and the ABC group rose by 80 percent.

"An interesting development in the semi-skilled categories is reflected in the increase of 27 percent in white employment, most of which occurred in the Eastern Cape area. Overall white employment as a percentage of the total in this category, increased only slightly from 9,1 to 9,7 percent between surveys.

The best improvement took place in the supervisory and skilled categories where black educational levels improved by about three years and for coloured people by 1,5 years. The educational level of blacks in the office and clerical categories also increased substantially from 8,2 to 10,4 years. — Sapa

'Living Wage' Concept

[Article by Steven Friedman]

[Text] One of the most substantial wage increases in recent years--60% for some workers--is contained in an agreement signed this week between a multi-national company, Kellogg SA, and the Fosatu-affiliated Sweet, Food and Allied Workers Union.

The agreement appears to be the first outside the Eastern Cape to recognise union demands for a "living wage" rather than one based on various poverty datum line surveys.

Kellogg's managing director, Mr Murray Rogers, said yesterday the agreement partly met union requests that companies move away from the various "poverty datum lines" towards a "realistic living allowance".

The increase is also the result of one of the few wage agreements negotiated between companies and unregistered trade unions.

In a statement yesterday, the union hailed the agreement as an illustration of "the need for in-plant negotiations" between companies and unions on wage levels.

Many companies have refused to negotiate wages with unions, arguing that this should be done on an industry level only.

For several years, many companies have been relying on various poverty datum lines to set their minimum wages. These calculate the minimum a family needs to survive.

However, during the East Cape motor strikes, unions demanded that companies ditch this standard, arguing that it allowed workers "only to exist".

They demanded that employers switched to a "living wage" negotiated between unions and employers.

Kellogg appears to be the first company outside the Eastern Cape to accept this and to negotiate on this basis with a union.

Mr Rogers said wages were not yet up to the standard negotiated in the Eastern Cape. However, the new rates would be reviewed in the middle of next year in the light of increases in the cost of living.

In terms of the agreement, the company's "probationary wage" goes up to R46 a week and its factory operatives will earn a minimum of R50 a week.

This means that workers at the bottom of the scale will see their wages rise by 60% and proportional increases are contained for the other grades.

In its statement, the union says: "The achievement of such a substantial increase is evidence of the wisdom of in-plant negotiations between unions and the company and the union wishes to acknowledge Kellogg's acceptance of the need for in-plant negotiations.

It adds that "the new wage levels are a testimony to both parties' acceptance of a realistic negotiating framework".

Negotiations for an agreement are already under way and are expected to be concluded early next year.

Mr Rogers said yesterday the new levels would come into effect early next month.

Fosatu Criticism of Companies

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 4 Dec 80 p 9

[Article by Drew Forrest]

[Text] The influential Federation of South African Trade Unions (Fosatu) has launched another attack on companies which, it says, are willing to deal only with "toothless" trade unions.

In a statement released through Sapa, Fosatu refers to the recognition struggle of workers at the Colgate Palmolive plant in Boksburg and the extension of this struggle to another Colgate company plant, Aunt Carolina Rice in Maritzburg. The unions involved are the Chemical Workers Industrial Union and the Sweet, Food and Allied Workers Union.

Colgate had modified its stance after the visit of the Rev Sullivan earlier this year by agreeing to recognise the unions, the statement says. But the company was now engaged in "delaying and blocking tactics" by setting conditions to negotiation.

These were that the unions negotiated wages and working conditions at industrial council level only, and that union activity on the shop-floor should be restricted to the articulation of grievances.

"Workers interpret the setting of these conditions as yet another attempt to prevent the genuine and meaningful recognition of their unions, and feel that management is trying to replace their toothless liaison committees with toothless unions," the statement says.

As a multinational company, Colgate should be "taking the lead in promoting the development of sound industrial relations, and not attempting to create tame and ineffective unions," it adds.

In a further statement Fosatu strongly condemns the "persistent refusal" of Raleigh South Africa in Springs to speak to trade unions representing workers sacked after a dispute last week.

Management could not be reached for comment last night.

Fosatu Meeting With Minister

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 28 Nov 80 p 11

[Text] The country's biggest federation of black trade unions might pull out of the Government's new labour dispensation if many of the latest proposals for changes to the law are not dropped.

The Federation of South Africa Trade Unions (Fosatu) made this clear in a statement today following what it called a "very unsatisfactory meeting with the Minister of Manpower Utilisation, Mr Fanie Botha, yesterday.

The statement said Fosatu believed that the "positive steps proposed by the Government recently were "heavily outweighed by other proposed amendments which would lead to the credibility of the whole package collapsing.

The fact that the meeting with Mr Botha took place was probably a step in the right direction, said Fosatu. But if there were further meetings they should be much longer and involve all unregistered unions.

Fosatu unions have applied to register under the Government's new labour dispensation. But Fosatu warned today that it would not be prepared to participate if new, unacceptable proposals were implemented.

The proposals would have the effect of exerting greater potential control over the activities of emerging trade unions, the statement said.

Fosatu said the following proposals were unacceptable:

--Measures at "freeze out" unregistered unions, such as the prohibition on stop order facilities for them and no legal standing for their agreements with employers.

CURRENT ECONOMIC TRENDS REVIEWED

Capetown THE CAPE TIMES in English 3 Dec 80 p 12

[Article by Paul Dodd]

[Text] THE latest edition of Trends, the Bureau for Economic Research's statistical analysis of the economy edited by Willem Roets, provides an insight into what is happening beneath the broad surface of the boom.

Retailers in particular will find the BER analysis most useful as they cast their eye over stocks and ponder the outlook in 1981.

Trends says that the rate of growth in private consumption appears to be tending towards a levelling off and this is largely due to a decline in the rate of expansion of expenditure on non-durables.

The strongest growth is now being seen in semi-durables such as clothing, footwear, household textiles, recreational and entertainment goods. There is also a marginal acceleration in the growth of durable expenditures — furniture and household appliances and motor vehicles.

Black buying power

"These two main categories are now starting to reflect the incidental impact of Mitchell's Plain, Soweto, Atlantis on the more durable goods markets and also the structural changes that are in progress — the buying power of blacks as regards clothing now exceeding that of whites."

In regional activity Durban seems to be losing pace compared with the other four main metropolitan regions.

Economic levels in Johannesburg also seem to be falling gradually behind in growth compared with the national average.

The best improvement in regional activity is being shown by Port Elizabeth followed by Pretoria.

While Cape Town is keeping up with the national average the comparative backlog of the past has not yet been overhauled.

Cape Town now seems to be performing better in building plans approved, commercial vehicle sales and employment but not doing as well in building completions, retail sales, hotel revenue and summonses for debt.

Production levels

Examining production levels Trends says that in consumer goods manufacture food production is showing a disquietening trend to stagnate. Clothing production is slackening off at a record high level while liquor production in growth terms is definitely slowing down.

Mining production volumes, with the exception of ferrous metallic minerals, are all trending upwards.

In intermediate and production goods manufacture metal products are recording the best growth performance, textiles are faltering slightly while machinery production has shown no growth this year.

In capacity usage terms motor manufacture improved dramatically.

While all the consumer goods manufacturing sectors are reporting larger under utilization of (newly extended?) capacity, intermediate goods have been fairing consistently better since the beginning of 1979.

Building plans in current price terms seem to be losing momentum in growth while actual completions also seem to be easing fractionally lately. Price resistance and non-availability of labour are contributing towards these tendencies.

Wine and spirits

The production of beer is continuing to rise while both wine and spirits are stagnating. Trends in liquor consumption are gradually being influenced by changing social precepts associated with improving standards of living of the lower and middle-income groups. Trends says these change seem to favour beer in preference to both wine and spirits.

Spending growth by white consumers is being fuelled by acceptance of credit cards. Whether restrictions on consumer spending are needed at all it said a debatable issue and BER notes that retail volumes in the aggregate have lately been reflecting a slight marginal tendency towards decline in growth rate.

On inflation, Trends says the statistical view supports Andre Hamerama's opinion that a moderation in the inflation rate is a distinct likelihood.

Food

Food continues to feature

among the groups that are showing the largest rise and meat with a weight of 9.2 percent of total expenditure gaining by almost 25 percent in the year ended August.

The production price index (formerly wholesale index): The effect of the high cost of oil is continuing to be the greatest single cause of the unacceptably high rate of increase in production costs, even though a fractional decrease in the price of petrol is shown in the schedule.

The trade weighted exchange rate of the rand has show an almost phenomenal rise since the beginning of 1980 but Trends says that statistically the crude trade balance is now showing a net deficit. Exports have declined with imports rising rapidly.

Imports

An interesting sidelight is that in previous recovery phases of the economy imports have accelerated at an early stage. But the current rate of imports is related to capacity expansion.

The terms of trade, both excluding and including gold, are improving encouragingly while the trend in foreign reserves (gold content not revalued) confirm the hardening of the rand exchange rate.

The graphs dealing with public sector finance indicate a rapid decline in deposits and Trends says this gives rise to the question if public sector projects are at this particular stage of the business cycle not being initiated somewhat too precipitately on the strength of ample liquidity and the strong flow of State revenue.

Public sector

Earlier in its review the journal says that expansion in public sector investment is taking place at a time when the private sector is also obliged to expand capacity. As a result, a measure of direct competition for input factors is inevitable between the two sectors.

"The intensity of this competition, or the extent of shortages, vary according to the relative size of public sector demand in the different areas of the country.

"Due to the formidable size of several public sector investment projects in process in the Western Cape, the private sector is really hard put to find the needed inputs in the building industry in that region.

"Almost without exception these large public sector investment projects that are now being undertaken are all of strategic significance although one could have wished that they, or at least part of them, could have been deferred to a later stage in the present cyclical phase."

Interest rates

On interest rates Trends says the lethargic hardening of long-term rates is noteworthy. This trend has been developing since early 1979 leading short-term rates by about six months but up to now had been tending sideways rather than definitely upward.

The statistics indicate that black unemployment is declining. The acceleration in the tempo of decline in registered unemployment points to a faster rate of absorption of other than whites into gainful productive activities.

Trends suggests the improvement is due to:

- The non availability of formally skilled job-seekers for whom lower skilled employees are now being substituted successfully after on-the-job induction.
- The growing importance of other than whites as factors in the consumer markets which is leading to enhanced employment prospects in the services sectors for members of these groups.

The positive trend in net migration has probably helped to bring some relief in the shortage of skilled labour — the immigrants are mainly expatriates from the former Rhodesia, most of whom fall into the skilled labour category.

TRADE FIGURES SHOW CONTINUING FAVORABLE BALANCE

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 23 Dec 80 p 2

[Text] SOUTH Africa had a favourable trade balance of R5 336-million in the first 11 months of this year — an improvement of more than R1 000-million over the corresponding period last year, according to figures published in Pretoria yesterday by the Commissioner for Customs and excise.

Exports to the end of November were worth R18 417 million, while imports were valued at R13 081-million.

Exports to African countries climbed during the 11 months from R668,9-million last year to R1 072,5-million this year, with imports rising from R240,5-million to R264,4-million.

Europe remained at the top of South Africa's trade list with the Republic buying more than she sold in the 11 months this year (R5 231,8-million in imports and R4 799 million in exports).

In the case of America, imports of R2 048,3 million exceeded exports by R114,4 million, while imports from Oceania were R5,7 million higher than the export figure of R89 million.

South Africa's trade with Asia showed a favourable balance of R144,7 million with an 11-month export total of R1 860,6 million.

Other unclassified goods and balance of payments adjustments accounted for R8 729,9 million in exports and R3 786,3 million in imports in the 11 months this year. — Sapa.

JOINT ECONOMIC CONTROL OF EAST LONDON HARBOR UNDER STUDY

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 28 Nov 80 p 12

[Article by Drew Forrest]

[Text] Proposals to place East London Harbour under the joint economic control of South Africa, Ciskei and Transkei and to open the harbour hinterland to black businessmen are being "actively considered" by the Government.

The scheme--devised by local businessmen in response to the intractable problem of unemployment in the region--could not be launched until the homelands governments had given it their blessing, sources said today.

But the favourable response of the Van der Walt Commission indicated an impending shift in South African Government policy "with major implications" for the country as a whole, they said.

According to East London mayor Mr Donald Card, the scheme envisaged the creation of an "international zone" encompassing the city's harbour and its immediate hinterland.

The zone would fall under a controlling body comprising South African, Ciskeian and Transkeian representatives.

Harbour revenue would be shared between the territories, and entrepreneurs of all races would be free to set up shop in the area.

However, residential segregation would remain and the "nuts and bolts" of the scheme--including the integration of facilities--were still under consideration, Mr Card said.

Mr Card said the creation of an "international zone" in white East London might be the first step in a larger plan designed to meet the massive unemployment in the Ciskei, southern Transkei and Border areas.

Unemployment in this region has been conservatively estimated at 25 percent, and the problem has not responded to Government decentralisation policies.

With Government approval, "international" growth points would also be established at Dimbaza in Ciskei, Butterworth in Transkei and elsewhere in the region, he said.

Prerequisites for the success of the scheme were increased labour mobility throughout the region and generous State incentives to outside investors, Mr Card said.

FREE MARKET POLICY URGED AS BEST ECONOMIC STRATEGY

Johannesburg SUNDAY TIMES in English 14 Dec 80 pp 1, 3

[Article by Stephen Orpen]

[Text] "The Government does not rely on capitalism as the solution (to South Africa's political problems)."
— Headline to an article this week on Capitalism and South Africa's Political Problems, by Dr Hermann Giliomee, of the University of Stellenbosch.

"Free-market capitalist policies are the only way to a free and reasonably peaceful South Africa."
—Free market and monetarist prime-mover, American Professor Milton Friedman, during his visit to this country in the mid-Seventies.

THE time is past for yet another classroom ABC on the pros and cons of the free-market programme in this country.

Urgently needed instead are:

- A more rapid, muscular and scientific extension of the free-market approach. Enough of euphoric platform speeches and official slogans flavoured for the converted. A promising start has been achieved with implementation. But the country needs much bolder action in labour and business at all levels, especially in politically sensitive areas.

Certainly it is disconcerting for business and Government to find that, with each advance they make, the answer may be still more uncompromising demands from the "radical" leaders of the disadvantaged.

But that is all the more reason to press ahead quickly and firmly. As the hole in the dam is enlarged, ever more water must be expected to gush out in the form of rising black expectations, running ahead of what can be achieved overnight. But the faster the flood, the faster the water will be ultimately exhausted.

With a few holes already open in the wall, attempts by misguided economic and political ideologists to try to prevent an increase in the black demands from escaping are likely to lead only to a complete and catastrophic collapse in due course of the entire wall.

That is in the nature of growing majority pressures in changing socio-economic and political power structures, as it is in dam walls under increasing pressure.

It was in the Ministry of Finance that the country's Great New Economic Initiative, hinged on the free-market fulcrum, was first launched and from which the gospel was widely preached. Yet in terms of foreign exchange control, the value of the rand and the relationship between the commercial and financial rands, even in its own house the M of F is still far from having carried its vision to a natural conclusion.

- Under an increasingly strident free-market banner, monetary and fiscal policy priorities have moved with the business cycle from "strength-through-restraint" to "strength-and-growth-with-discipline" through "growth-to-create-jobs; even-at-the-cost-of-more-inflation" to "brake-the-growth-in-the-money-supply-to-fight-inflation".

Meanwhile, the idea that we now have a free-market economy has spread. The Government is continuing to feed the concept with shrewd if not dramatic gestures.

In fact, however, the prime imperatives of Big Business, of white expectations about rising living standards for themselves (see "Sharks" story on this page) and white politics are all continuing to prevent substantive progress away from what remains essentially a highly uneven brand of capitalism.

It is time to review the priorities.

- Inflation must be countered — and the free-market programme boosted — by allowing the most courageous imports policy for many years. Yet more imports must be allowed to flood in to provide the means for more production — and thus more jobs.

They must also be encouraged to help provide the competition necessary to deny SA Big Business the freedom to keep raising its prices much faster than its costs.

When boom times come, domestic business gets greedy — especially in relatively small economies like ours.

Thus, more than ever, Joel Stern's claim that "the real enemy of the free market is Big Business and Academia" rings true. Big Business resorts to every trick in the book, and uses its mass, to keep out or swallow competition and set its own prices. Academics talk as they and the majority of citizens perceive themselves as losing ground in the race for riches.

- Pretoria must redress the balance between national profligacy, especially in the public sector, and national minimism. Owen Horwood did wonders in restoring discipline after the irresponsible Diederichs casino economy which so upset the balance of payments (BoP).

He also displayed admirable prudence in controlling the locomotive that led us into the current boom.

But he must now think about disbursing.

With at least R6 000-million (by his own admission) garnered in foreign loan repayments, gold and foreign reserves, liquidity siphoned out of circulation and sterilised in State coffers (instead of cascaded down to "citizen level"), he must expect the majority of South Africans to feel somehow cheated.

Simple black men are easily persuaded that "the white man's boom" is further proof that capitalism and the free market are white defences, if not weapons. Even generous increases in their wages cannot compensate for the still-bewildering legal and bureaucratic apparatus that they may feel separates them from the mainsprings of wealth and power.

Perhaps the Minister should now embrace the unthinkable and even allow a carefully monitored but ongoing BoP deficit again — to pay for greatly enhanced black advancement, and for the imports needed to loosen up the increasing concentration of domestic business power in too few (white) hands.

No doubt Mr Horwood will argue that this is too risky — with an economic slowdown now accepted by some of Pretoria's planners (although not in official rhetoric) sooner rather than later.

Yet the very slowdown envisaged need not come if only the free-market programme is allowed to run its full course.

But as long as it is painstakingly contained within "acceptable" political walls, it could spell as much harm as no free market at all — in terms of long-range national stability.

Gillomee is quite right if he maintains that politically constrained capitalism is not the solution.

As Simon Jenkins warned in The Economist this year: "The dangers of only partially incorporating the blacks will be a rising level of internal violence.

"It will necessitate increased mobilisation of whites, higher spending on defence and ever greater political repression. And this, in turn, will jeopardise the basis on which the (economic integration of urban blacks) strategy is built.

"The greatest danger is that this will turn South Africa into the sort of dictatorship all too popular in modern Africa: in which no human freedoms are respected and in which the colour of the rulers no longer matters to the ruled. . . ."

As Gilliomee points out: "South Africa can avoid the lurking danger of such a dictatorship. But it will need great political courage from Government and business — both looking beyond their respective short-term interests."

Time alone will tell whether Pretoria and business — which are increasingly working in cahoots — have the courage, political wherewithal and finesse to get their fingers out and let the free market do much more to meet the political and economic challenges for them.

SMALL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION INAUGURATED

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 28 Nov 80 p 30

[Article by Pieter de Vos]

[Text] The Small Business Development Corporation, formally launched in Johannesburg yesterday, marks an historic breakthrough for the private sector in southern Africa.

Under the leadership of private enterprise, development of small businesses will be jointly shouldered with the State in an organisation which Dr Anton Rupert, leader of the project, termed "an investment to give stability to southern Africa."

Two existing State corporations and some of the activities of others will be absorbed by the new corporation, the SBDC.

CATEGORIES

It will be established as an ordinary public company with the share capital divided into two categories. "A" shares will be issued to private investors and will provide for at least R50m of the authorised capital. "B" shares will be taken up by the Industrial Development Corporation on behalf of the Government and provide another R50m.

Though private enterprise has until the end of December to take up shares in the company, more than R30m was pledged by various groups within the first minutes of a meeting held behind closed doors yesterday.

The proposals for the new development corporation were strongly welcomed by business leaders.

Dr Wim de Villiers, executive chairman of Gencor, described it as a "great day for private enterprise."

Mr Clive Menell of Anglovaal said "the day went very well."

However, the restrictions on black businessmen would now only cause more frustrations, Mr Sam Motsuenyane, chairman of African Bank, pointed out.

Mr Johann Rupert of Rand Merchant Bank, said though the corporation would open financial resources to black businessmen, they were still prevented from joining the free enterprise system by legislation such as the Group Areas Act.

AIMS

The Development and Finance Corporation (formerly the coloured Development Corporation), the Indian Industrial Development Corporation and certain small business activities of the Industrial Development Corporation and the Economic Development Corporation, will be absorbed by the SBDC.

Its aims will be mainly to provide a back-up service when would-be entrepreneurs negotiate for bank loans and provide after-care service.

Each company which takes up shares of Rim or more may appoint one director and the Government will also appoint a limited number of directors. From this large board a much smaller executive board will be nominated with a chairman and general manager. Shares may be taken up over a period of five years.

Early next year, when legislation has been passed that the activities of some of the State corporations can be absorbed by the SBDC, the assets and personnel will be taken over.

AIRLINES STILL OPERATING IN RED, BUT EARNINGS IMPROVE

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 1 Dec 80 p 2

[Text] Although South African Airways is operating at a loss "it is doing better than last year, while other airlines are increasing their losses," said the airline's chief executive, Mr Eddie Smuts.

Speaking at a gala Press luncheon aboard one of two new R31-million Boeing 747 "Combis" (mixed passenger and cargo aircraft) delivered from America last month, Mr Smuts pointed out that fuel prices remained of paramount importance.

"Our fuel bill has escalated from a mere 10th of our total operating costs before the fuel crisis of a few years ago, to more than one third today.

"This is a world wide phenomenon, but we tend to think of this as a challenge rather than an obstacle," he said.

In a tribute to his staff of 11 500 around the world, Mr Smuts acknowledged the general shortage of suitable staff, the added demands of increased traffic, the large number of male employees undergoing military training, and the normally high turnover of female staff either "resigning to get married or to raise a family."

Reviewing the year's events, he said in spite of the hailstorm at the beginning of the year which temporarily crippled a third of SAA's fleet and other setbacks, the airline had made progress in many areas.

Among them were the introduction of weekly flights to Taiwan, a direct air service between Cape Town and Frankfurt, five flights a week to New York, two new Boeing 747 Combis with a growing passenger and cargo business on European and American routes, 12 advanced Boeing 737 twin jets, and two additional wide-body airbuses, all for delivery within the next 18 months.

AIR-SEA SEARCH-AND-RESCUE PROCEDURES DESCRIBED

Capetown THE CAPE TIMES in English 8 Dec 80 p 5

[Excerpts] WHAT happens when an aircraft or ship sets off on a journey — and then vanishes without trace, as happened with the ill-fated Aero Commander ZS-CBC which crashed in the Robinson Pass at the weekend?

News that an aircraft or ship is missing activates a search-and-rescue machine run by the South African Navy and South African Air Force that can call on a vast variety of experts in many private and official walks of life to help those in peril on the sea — and in the air.

Without co-ordination, any big air or sea search would degenerate into confusion, particularly when the area to be covered is large and contains difficult terrain — as in the ZS-CBC tragedy.

The Defence Force maintains two rescue co-ordination centres — at Maritime Headquarters at Silvermine and at SAAF Headquarters in Pretoria, which are on stand-by 24 hours a day.

The Pretoria RCC falls directly under the Chief of the SAAF and covers territory which includes the Transvaal, Botswana, Swaziland, Bophuthatswana, the Free State, Natal, Lesotho and the Northern Cape.

The Silvermine RCC concentrates on the rest of the Cape and South West Africa/Namibia. It is the joint responsibility of the OC Southern Air Command, Brigadier John Nortje, and the Flag Officer Commanding Naval Operations Command, Rear-Admiral Peter Tomlinson.

The RCC can call on experts and equipment from all SADF land, sea and air units, the Department of Transport, the Department of Posts and Telecommunications, the South African Police, Safmarine, the National Sea Rescue Institute, Safair, private helicopter companies and many other official and non-official sources.

An RCC's tentacles can transcend national boundaries. Political hostility and ideological clashes fade away in the face of a genuine emergency, and rescue co-ordination centres all over the world have standardised organisations, operating procedures and radio frequencies so that there is no waste of time.

An example of how RCCs many thousands of kilometres apart can join hands was the recent Berge Vanga disaster, when a huge Norwegian bulk carrier sank off the Cape coast.

Each RCC has a searchmaster — usually a head of command, although he can delegate one of his senior officers to take over.

The searchmaster is linked with a nominated on-scene commander, who controls the search on the spot, usually from an aircraft or ship.

The on-scene commander is the searchmaster's eyes and ears. He must weigh up physical factors, such as currents (in the case of a maritime emergency), which can cause a search-area to change constantly.

BRIEFS

BUTI RESIGNATION FROM SACC--Dominee Sam Buti, black community and religious leader, has resigned as head of South Africa's largest multiracial organisation--the South African Council of Churches (SACC). SACC sources yesterday confirmed the resignation, saying Ds Buti quit as president of the church body, a position he has held since 1977, because of "other commitments". It was pointed out that Ds Buti was heavily engaged as chairman of the Alexandra Liaison Committee, scribe of the black Dutch Reformed Church in Africa, and executive member of the Broederkring, a progressive minister's fraternity of the three black Dutch Reformed Churches. But it is believed in black Dutch Reformed circles that the resignation was also prompted by Ds Buti's "disillusionment" with the SACC and, particularly, its handling of the talks between the Prime Minister, Mr P W Botha, and church leaders. Ds Buti earlier warned of grave differences of opinion within the churches on whether the proposed second round of talks with Government representatives should take place. And after the first church-State meeting in August, he recommended the SACC should not accept Mr Botha's invitation to church leaders to visit the Operational Area. This invitation has been interpreted as a precondition for the second round of talks scheduled for the end of the year or early next year. Ds Buti was not available for comment yesterday. The new president will be elected at the SACC's conference next year. The Rev Peter Storey, senior vice-president, is tipped as Ds Buti's likely successor. MULTIRACIAL TRADE UNION FEDERATION--Three trade unions for electrical workers formed a multi-racial federation this week. The federation, consisting of a White, African and "Coloured", have decided to remain separate, but to cooperate through the federation. Its constitution stipulates that no decision may be taken unless a majority of all three union representatives on its national council agree. The three unions are: South African Electrical Workers Association (White). Electrical and Allied Workers Union (Black) and Allied Trades Union. All three are registered. BLOEMFONTEIN AREA DEVELOPMENT--Pretoria--Plans for the development of the Bloemfontein, Onverwacht, Vaalkraal area of the Free State were outlined in a statement yesterday by the Minister of Internal Affairs, Mr Chris Heunis, issued by the Office of the Prime Minister. The statement said that in order to promote development in the area further residential development for blacks at Bloemfontein would have to be restricted as far as possible. However, the permanent residential rights of blacks qualifying under certain sections of the Black (Urban Areas) Consolidation Act would be respected. The government was determined to alleviate unemployment in the sub-region and acknowledged the role that Bloemfontein had to play. The principle of clustered economic development was accepted as being the best possible solution to create meaningful employment opportunities in the area. "The promotion of small businesses and industrial concerns in the private sector will, in accordance with government policy, have to be encouraged in the black areas of the towns concerned." AZAPO DETAINEES--Seven more members of the Azanian People's Organisation (AZAPO), in the Northern Transvaal, a month ago, under Section Six of the Terrorism Act, have been transfered to Section 10 of the Internal Security Act, according to their families. They are: The Seshego branch chairman Mr Mamabolo Raphesu; and his deputy Mr Moses Moalosi and former Mahwelereng chairman, Mr Meadow Molala. Also transfered is the chairman of Seshego Village Committee, Rev M P Malatji. All are being held at Modder Bee Prison. The other four being at Victor Verster Prison in Paarl are: Mutle Pasha; David Mohwibidu; Joseph Ragophala and Rev Mamabolo. They joined six other Azapo officials who were taken two weeks ago to the same place. They are: Mr Harry Madikoto and Sello Rasethaba (Seshego branch), Perry Kekana, Holly Kekana, Jan Thobejane and Mapula Mogodi, of Mahwelereng, Potgietersrus. All their detention warrants expire on April 30 next year. Their detentions follow the boycott of buses owned by Lebowa Transport in Seshego, Mahwelereng and Lelenye near Tzaneen. In both Seshego and Lelenye the boycott is in its 14th and nineth week respectively. [Text] [Johannesburg THE VOICE in English 26 Nov-2 Dec 80 p 4]

BANNED SOWETO LEADERS--Banned community leaders, Mr Aubrey Mokoena and Mr Hlaku Rachidi, both of Soweto, had charges of breaking the banning orders dropped against them in the Johannesburg Magistrate's Court this week. The charges related to an allegation that they had communicated with each other. No evidence was led before the two men were told that the charges against them had been withdrawn by the State. They are each serving a five-year banning order, which among others, prohibits them from communicating with each other, or, with any other banned person. Mr Rachidi is former president of the now outlawed Black People's Convention, while Mr Mokoena was in the executive of the Black Community Programmes, it was banned on October 19, 1977. Both were close associates of the late Steve Biko, and were also co-founding members of the banned South African Students' Organisation (Saso) and also BCP. MUGABE ON DEMOCRACY, HOPES FOR FUTURE

[Text]

Edited text of an interview with the Prime Minister of Zimbabwe, Mr Robert Mugabe, done for the Cape Times in Salisbury on November 28, by Rex Gibson, Editor of the Sunday Express.

Question: South Africa's Prime Minister said again this week he was ready to discuss a non-aggression pact with any neighbouring state. How do you respond?

Answer: On the principle of maintaining peaceful borders there is nobody who would say the South African Premier is wrong. But where people might perhaps feel a little sensitive is when he would want to use it as a political instrument.

No deals have been signed with South Africa in the past. The countries of this region by and large — much as they accept the historical phenomenon of economic relations — look askance at any possibility of political relations with South Africa. We have expressed ourselves in very clear terms as a country committed to the maintenace of peace in our region and as a country upholding the principle of peaceful co-existence.

Disenchantment has of course been occasioned by the fact that South Africa itself has been carrying out a campaign of destabilising our region. She has recruited large groups of elements from Zimbabwe whom she has trained and who pose a real threat to us.

Question: Are you saying they are going to cross the border and launch an attack?

Answer: Well, what is South Africa doing with them? In the Transvaal, they have been there for a long time and they number in the region of five thousand. Some of them have been drifting back, trying to enter the country surreptiously and we have arrested a few of them, but the rest of them still remain on her soil.

Before South Africa can really demand that there should be a non-aggression deal she should be seen to be moving in the direction of the objectives of that possible treaty.

Why shouldn't she hand over these forces — hand over the forces on her territory which belong to Mozambique and those who belong to Zambia back to Zambia. Do that.

Question: Would that be the major stumbling block?

Answer: We would want to see honesty as the motivating factor here. I'm not saying that it is impossible for us to reach some definite agreement, but I'm saying South Africa must be seen to be behaving honestly before she can expect other nations to go into the type of agreement she would want.

I think that would, in my opinion, be a real stumbling block because you cannot sign a treaty with South Africa when South Africa has got forces on its side which are not her nationals but your own (Zimbabwe) nationals.

And what she will be saying is unless we sign a treaty we can't return these people and therefore they will continue to be forces marshalled against you. You see, that is not fair.

Question: Do these people want to return?

Answer: Yes, they want to come back. I think they do. They were recruited here. They were attracted. They are mercenaries who have gone to fight for money apparently. Some of them, I take it, have been politically motivated into becoming a counter-revolutionary group.

Look at what is happening. South Africa reinforcing and actually deploying the Mozambiquan rebels, the dissident groups. They fly supplies to them. We have evidence of that.

Question: That is a matter of fact, is it?

Answer: It is a matter of fact, yes. It is a matter of fact. It is proven. Our own commanders have accepted that this is what is happening. The Mozambiquans themselves have evidence of that and it is a very serious state of affairs.

Question: Do you regard that as an infringement of your territorial rights?

Answer: Yes, it is a serious infringement of our territorial integrity. We are becoming more and more disenchanted at the fact that our posture of maintaining peaceful co-existence is being taken advantage of.

We shall not allow any anti-South African forces, military armed forces to operate from our territory. We have said that openly, but South Africa hasn't said that. And in practice, South Africa is going against that very principle.

Question: Do you have any intention of trying to stop these flights that you say take place over your territory?

Answer: Yes, we are determined now that we take the necessary steps to prevent them. If we poise ourselves in a position where we have now to take action it means that we will be attacking them.

Question: And is that what you are contemplating, I don't want to misunderstand?

Answer: Any planes that overfly our territory, if they are enemy planes, of course, we have a duty to prevent them overflying. In fact shoot them down if we can.

Question: How often do these overflights take place?

Answer: Quite often, in the eastern region. Quite often, to bring supplies to the guerillas, the counter-revolutionary forces.

Question: What, in your view, is the bottom line of change that would need to take place for you to reopen a dialogue with South Africa?

Answer: I think there are two main issues. There is the Namibian issue. South Africa has been standing in the way of negotiations on Namibia, which means actually standing in the way of independence. We would want to see a positive posture by South Africa. In other words, do everything in their power to facilitate a democratic process taking effect along the lines of (UN) Security Council resolution 435.

We are happy that some indications now exist that a meeting between South Africa and Swapo might take place, including other groups in Namibia, to work out the necessary modalities.

The second burden South Africa has to discharge is to convince the international community — convince us too because we are part of the international community — that in effect apartheid is anathema to humanity, that she is now determined to reverse the process of apartheid and establish a democratic state.

Democracy is therefore the key word. What that means really to us must be a process which accepts majority rule. A process which accepts one-man-one-vote.

How this will spell out in terms of the actual constitution and the modalities for its implementation . . . That's a matter for the South Africans.

Question: You wouldn't regard it as an overwhelming stumbling block if it was a slow, measured progression?

Answer: Why should it be slow? South Africa has had, so everybody says in South Africa, the advantage of a civilizing influence much earlier than ourselves and here we are already with independence and a democratic state which accepts the salient principles of democracy, the civil liberties that safeguard the individual. We have them all here.

South Africa should in fact have had them earlier than ourselves. Afrikaners taught us all that the year 1652 was a very crucial one because Van Riebeck landed in South Africa and that was the date when you had white influence.

But the trend has been to polarization of races and strict racial separation. We believe that South Africa has a lot to do to supply the necessary remedies but one does not want to lose hope.

The people of South Africa themselves are determined that change must take place and one would want also to welcome what one discerns as change taking place in the white community.

Question: Have you seen a change of that kind?

Answer: Yes there is certainly something. Look at the Afrikaners of the Dutch Reformed Church. I think it is that church, or portions of that church, which announced that apartheid is incompatible with Christianity.

Before this, in the 1950s, at the height of apartheid, you could never have got any of the Dutch Reformed churches to pronounce that apartheid was not sacred. They tried to project it as a sacred doctrine, the work of God — a divine philosophy.

Question: If you saw a genuine beginning to dismantling apartheid, would you be inclined to look favourably on the idea of renewing dialogue?

Answer: Well, the question of dialogue is not really the fundamental issue. Dialogue between who? Between us and South Africa? What will that bring about? The issue is whether the South Africans themselves can hold their own dialogue and bring about the necessary change — agree on change, agree on the process, agree on the objectives.

Question: A national convention representing most people, would that go some way towards . . . ?

Answer: If it is democratically constituted, representative of all sections of the community, I have no objection to it. But it must also set out in a meaningful way to produce a definite programme towards democratization of society in South Africa. I think those are the two elements I would want to see.

Question: Somebody said at Maputo the other day the objective was for your country and Mozambique to be independent of South African ports within 10 years. Is that a realistic objective?

Answer: As to the actual time frame I suppose people can try to work towards definite targets. I think that is the purpose which a time frame serves. Otherwise the principle remains that we must lessen our dependence on South Africa, as indeed we must lessen our dependence on other countries in the world.

We are over-dependent on South Africa and it is not good for a country to be that over-dependent.

I don't see economic relations ceasing to exist. It is the phenomenom of being over-dependent that is disgusting because South Africa then can hold you to ransom.

We are hoping also that as we are working to lessen our independence, South Africa itself will be undergoing a transformation for the better and that there won't be any need to sever economic relations.

Question: I read somewhere that there is a huge loan, something like $300 million which South Africa lent your predecessors in office and which you have to repay . . . ?

Answer: I'm not aware of that at all. I am aware that there is some debt but not of that magnitude. We would be really a mortgaged territory if we had that magnitude of indebtedness.

I don't think it is very big. I don't remember the actual figure, but it had to do with the correction of the budget deficit to enable the Minister of Finance here to make ends meet. That was all and so it couldn't have been . . .

Question: And so there were no strings attached to the loan?

Answer: Well, when it was incurred I suppose it was understood as assistance or aid to the regime here which was fighting a war and that the regime would in due course repay it. We have accepted the position and we feel indebted to South Africa because it is a debt that was incurred properly for expenditure — revenue and expenditure, and not for war purposes as such. In good faith we have accepted it.

Question: You said the other day that Zimbabwe couldn't impose sanctions on South Africa. But could you tell me whether in fact sanctions work? Did they work in Zimbabwe?

Answer: Sanctions alone? . . . Yes, I think they worked. It was necessary that the armed struggle was supported by economic sanctions and it was this complementary character that we welcomed.

Sanctions alone wouldn't have succeeded. You need much more than sanctions. You see the problem is people tend to look at self-interest.

In our own case even the big countries, the big bosses in the international community — the United States, France, West Germany — all violated sanctions. It was disgraceful, they violated them quite openly.

The United States, during the Nixon administration, decided to open trade with the regime here and they started importing our chrome. West Germany and France were all selling their wares to Zimbabwe. The Peugeot became the most popular car in the streets here.

The Japanese, who have no morals when it comes to trade, of course wouldn't heed the sanction call and this is what tends to make sanctions fail.

Question: On the question of law and order, General Walls said a few months ago that "the country was about to go through the rapids". Since then we have had the Tekere case, the arrest of the Nkomo lieutenants, "wanton political murders", to use your words . . .

Answer: The issue is really one we have inherited. We had a war situation here and our two forces never got united during the war, and the interim period didn't provide the necessary machinery for integrating the forces.

The British always regarded it as a matter for the government that was going to be elected after elections. And so there is that disability we have inherited.

To talk of a civil war is, I think, to exaggerate matters. For there to be a civil war the party leaderships must actually be seen to be following a collision course — which is not the case. Nkomo is against any civil war happening.

Question: You described him as your enemy the other day?

Answer: As my enemy, where? I've nevers said that — never, never, never. If I have made any criticism it is directed against elements in his party who have talked of liberated zones in Matabeleland and have talked of the need to achieve independence when independence has already been achieved, and those are of course the disruptive elements in a political party.

But by and large we accept the Zapu posture and Zapu policy and currently the commanders are working harmoniously to try and improve the situation so it doesn't deteriorate and indeed we have arrested the events, the incidents that occurred in Bulawayo.

We are proceeding to integrate the forces quickly. For your information, the forces that were integrated, Zanla and Zipra are working alongside the former Rhodesian forces used to effect control of the situation which was caused by a conflict between the unintegrated forces of Zanla and Zipra.

So you have that happy situation that the more the forces work together as an integrated entity the greater the harmony, whereas where the forces are still apart you still have suspicion, you still have that hostility.

Happily, the area where integration has taken place and is currently taking place is greater than in the unintegrated forces.

Question: The exodus of whites — you said once that if it continued you would become alarmed about it. The prediction being made is that you may be down to fewer than 100 000 whites within the next. . . ?

Answer: 100 000? 100 000 would obviously amount to nearly half and that would be exceedingly alarming. I don't think that prediction is correct.

It a pity that the whites are leaving. One can't blame them too much because they are motivated by, I think, two factors — the shock they went through when the elections went against their expectations, and some never really recovered from that shock, and they have remained suspicious, which is the second factor. Some wouldn't believe us.

They don't believe when we talk of the need to establish a non-racial society, the need to forget the past and look ahead and work together for national unity. They suspect that we are reserving some measures against them in the future.

Then, of course, added to that you have incidents of insecurity in a few places. But I would like to believe that even our farming community — which is more exposed to incidents — and have had to contend with the fact of a drought over the last two years and the loss of their cattle in the war and so on and so forth, they are determined by and large to stick it out.

I'm glad they are determined to be part of our community. I'm sorry that those who are leaving are leaving and I would want to believe that when the fear they have is proved mistaken that some of them might still come back.

Question: The Tekere case has been seen as a kind of litmus test for this. You said that the law must take its course, then you raised the possibility of a pardon after the law having taken its course . . ?

Answer: No I didn't. I never talked of any pardon of any kind. Some of the ministers are alleged to have said that in London, but I have never said that.

Question: But you were quoted in a South African newspaper after an interview you gave last week?

Answer: No. The reporter must have put what was alleged to have been said by Shamuyirara. The interview I gave here was to the effect that we would allow the law to take its full course and we had proved those who suspected we might stand in the way of a trial taking place wrong.

The question of a pardon hasn't arisen — we haven't thought about it in the central committee of the party or in the Cabinet. It is possible some minister might raise it. We will debate it if and when it is raised.

For now, certainly, nobody is thinking along those lines. The law must be allowed to take its course. If any minister does the same he also will be tried.

ROBERT MUGABE'S NEW YEAR'S MESSAGE TO NATION

LD021310 Salisbury Domestic Service in English 1800 GMT 31 Dec 80 CA

[New Year's message to the nation by Prime Minister Robert Mugabe on 31 December 1980—recorded]

[Text] Comrades in the national struggle, ladies and gentlemen, happy new year. As the year 1980 draws to a close I thought we should together scan the period of 258 days we have just covered as a sovereign and independent people so we can assess what our independence has been worth and how it has enabled us to evolve as a nation. At the same time I would also want us to focus on our perspectives as a nation for 1981.

We began 1980, as you will remember, as disparate and antagonistic political and military forces with torn allegiances. For years we had differed bitterly on the national question of political freedom, political power and national independence. For years, therefore, we had as allied forces on one side and axis forces on the other fought a bitter armed struggle to resolve this fundamental question. Finally, we all agreed in September last year to attend the Lancaster House conference, which became both a peace and constitutional conference for us. The ensuing agreement was as much a treaty of peace ending hostilities as it was a constitutional instrument for ushering our long awaited national independence in the context of a new political order. It was a triumph for all those revolutionary forces which had fought and died for a new political, legal and socio-economic order. The new peace and the grant of independence became twin companions in a constitutional deal which established that new order and in that twin relationship freedom and political independence became the quid pro quo for the peace which the revolutionary forces were now prepared to give to the nation as they offered to lay down their arms.

The popular cause had undoubtedly now won the day. The people had triumphed, and so 1980 became known to us as the year of the people's power. And truly the people in February soon exercised for the first time in our political history their democratic and constitutional right to vote for a government of their own choice. The result of that election was the happy verdict of victory awarded to my party, ZANU Patriotic Front, and the subsequent establishment by that party of a government of democratic forces committed, firstly, to the sustenance and defense of our newly won independence and, secondly, to the creation of the new nation on the principle of our single Zimbabwean nationality and a new allegiance transcending the existing racial, regional, ethnic and religious affinities. Our independence had bestowed on all of us the homogeneity of a nation, a single nationality that claimed precedence over the heterogeneity of our racial, regional, tribal and religious groups. As Zimbabweans our new nation now demanded of us either as individuals or as groups or communities a single loyalty that is a proper and logical manifestation of our national unity and spirit of reconciliation.

As a nation now jealously guarding its hard won independence the reality of peace as the rockbed on which that independence stood to be embellished would henceforth remain the reality of a historical and dialectical process, of a bitter struggle between the settler colonizers and the colonized sons of the soil, a struggle between the landed gentry and the landless peasantry, between the capitalist exploiters and the exploited working class, a struggle between the minority and the majority, between oligarchy and democracy and between racialism and non-racialism--it can all be summed up as a fight for justice against injustice. Our present peace is accordingly the final stage of the national struggle for freedom and independence in that it marks the culmination of a protracted bitter struggle between vying forces, a struggle in which the popular democratic forces which stood for political progress and social justice were pitted against the unpopular and undemocratic forces standing for political conservatism and social unequity. But since our peace is not a static but an ever evolving and ever unfolding reality, it also marks a new stage in the new struggle for the consolidation and furtherance of our national independence through the attainment of economic independence. Thus our political independence, itself a former objective of our revolutionary armed struggle, now transforms itself upon attainment into a political instrument as it becomes the new political means of achieving our ultimate socioeconomic goals. We employed armed struggle to achieve our political independence. Now we must employ that political independence to achieve our economic freedom.

I would summarize the phases in the span of our immediate national struggle as follows: One, national armed struggle, two, national independence, three, national economic independence, four, national socialism. Once the people had elected my government into power that government set about to define its priorities in respect of the political, military and economic objectives of our state activity. In the political sphere our revolutionary commitment to and quest for the unity of all democratic forces in the country impelled us to adopt a more comprehensive and a more generous view of government embracing all those forces. This is the government I have had the pleasure of leading and working with over the last 8 and a half months. The priorities of that government in turn became the basis of our socioeconomic program for the first year of our independence. Although this first year ends in April next year it is nevertheless important that I recount for you, as our chronological year ends, some of the several successes we have scored, not hiding from you, of course, those few failures that have tended to mar our endeavours.

In the military sector the progress from a vicious war through the process of ceasefire to peace has indeed been remarkable. There is now total peace reigning over our country where only 13 months ago war was raging with increasing fury. Christmas this year has been far more peaceful and enjoyable than Christmas in 1979. Our forces ZANLA [Zimbabwe African National Liberation Army], ZIPRA [Zimbabwe People's Liberation Army] and the former Rhodesian forces must be complimented for the high sense of discipline which they have displayed, especially when it is realized that many ZANLA and ZIPRA comrades have continued to live under extremely trying and frustrating conditions in assembly points or operation (?seed) camps. It was regrettable that the inadequacy of our military infrastructure and training personnel caused a slower integration rate than that originally envisaged. It is against the background of this inadequacy that I wish to express my government's gratitude to the British Government for generously coming to our aid with a team of most able instructors and to the British instructors themselves I wish to say thank you for the role you have magnificently played in helping us to form a single army. We are now, despite persistent problems, poised for an accelerated integration program intended to absorb the rest of our cadres still in assembly points or in urban cantonments and operation (?seed) places.

It must, however, be admitted with deep sorrow and regret that some lawless and undisciplined elements amongst the cadres have completely abused their membership of the armed forces and committed senseless acts of murder, robbery, kidnapping, rape, assault and public harassment, the saddest and most criminal of them all was the unpardonable bloody conflict at Entumbane in which 60 innocent people were callously murdered and 500 injured. This was an abhorrence Zimbabwe cannot afford to repeat for it was a total negation of our hard won peace. Unity in the military as well as in the political sphere of our relations must foreven remain our watchword. Personal and group antagonisms must yield to the demands of peace, national unity and understanding. The trend of lawlessness which manifested itself before and after independence has, I am happy to say, been greatly arrested. The police force should be complimented for their success in maintaining law and order under most difficult circumstances. What has always given rise to concern is the relationship between the police and the public. I am glad that this relationship continues to improve. If we are to rid ourselves of cutthroats and other murderers, kidnappers, rapists, robbers, thieves and other criminals, all of whom are the scourge of our society, then it is vital that the police are fully supported by us while they in turn seek maximum cooperation from the public.

In the socioeconomic sphere it became my government's policy to lay emphasis on the rehabilitation and resettlement of the people who had suffered displacement during the war. Our refugees from Mozambique, Zambia and Botswana returned home and many of them were resettled and rehabilitated through the agency of the UNHCR, to which organization my government feels greatly indebted. The task of allocating land to land-hungry peasants has only been partially fulfilled. Whilst land is abundantly available no funds are readily available for purchasing it. We have brought this predicament to the notice of Britain as a warning that we cannot as a people's sovereign government accept our lack of funds as a permanent impediment to our right to acquire land for the masses of our people who desperately need it for their settlement and livelihood. It is gratifying that those of our people who did not receive land this year have shown great understanding of the government's position and have agreed to wait their turn for consideration next year.

In respect of commercial agriculture, mining, commerce and industry government has given every possible incentive and encouragement. Every one of us must feel jubilant that the economy is showing an upward growth rate.

In the sector of social services government has proceeded with revolutionary vigor to make primary education and health care for the lower income groups free. The main objective is to make these services cater for as many people as possible. Government has been working energetically to develop the water resources of the country so water can become more readily available for use in rural homes. Intensive work is envisaged for 1981 which will encompass irrigation projects as well. The envisaged educational program is designed to absorb every child completing his primary education this year into secondary school next year. Because of the shortage of secondary school teachers a recruitment drive for this category of teacher is being carried out by the Ministry of Education overseas and elsewhere in Africa. The Ministry of Local Government and Housing has been implementing our policy of giving power at the local level to the people for the first time in our history. We now have African mayors in our cities and towns.

In the public service generally government has been engaged in an exercise of restructuring the various ministries with a view to bringing about the advancement of Africans as required by the presidential directive made under Section 75 subsection two of the constitution. Although the policy of African advancement has caused some concern to white civil servants I am glad that it has generally been accepted by them. I wish to assure all those who are apprehensive about it that the policy will continue to be applied with maximum fairness. To date about eight Africans have either been appointed or approved for appointment to the post of permanent secretary, while others now occupy various other top-level positions in the ministries as deputy secretaries, under secretaries, assistant secretaries, directors, executive officers and so forth. More will certainly be appointed in the coming year.

The conditions of service in both the private and public sectors show a most unsatisfactory wage gap between the lower and higher income groups. Although government has adopted a temporary measure in fixing a minimum wage scale for each sub-sector of the private sector, government entertains the belief that a minimum wage scale must be above the poverty datum line. Accordingly, government has appointed a commission on wages and incomes and charged it with the task of carrying out a thorough investigation into the wage problem and submitting recommendations. The commission is expected to report to government within the next 3 or 4 months. Government hopes thereafter to work our realistic wage scales for both the private and public sectors.

Overall, government has been working on its economic policy for quite some time now and an official statement will be published this coming January which will encompass government's views on foreign investment and the role of private enterprise. The path of our socioeconomic policy is decidedly socialist. What remains to be worked out is the mode of application of socialism and not its reality. Our economic plans and programs must thus become increasingly people-oriented in the sense of their collective character achieved through the collective ownership of the means of production.

Our emergence as a nation has given us a new international status which has qualified us for membership of the OAU, the Commonwealth, the nonaligned movement and the United Nations and its various agencies. My government has thus brought Zimbabwe into the various political, economic, financial and social forums where it occupies its place with great honor and tremendous respect. No longer is our world just the laager of Rhodesia and South Africa, but the entire globe and its five continents, offering us vast opportunities of entering into agreements relating to diplomatic, economic, scientific, technical and cultural areas. On a bilateral basis Zimbabwe has signed cooperation agreements with several African countries as well as with Eastern and Western countries. Our policy of nonalignment enables us to be friendly on a bilateral and mutual basis with Eastern as well as with Western countries without jeopardizing our sovereign will and freedom. To date we have opened missions in some nine [as heard] countries, namely Mozambique, Tanzania, Britain, the United States, Sweden, Belgium and West Germany. Several other missions will no doubt be opened in 1981 in socialist and nonsocialist countries.

In our own region we have pursued a policy of goodneighborliness which has been reciprocated by all our neighbors except South Africa, whose aggressive intentions continue to manifest themselves as she goes on recruiting our men, adding them to the over 5,000 whom she continues to harbor and prepare for aggression. We demand that these men be returned to us forthwith and that South Africa cease her aggressive and delinquent behavior in our region.

This brief account certainly shows that our performance as a government in 1980 and as a nation has been remarkable and yet we cannot afford to sit on our laurels or sooner our glorious performances must surely fade into oblivion unless they are made to interact with our present and future performances. Our perspectives for 1981 are therefore now more important than the accomplishments of 1980. What then, you may ask, is the direction of our policies in 1981?

I have already stated that we shall within the next month or so enunciate in clear terms an elaborate statement of our economic policy. On the basis of the parameters set out in that policy we hope to formulate during the first 6 months of the new year a global development plan encompassing all sectors, which should be ready before the new financial year begins in July. The policies and programs begun in 1980 must gain effective momentum in 1981, thus creating for us more benefits and firmly consolidating the people's power. This consolidation will manifest itself in the following sectors:

A. In the security and defense sector, the building and strengthening of defense forces and the forces of law and order will proceed more vigorously than in 1980. Plans for strengthening our defense forces against possible external aggression and internal attacks are well under way.

B. In the economic sector, the continued sustenance of the existing economic infrastructure and the attraction of foreign and national investment have already been granted. [as heard] Judicious participation of the state in industrial, commercial, primary and infrastructural projects will be enhanced. There will naturally be further development and organization of the worker so that his proper and historical role in both primary and secondary industry and commerce is permanently established. The organization and coordination of professionals or intellectual groups with a view to making maximum use of their abilities and experiences will also be undertaken.

C. In the land sector government is working on plans to acquire and allocate much more land to the peasantry next year. Accordingly, programs for the development, [word indistinct] and organization of the peasantry and for the establishment of cooperative farms are being evolved.

D. In the public sector African advancement will continue as a matter of policy in the public service, the army, the police force and prison service. A truly nonracial public service or army, police force and prison service is our goal.

E. In the sphere of foreign relations, in the "E" sector, [as heard] our foreign relations will be strengthened by the creation of more diplomatic missions abroad and the realization of cooperation and trade agreements. My government will continue to give full political and diplomatic support to the Palestine Liberation Organization. Accordingly, the PLO will in due course be permitted to open a mission in Salisbury. Our policy on Western Sahara, as enunciated by me at the last OAU summit in Sierra Leone, remains the same. Indeed, my government is now prepared to accord diplomatic status to the Saharawi Republic in conformity with the recognition we have given it as a sovereign state. Our support for SWAPO as the only authentic representative of the people of Namibia continues. We look forward to the forthcoming Geneva talks between SWAPO and South Africa producing effective modalities for the implementation of Resolution 435 of the Security Council, passed in 1978, on Namibia, so that Namibia becomes independent. Nothing less would satisfy us. We also stand firmly behind the liberation movements of South Africa, PAC [Pan-Africanist Congress] and the ANC, in their revolutionary endeavor to bring democracy to South Africa.

F. In the political, party-political sector we should constantly bear in mind that the national struggle we waged could never have succeeded without the unity of the people behind it. The spirit of oneness in government must manifest itself not only in the vertical dimension of the ruling party but also in its horizontal dimension as we join hands with any party or group whose members profess loyalty to the state and the elected government. The unshakable bond of our indivisible independence and Zimbabwean nationality must surely instill into us a deep political consciousness that constantly prompts our sense of unity. Where is the political and ideological consciousness of ZANU and ZAPU? Let [words indistinct] it every day, every hour and every minute so we can unite our people on the name of independence to work zealously for unity rather than disunity, for loyalty rather than disloyalty, for love rather than hate, for the nation rather than race or tribe and for peace rather than war.

The power we have is your power, the people's power, and will always be used in your interests. In order for us to consolidate this people's power achieved in 1980 we must, each and every one of us, give maximum support to the programs of government that either begin or continue in 1981. Whether you are a comrade freedom fighter, soldier, worker, peasant, student, professional farmer or businessman your personal performance in the fulfillment of your social role is vital. Accordingly I wish to set the following tasks for fulfillment by us all in 1981 in consolidation of our hard won independence:

1. Let us first and foremost be law-abiding and earnestly work for peace so we can increase our people's happiness and derive joy and not sorrow from our independence.

2. Let us sink our personal, tribal, regional, racial, religious or political differences and work daily as Zimbabweans for the unity of our people, remembering the oneness of our people and nation.

3. Let us as workers unite in our productive role, work harder and observe strict discipline and self-control so that we become an efficient and dependable national productive force.

4. Let us as peasant and [word indistinct] farmer make the most efficient use of our land resources as we combine and cooperate with others in improving our productive methods and developing our sense of self-reliance.

5. Let us as the national armed and police forces put our people and nation first and be guided by our national consciousness, remembering now as we did yesterday that we are always servants of the masses and not their masters.

6. Let us as professionals, technicians, scientists or intellectuals in any field of endeavor in which our abilities are called for apply these and place them at the disposal of our nation so they can be utilized in the development of our people.

7. Let us as students recognize that our aspirations are not ours alone but those of the people as well and that as future leaders, professionals, technicians and skilled workers our intellectual failure is the failure of our nation.

8. Let us as employers accept our full economic and moral responsibility for the welfare of our workers and be ready to provide just remuneration for just service.

9. Let us as keen sportsmen always endeavor to achieve only the best results in the name of our teams but also in the name of our nation and our own selves, but always remembering that sports and games are not a form of war but a physical entertainment.

10. Let us as leaders set example in discipline, work hard, have the spirit of industry, morality and general behavior and always tell ourselves: If gold rusts, what will iron do?

Can we in 1981 strive to achieve these tasks and goals in consolidation of our independence? If so, let us therefore regard 1981 as the year of consolidating people's power. Once again I wish to thank all the members of our community, black, white, Asian and colored, for their loyalty and the support they have given my government which has enabled it to work successfully in paving the way to greater achievements in 1981. Long live our national unity, long live our national independence, forward with the year of consolidating people's powers. Happy new year to all of you. Good night.

MUGABE INTERVIEWED ON INVESTMENTS, LAND, WAGES

LD051350 Salisbury Domestic Service in English 1115 GMT 31 Dec 80 CA

[Text] A major statement outlining the government's policy and guidelines on investment and private enterprise will be issued early next year. The prime minister, Comrade Mugabe, told the HERALD in an exclusive interview that the statement will enunciate the government's economic policy, which will also relate to investors. On the basis of this policy the government will proceed to formulate its first development program. Comrade Mugabe said he is not happy with the present situation where the majority are not in control of investment. He said the government wants to see investment directed in the areas which are beneficial to the country. The prime minister said multinational companies are operating in Zimbabwe without restraint. He said they have been asked to reinvest as much as they can in the country and develop their workers but not all are doing this.

The prime minister declared: Our view as a government is that we should proceed to lay down the parameters on which private enterprise should stand. We will not be unfair but we have the general interests of the people to protect. Comrade Mugabe made particular mention of the land which he said is still in the hands of a few whites. That cannot be allowed, he said. He however stressed that it is not the government's intention to exclude the whites from owning land but that most land must be in the hands of the majority of the people. The prime minister also spoke of the improvement of the conditions of service of the country's workers. He said after the commission of inquiry has presented its report early next year employers should be in a position to pay employees better wages than at present.

MINERAL PRODUCTION--Zimbabwe has had a record year for mineral production. The figures for the first 10 months of this year already show that the value of mineral production, totalling nearly $350 million, exceeds that of any completed previous year. Figures just released by the Central Statistical Office show that for the period January-October this year the value of mineral production increased by no less than $100 million compared with the same period last year. Substantial increases are recorded by the gold, nickel, chrome, silver, cobalt and iron-ore mining industries. The value of gold production in the first 10 months this year totalled more than $23.5 million, an increase of about $3 million over the previous year. Incidentally, the total value of minerals produced in 1965 was about $64 million. [Text] [LD060530 Salisbury Domestic Service in English 1600 GMT 31 Dec 80 LD/CA]

[Interview with Zimbabwean Industry and Commerce Minister David Smith by Carlos Cardoso: "I Was Surprised by the Efficiency of the Ports of Maputo and Beira"]

[Excerpts] Zimbabwean Industry and Commerce Minister David Smith was in Maputo as member of a delegation from his country attending the Second Conference for the Coordination of Development in Southern Africa. AIM [Mozambique Information Agency] interviewed David Smith who is 58 years old and was a member of the illegal Smith and Muzorewa administrations.]

AIM: Last week, Mr David Smith and Minister of Transportation of Zimbabwe Ernest Kadungure were in Mozambique. What was the purpose of that visit?

David Smith: The purpose of the visit was to have the Transportation Minister and myself attend a high-level meeting with the Ministers of Mozambique to discuss the future of the railroad and port facilities and to take a close look at the potential for the ever-growing traffic volume which we are going to have to provide for exports. My role as Minister of Industry and Commerce was secondary as compared to that of the Minister of Transportation; the main purpose was to make sure that our exports and imports would be moved more smoothly than in the past.

AIM: Did you like what you saw?

David Smith: I must say that I was impressed by what I saw last week. We saw cargo being loaded and arriving in Zimbabwe in 4 days. Now I can tell you that, if things go according to plan, we will be able to improve our position. For example, we are importing fertilizer and that has to be handled through Maputo because of the congestion in the other ports and because of the railroad facilities which we have been using. This is a big help to us. The same is true of fuel. There was a bottleneck regarding fuel. We were buying petroleum from PETROMOC [Mozambique Petroleum] in some cases but it came through the other line, through Komatipoort and Beit Bridge. Now, with the Limpopo—Chicualacuala line open, it will not only be cheaper for us but it will also be more efficient.

AIM: Do you think that there could be an increase in Zimbabwean imports and exports through Mozambique?

David Smith: Yes. I think that this is possible. I was surprised by the efficiency of the ports of Maputo and Beira. And I think that one of the most important benefits we are going to derive from last week's visit was the fact that we met with top-level ministers, we met with experts who run these operations and we were able to get to know them. Now, when we have a problem, we know exactly whom to contact and they solve our problem.

AIM: Does this mean that, in terms of trade and railroads, it is important to know somebody on the other side?

David Smith: That is absolutely essential. We are about to send experts to be stationed permanently in Mozambique so as to maintain contact with the port managers.

AIM: Will this happen soon?

David Smith: Yes, soon.

AIM: Did you also discuss the question of the oil pipeline?

David Smith: Yes. We not only discussed it but we also went to take a look at the place. The infrastructure facilities there are extremely good. The oil pipeline trial run has revealed progress and it is possible that we might be pumping petroleum through it in the not too distant future.

AIM: During the years of the UDI (Unilateral Independence Declaration) Southern Rhodesia became heavily dependent on the South African route. Trade and railroad experts became accustomed to lining up with the South African side. Do you think that these specialists have developed a psychology of dependence with respect to South Africa?

David Smith: No. I do not think that this is so. I think that they all realize that our country's geographic position always faced toward Mozambique. Naturally, nowadays there is a certain flow along the other railroad line to the ports. Our exports went up 47 percent since we became independent and that created a problem for us and in a similar manner, with the economy growing at the rate it has been growing, our imports are also going to go up. My viewpoint really involves a logistics problem which means that we must get all possible routes for our goods, both for export and for import.

AIM: Does this mean that there is some obstacle?

David Smith: There is no obstacle. But you have to consider one thing: The Zimbabweans easily adjust to the conditions involved in the process of our economy. If, following this visit, we can prove to our exporters and importers that Mozambican ports can handle much tonnnage with experience and in the proper time, then this will be cheaper and more efficient for us.

AIM: Do you think that it is possible in Zimbabwe for people to have a clear idea to the effect that the ports here can be efficient?

David Smith: I think that we can say this to our importers and exporters. I am not afraid of any contradictions. But undoubtedly the proof of the pudding is in the eating and it will be necessary to prove that the time for diverting our exchange has come and that things will go as well as they go now. I sincerely hope that this will come about. This involves another way to go. If our limited number of trade transactions can be turned around, this will turn out to be easier for us. The reports we were getting showed us that there is a definite impetus at this time toward the improvement of railroad facilities. I am satisfied with the port facilities but there could be a bottleneck on the railroads. If the railroads could move freight as they told us they can, that will be an advantage for us.

AIM: Over the past 5 years, in Rhodesia, were there any serious doubts among persons such as you regarding the poor image which Mozambique had?

David Smith: There is no doubt that a distorted image of the situation had been created. And when you are isolated from a certain situation, there is a tendency to believe all kinds of things. I think that one of the benefits of our visit last week was that we were able to see the facilities with our own eyes. For example, the two main exports of Zimbabwe--sugar and steel--are being handled extremely well. Also, as I said before, we saw some goods that were being handled on the way to our country, for example, fertilizer and auto parts. That helps us achieve a considerable cost reduction.

LAGOS ASKS NO SANCTUARY FOR SUBVERSION AGAINST CHAD

AB291715 Lagos International Service in English 0830 GMT 29 Dec 80

[Station commentary]

[Excerpts] The state of urgency with which the members of the OAU good offices committee on Chad responded to the invitation to the Lagos minisummit [words indistinct] of their genuine commitment to the cause for peace in that country. The invitation to the Lagos meeting is a fulfillment of the pledge by President Shehu Shagari to host the conference as soon as the cease-fire agreement was duly signed by the parties to the Chadian conflict. To the relief of the people of this country and all friends of Chad, the cease-fire agreement was eventually signed, and so Nigeria immediately redeemed her pledge.

The Lagos conference just ended also urged the Transitional National Union Government and the people of Chad as a whole to do everything possible to prevent the invasion of its territory which came about recently. In addition, it pressed on the Chadian Government the need to organize elections in collaboration with the OAU by early January 1982, in order to enable the people to elect a government of their choice. The conference found it absolutely necessary to appeal to the international community for assistance to Chad in its critical period of reconstruction and rehabilitation. This will help in the re-establishment of normal economic and commercial life which are essential to the people's economic and commercial life which are essential to the people's well-being and national stability.

In this renewed attempt to ensure lasting peace in Chad, two major disruptive factors must be discouraged: The first is that no African country must provide sanctuary to elements of subversion against the Chadian administration and the second is that all foreign countries must not be allowed to interfere. To the Chadian leaders themselves, they must show a new sense of patriotism and a demonstration of magnanimity in all their actions. This means that though they have just passed through a civil war with resultant losses in life and property, they should all work together to reestablish the same one family to which they all belong under the banner of the People's Republic of Chad.

This is the only basis on which all sacrifices made by countries like Nigeria in the interest of peace in Chad, can achieve the desired result. It is also the only way by which the government and people of Chad can show appreciation to the efforts of the OAU in general and in particular, the unqualified commitment of the organization's good offices committee to peace and stability in Chad.

WEST AFRICAN MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION TO BE FORMED

Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 18 Dec 80 p 9

[Text]

NIGERIA and Ghana have been mandated to draw up proposals for the establishment of a federation of manufacturers associations in West Africa.

Deliberations on the proposals, which are to be carried out by the executive director of the Manufacturers Association of Nigeria and his Ghanaian counterpart, are to commence soon.

Disclosing this in Lagos on Monday at an interview with the News Agency of Nigeria (NAN), the Executive Director of the Manufacturers Association of Nigeria, Dr. Uma Eleazu, said the proposed federation, which had been agreed to in principle by all recognised manufacturers in West Africa, would ensure common approach to the problems of manufacturers in the sub-region.

When fully established, Dr. Eleazu said, the federation of manufacturers association in West Africa will advise ECOWAS secretariat on industrial development guidelines."

Dr. Eleazu regretted that since the establishment of the Manufacturers Association of Nigeria about nine years ago, the investment climate in the country had not been very conducive to Nigerian manufacturers.

"As a result," he said, "prospective Nigerian manufacturers rush to the building of houses where most of the risks encountered in the establishment of manufacturing industries are not likely to arise."

Dr. Eleazu also called for more dedication from the Nigeria Bank for Commerce and Industry and the Nigerian Industrial Development Bank which, he said, were established purposely for advising and assisting businessmen.

As means of saving Nigerian industries, Dr. Eleazu called for a check on the importation of certain products which were already being manufactured in the country in large quantities.

"We can keep our industries alive by so doing" Dr. Eleazu added.

The Manufacturers Association of Nigeria is made up of about 400 companies, manufacturing about 2,000 commodities ranging from corrugated iron sheets to glass.

Colonel Pedro Maria Tonha Pedale who visited Ethiopia as an emissary of the Angolan head of state, Comrade Jose Eduardo dos Santos, was accompanied by comrades Lopo do Nascimento and Manuel Augusto Alfredo (Orlogue), members of the Central Committee of the MPLA-Workers Party. UGANDA CONDEMNS SA TRIAL--The Uganda Government has described the trial of nine black South African patriots in Silverton by the South African racist regime as a shame and called for urgent measures to be taken to secure the immediate release of all those imprisoned. Three of the patriots were sentenced to death and 6 to prison terms ranging from 10 to 20 years. In a statement issued in Kampala today, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs said the trial was once more (?a case) where the brutal and desperate arm of the racist regime had struck against the heroic and struggling masses of South Africa for freedom and justice. In the light of this, the statement said the Government of Uganda once more calls upon the international community, through UNO [United Nations Organization] to impose mandatory sanctions against the South African policy of apartheid, which constitutes a crime against humanity. MALAWI GUERRILLA CLAIM DENIED--The Minister of Information, Dr Nathan Shamuyarira, yesterday described as "false and without foundation" a British Sunday Telegraph report that Zimbabwe has become the headquarters of a Malawian leftwing guerrilla group bent on overthrowing President Kamuzu Banda. The newspaper said the "Socialist League of Malawi," led by Dr Attati Mpakati, had been operating in Zimbabwe for nearly a year--before the Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, won the election in March. According to the paper, the movement claims a membership of 20,000 among the 200,000 Malawians working and living in Zimbabwe and also had bases in Zambia and Tanzania. It said young Malawians had been training in weapons and tactics at a secret bush camp near Salisbury for its "People's Army of Malawi." But asked to comment on the report, Dr Shamuyarira said: "The story is false and without foundation. "The Government of Zimbabwe has not created any bases and is not in any way giving any support to any Malawian movement." [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 23 Dec 80 p 5]

PRESIDENT DELIVERS NEW YEAR ADDRESS

AB011538 Paris AFP in French 1155 GMT 1 Jan 81

[Text] Luanda, 1 Jan (AFP)--In Angola, 1981 will be the year of discipline and control, President Jose Eduardo dos Santos declared in Luanda on Wednesday, during the traditional New Year's address.

The year 1980 had been proclaimed the year of creating the people's assembly (a legislative organ elected through indirect suffrage last November) and holding the first extraordinary congress of the MPLA-Labor Party (from 17 to 23 December 1980). These two tasks have been successfully achieved, the head of state declared.

However, President Dos Santos added that the building of socialism in Angola had been hindered, particularly because the fight against liberalism, disorganization, indiscipline and corruption had not been waged firmly.

The Angolan head of state declared that from now on, discipline will have to be observed from top to bottom, both at party and state levels. In order to meet this goal, the agent of order and justice will be called to play a fundamental role for the defense of the workers' interests, he added. Workers will have to exert control over production and distribution. The ways of exercising this control will have to change to conform to the country's current reality, he specified. Lastly, President Dos Santos urged the people to produce more, particularly in agriculture.

On the other hand, he announced that the next session of the people's assembly will have to study a bill to provide amnesty for certain categories of common law offenses committed more than a year ago. That, he specified, will serve to accelerate the judicial process, both civilian and military. He added that former agents of directorate of security and intelligence (DISA, dissolved in July 1978) who were arrested for abuse of power will be granted a temporary release until a competent court can try them in accordance with the law.

COMMENTARY ON DOS SANTOS' NEW YEAR MESSAGE

LD031538 Luanda Domestic Service in Portuguese 0530 GMT 3 Jan 81 EA

[Unattributed commentary]

[Text] Since the first minutes of the current year the words discipline and control have become the slogans to be kept aloft for the next 366 [as heard] days in Angola.

Proclaimed by the president of the MPLA Workers Party, president of the republic and commander-in-chief of FAPLA [People's Armed Forces for the Liberation of Angola], Jose Eduardo dos Santos, in his new year message, their implementation will necessarily entail the elimination of what the head of state described as the elements of a subjective nature which are rampant--laxity, disorganization, favoritism, protectionism, corruption and lack of control.

The last element of the subjective nature is used by the enemies of the people who foster tribalism, regionalism and racism, factors which greatly contributed to the fall of production and productivity and undermined the cohesion and internal unity of the party.

Besides the fall in production and productivity, the enemies of the people also aim at preventing technical and honest cadres from participating in the revolutionary tasks of national revolution. They have on many occasions forced those cadres to abandon the country. These maneuvers only serve the personal and obscure interests of the enemies of the people.

In order to counter this kind of maneuvers, in his new year message the head of state decided on a new struggle for all workers and the organization of a new, necessary force to impose discipline and arrange for adequate machinery to exercise control at all levels.

All forces of internal order and sectors dealing with the administration of justice will be called upon to participate in the new task and will have to perform a fundamental role in the defense of the working masses, compelling the people to respect the state laws and ensuring the physical and moral integrity of the citizens and of public order, having regard to revolutionary and socialist freedom.

The problem of hunger is another problem to be solved in as short a time as possible. Its solution will be effected by increasing work in the fields and by improving our agricultural and animal production.

In his new year message Comrade Jose Eduardo dos Santos laid down some essential tasks to be done, under our party's guidance, in the 5-year period beginning now. These are: to increase agricultural, forestry and animal production; to process our own national products and reduce imports; to develop the production of goods for export; to ensure the accumulation of foreign exchange in order to carry out investments which will guarantee complete and harmonious development of the national economy; to place foreign investments at the service of national reconstruction.

In order to enable us to distribute our wealth equally and to plan our economic development correctly, it will be absolutely necessary to carry out a population census. This task will begin this year and will be concluded in 1983. According to the head of state, this is another task which will have to be done by all of us.

Finally, referring in his message to the present situation in southern Africa and expressing the desire of our entire people, Comrade Jose Eduardo dos Santos expressed the hope that the year which has just begun will produce firmer steps toward the stability and security of the southern part of the continent. This, he said, would mean an internationally-accepted settlement for the independence of the Namibian people and new advances toward the abolition of the apartheid system.

FORMER FOREIGN MINISTER FORMS OPPOSITION PARTY

AB271255 Paris AFP in English 1237 GMT 27 Dec 80

[Text] Bangui, Dec 27 (AFP)--Sylvestre Bangui, who resigned as deputy premier and foreign minister last month, has launched his country's first internal opposition party since the fall of Emperor Bokassa in September 1979.

Mr Bangui, who as his country's ambassador in Paris denounced Bokassa's role in the massacre of Central African schoolchildren, has called his new political movement the Rassemblement du Peuple Centrafricain (the Central African People's Rally).

His announcement comes in the wake of a national reflection seminar earlier this month, which scheduled presidential elections for March and legislative elections for June.

The seminar, part of President David Dacko's efforts to promote national unity, also decided that the Central African Republic should adopt a multi-party political system more quickly than originally planned.

Mr Dacko, who ousted Bokassa in a French-backed coup in September 1979, had earlier said that he would put this off for two years to enable the country to eliminate ethnic-based party rivalries.

Mr Bangui, announcing the creation of his new political movement here, said that he resigned from Mr Dacko's government on November 12 because of aspects of his country's cooperation policy.

Central Africans alone have the ability to take decisions that affect the destiny of their country, he said, in an apparent reference to French support for Mr Dacko's regime.

Mr Bangui, who said his movement favored a return to a multi-party system, added that it would support the choice of the people in next year's presidential poll.

The country at present has just one party, the Central African Democratic Union, which was set up by Mr Dacko in March to replace the movement for the social evolution of black Africa, under which Bokassa ruled the Central African empire as a one-party state.

Other Central African parties, the Movement for the Liberation of the Central African People, led by Ange Patasse, and the Congo-based Oubangian Patriotic Front, are still both based in exile.

Mr Dacko, speaking shortly after the democratic union's first congress in March, told a press conference that the party would have internal factions as this would detract from the national unity needed to rebuild the country after the ravages of Bokassa.

The recent national reflection seminar, which lasted a week, called for the drafting of a statute governing the formation, and, if necessary, the dissolution of political parties. These parties would have to respect the principles of democracy and national unity, it said.

HABRE CONTINUES FIGHT--Paris, 1 Jan (Reuter)--Former Chad Defence Minister Hissene Habre, whose forces were driven from the capital Ndjamena last month by Libyan-backed government forces, says he will continue to fight until foreign troops leave the country. In an interview to be published tomorrow in the Paris-based African daily LE CONTINENT, Mr Habre said his Northern Armed Forces (FAN) voluntarily pulled out of war-torn Ndjamena on December 15 to spare the civilian population further suffering and to continue the battle on other fronts. "I can assure you that the FAN are intact," he said. "They will continue the battle until the external enemy has been kicked out of our country." Mr Habre, defeated after nine months of bitter civil strife with the forces of President Goukouni Oueddei, told the daily he could never accept what he called Libyan leader Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi's hegemonistic and annexationist designs on Chad and its African neighbours. "[Words indistinct] to say that Chad [words indistinct] living space and its security zone. These are expressions which recall Nazism," he said. MENGISTU: BARRE LACKS SUPPORT--Comrade Chairman Mengistu Haile Mariam today reiterated that although the puppet of imperialism, the Mogadishu reactionary government, was preparing for further destruction, we were in no doubt whatsoever that the Somali broad masses would not align themselves with the Somali Government for further destruction. The comrade chairman said that the broad masses of Somalia had never aligned themselves with the government before to wage war against their brothers, the Ethiopians. This was reiterated by Comrade Chairman Mengistu Haile Mariam, chairman of the Provisional Military Administrative Council, and of the Commission for Organizing the Party of the Workers of Ethiopia, and commander in chief of the revolutionary army, at a graduation ceremony of the 42d group of the Harar branch of the Hebret Senior Military Academy. The comrade chairman recalled that Ethiopia had been able to destroy all the reactionary forces which imperialism had mustered against us and had also managed to wound imperialism itself, adding that imperialism was still encouraging the same invasion force to invade us. He said that since Siad Barre had come to realize that his aggressive plans against Ethiopia did not have the support of the people and realizing that his authority was slipping from his hands, and because of the fact that Ethiopia and Kenya were collaborating for peace with a spirit of good-neighborliness, he had issued a new declaration to prepare the Somali people for another war. Our communist leader said that contrary to what the imperialist puppet Siad Barre had claimed, revolutionary Ethiopia had no plans at all to start a war against Somalia. Comrade Chairman Mengistu said that our revolutionary army was strong, it possessed a socialist discipline. It was united, battle-tested and heroic, adding that the broad masses of Ethiopia were proud of it and dependent on it. On arrival at Harar town from Dire Dawa today, to take part in the graduation ceremony, our revolutionary leader, Comrade Chairman Mengistu Haile Mariam, was given a rousing reception by thousands of Harar residents. BONGO URGES LIBYAN WITHDRAWAL FROM CHAD, CRITICIZES FRANCE

AB301127 Libreville Domestic Service in French 0600 GMT 30 Dec 80

[Text] President of the republic spoke about foreign policy yesterday at the Renovation Palace. He particularly raised the question of the Chadian tragedy. President Omar Bongo warned his colleagues against the machinations of some big powers who use some small African countries as instruments. The head of state dissociated himself from the decision made by what he called the Lagos minority during the recent conference on Chad. The head of state vigorously condemned the Libyan presence in Chad, he called for the restoration of peace in Chad. He also deplored the withdrawal of French troops from Chad. Let us listen to the head of state:

[Begin recording] At a time when this year is drawing to an end, I would like to make a solemn appeal to all the great powers, to all the small African countries. It is not because one is rich that one has to embark upon subversion. I am thinking particularly about the painful problem of Chad. I understand a minority won victory during the recent Lagos summit. [words indistinct]. It is inadmissible that an African country should be occupied by another country. We are all Africans; every African problem should be the concern of all. That is why I, Bongo, (?condemn) France for leaving the Chadians to kill one another and to withdraw simply because there is liberty, there is sovereignty [words indistinct]. Libya should withdraw. If Libya is a friendly country to all Africans, after restoring peace in Chad, she should go back to her barracks and leave the Chadians to control their country themselves. But if she remains there, then Libya is what they themselves popularly call, imperialist. I know some people will say: There is Bongo again saying all this: Yes, I am saying this because this is my view. I am sure there are countries which share my view but they dare not say it. Obviously, I will be accused of interferring in the internal affairs of Chad, but since Libya has opened the way, we might as well follow in their steps. [words indistinct].

I was an officer in the French Army in Chad, so I know the Chadian problem. It is not only the Chadian problem which should concern us; there are other problems which should be solved within the OAU. Our socialism, our communism, our Marxism to us in Gabon, should not be something imported. [end recording]

EDITOR RETURNS FROM FRG VISIT

Monrovia NEW LIBERIAN in English 18 Dec 80 pp 1, 8

[Excerpts] Mr O. Eugene Shaw, editor of the independent newspaper, FOCUS, who has been on a two-month information tour of the Federal Republic of Germany returned this week.

Mr Shaw left here for Germany on October 10, at the invitation of the German Embassy here in Monrovia. His program in Germany was arranged by INTER NATIONES on behalf of the Press and Information Office of the Federal Government.

Among the programs the photo-journalist participated in included the Frankfurt International Book Fair where Africa was the main theme, a visit to the German International Institute of Journalism in West Berlin, and another visit to the offices of the Stuttgarter Nichriten, the world's only computer-run newspaper.

Mr Shaw, who is currently visiting the U.S. on a vacation/business trip, hopes to find investors who could assist in the expansion of his newspaper (FOCUS). He has already held talks with Mr Don Graham of the Washington Post newspaper.

Due to very high printing cost, coupled with the decline of commercial advertising which had constituted the only source of any significant revenue for the FOCUS newspaper, Mr Shaw had, prior to his German visit, temporarily suspended production of the paper. The difficulties had been compounded by the fact that Mr Shaw had almost single-handedly handled the bulk of the paper's production responsibilities.

Mr Shaw's visit is one of the most recent manifestations of the many assistance programs the Federal Republic has been extending to Liberians.

[Excerpt] The Director of the Liberia National Police, Mr Joe Y Myers, has expressed dissatisfaction over the deplorable condition at the National Police Academy in Paynesward.

He said that the Police Academy being the base of the National Police, Government will have to do everything possible to maintain it.

Director Myers was speaking at the Academy on Tuesday where he was guest of honor at the invitation by the Academy Staff.

Director Myers said he was happy to visit the Academy, and told the officers to be dedicated to their jobs.

He said the development of the academy must claim the attention of all law enforcement officers and warned that mistakes that were made by past government officials must not be repeated.

While at the Academy, Director Myers inspected the dormitory, dinning hall, library, radio workshop, firing range, and the newly arrived police cars.

The Director assured the Academy Staff of his fullest support in uplifting the standard of the police training grounds.

Speaking on behalf of the Academy Staff, the Commandant James Forkpa said they were delighted to have the Director and his staff visit them.

He said the visit enabled the Police Director to see for himself the most needed items for the Academy.

The Commandant then appealed to the Director for more manpower and additional qualified instructors, including transportation and office equipment.

He also reminded the Director about the lack of proper coordination between the Academy and the National Police Headquarters, which the commandant termed as duplication of interpretation.

MINISTER NOTES JAPAN'S CONTRIBUTION TO DEVELOPMENT

Monrovia NEW LIBERIAN in English 16 Dec 80 pp 1, 7

[Article by J. Blamo Robinson]

[Excerpt] The Assistant Foreign Minister for International Cooperation Affairs, Mr Sylvester Grigsby, has said that Japanese aid to Liberia has considerably contributed to the development process of this country.

He said the main thrust of Japan's aid here was towards human resources development, agriculture, infrastructure, road construction, and telecommunications.

Minister Grigsby was delivering a speech on "Japan in the International Community' at a programme organized by the Japanese Embassy here last Thursday at the Ducor Hotel.

Japan is currently undertaking a five-month lapographic and photogrametric mapping of the proposed dam sites and reservoirs for the hydropower development project at the St. John River Basin in Grand Bassa County.

A four-man Japanese team is also conducting feasibility studies here for the construction of a new maternity center in Monrovia.

Minister Grigsby told the gathering that Japanese aid was undergoing a considerably shift from emphasis on the loan element to emphasis on the grant element, noting that about 60 percent of Japan's aid goes to countries in the Far East, 25 percent to the Middle East, nine percent to Latin America, and six percent to Africa.

Minister Grigsby, who studied economics in Japan for two years under Japanese Government scholarship programme, traced Japan's history from the sixth century to 1965 when Japan became the second ranking economic power among the capitalist economies.

COMMISSION TO DRAFT CONSTITUTION--Monrovia, 24 Dec (AFP)--The National Redemption Council will set up a national commission to draw up a new constitution, M/Sgt Samuel K. Doe, the Liberian head of state announced in his Christmas message on Wednesday. The composition and the area of competence of this commission are being defined and will soon be announced, the Liberian president specified. Master Sergeant Doe also reaffirmed the soldiers' commitment to return to their barracks, saying: We took over power to restore a political and social system based on democratic principles favorable to the Liberian people. To attain this objective, he said, there must be economic, social and political justice as well as freedom, loyalty and free elections. These democratic principles, Master Sergeant K. Doe notably added, must be laid down in a socio-political contract which expresses the aspirations of the Liberian people. In his Christmas message, the head of state indicated that he had not imposed a total freeze on employment in his November speech on economic matters. The government has not prevented private enterprise from providing employment to people, he said. I would be happy if the latter would assist the revolution in providing more employment. ALL BUT 15 ARRESTED IN 1975 PARDONED

LD311640 Maputo Domestic Service in Portuguese 1200 GMT 31 Dec 80 EA

[Excerpts] Here is an important resolution from the People's Assembly Permanent Commission read by Rui Baltazar, member of the People's Assembly Permanent Commission and minister for finance:

A counterrevolutionary act sparked by imperialist forces and staged by some elements of the FPLM took place on 17 December 1975.

A process of investigation having been carried out, the commission of enquiry appointed by the Political Military Committee concluded that there were various levels of involvement by the implicated. Accordingly, it found that 15 people among the detained were organizers of all this counterrevolutionary act and were enemy agents with direct connections with the enemy abroad. The rest of the detainees figured as elements involved in a serious action aimed at the overthrow of our power by force. Their degree of involvement was diverse, however, it having been noted that most of them were just used for this diversionist and subversive action mounted by the 15 elements referred to above.

Both cases fall under law number 2/79, article 23 which provides death sentences for such cases.

The permanent political committee studied in depth the conclusions of the report from the commission of enquiry. Noting that most of those implicated in this counterrevolutionary act were allured and used by the enemy; considering that the degree of responsibility of these individuals was smaller than that of the organizers, although the acts committed were obviously grave because they endangered the security of the people and the people's state; noting that during the period of deprivation of liberty which has lasted up to the present, most of these individuals repented for their actions; and analyzing the life of each one of them and valuing the positive role played by many during the armed struggle for national liberation, the permanent political committee, confident of the possibility of re-education and full reintegration of these elements into society and on the basis of the prestigious tradition of clemency by the Front for the Liberation of Mozambique, has decided to propose to the People's Assembly Permanent Commission the pardoning of most of those implicated in the crime.

To forgive, however, does not mean to forget, more so when it comes to crimes against the security of the people and the people's state. The opportunity accorded these individuals today does not constitute a right to irresponsibility. Their task is to become useful elements to society. The clemency measure constitutes an opportunity for these elements to participate in the struggle against underdevelopment, which is our main task for the decade.

In this context and on the occasion of the beginning of the decade of victory over underdevelopment, under the aegis of paragraph j, article 44 of the constitution, the People's Assembly Permanent Commission determines:

Article 1: All elements implicated in the counterrevolutionary act of 17-19 December 1975 and detained up to the present date are pardoned, with the exception of the 15 elements responsible for the organization of the action and whose legal proceedings have been referred to the revolutionary military tribunal.

Article 2: Those individuals who were not pardoned will be subjected to trial within the terms of the law.

Article 3, Part 1: The present measure of clemency will lose effect if the beneficiaries commit another crime against the security of the people and of the people's state;

Article 3, Part 2: On committing a new crime falling under law number 2/79 of 1 March, the accused will be tried for this crime and for crimes for which he is now pardoned.

Approved by the People's Assembly Permanent Commission.

DROUGHT DRIVES PEOPLE TO VILLAGES--Inhambane--People in the drought zone consider the communal villages to be the solution to the various problems they face. To come up with a response to this concern and to implement the decisions adopted during a meeting held in Vilanculos early in October, directed by the provincial secretary for party ideological work, with the participation of the district administrators of Govura, Vilanculos and Massinga, a delegation from the provincial government, headed by the director of transporation and communications, worked in those districts between 17 and 22 December. The provincial delegation specifically worked in localities selected for the construction of future communal villages, as well as in localities where the people have already begun to organize themselves along patterns of collective existence. This trip was designed to enable the officials to take a close look at the concerns of the people who have to move to other areas, as well as those who will stay in the same places and who have already begun to organize themselves. As far as we have been able to establish in the areas we covered, the important decisions made in Vilanculos are being widely accepted and this can be confirmed by the rich contribution made by the people during the meetings held by that government delegation. Men and women talked about the difficulties they were facing due to the drought and due to the fact that they have to cover long distances to get water or medical assistance. Most of the peasants did not conceal their satisfaction with the plan that called for them to be transferred from certain localities to others where they can live an organized life, especially in the communal villages. COMMENTARY EXAMINES FOREIGN PRESENCE IN COUNTRY

AB031051 Lagos International Service in English 0830 GMT 3 Jan 81

[Commentary]

[Text] The alien population in Nigeria increased tremendously shortly before and after the ratification of the protocol of the Economic Community of West African States, ECOWAS, regarding the movement of the community's citizens in other states. With this protocol, community citizens are allowed free entry into the territories of member states to conduct business there for at least 3 months without any legal hindrance. But even before this arrangement, Nigeria had been generous in the way she was welcoming visitors. We have had thousands of nationals of neighboring countries in our midst for decades preceding the inauguration of ECOWAS. As a matter of fact, the people of this country have grown to regard those other nationals as brothers and sisters [words indistinct]. This situation has been consolidated by intermarriage which is a universally recognized instrument for the forging of unity and oneness. And so it is a common feature in Nigeria to find nationals of all West African countries in particular living and doing well in any part of the Federal Republic.

But at the same time the alien population has been polluted by criminals who are clearly undesirable. Police records show that many of the crimes committed in the country in the last few years are traceable to foreigners residing in Nigeria. [Words indistinct] This (?dangerous) situation has persisted for so long that many Nigerians and indeed non-Nigerians have expressed fear and concern. Our first citizen, President Shehu Shagari, could not steer away from the fact that some foreign nationals come to turn themselves into a nuisance in Nigeria. In his new year message to the nation, the president remarked that the religious fanatics who caused the unrest in Kano state recently were mainly citizens of neighboring countries. And so, he emphasized the need for greater internal vigilance, pointing out that Nigeria cannot continue to harbor undesirable elements in the name of African unity.

The commitment of this country to the unity and solidarity of West Africa and the rest of the continent is not in doubt. We are one of the founding fathers of the Economic Community of West African States, ECOWAS, and also foundation members [as heard] of the Organization of African Unity, OAU. In these two bodies, Nigeria has been playing a highly commendable role over the years, particularly in relation with the termination of racism and apartheid [words indistinct]. Nobody should be left in doubt that in the prosecution of these formidable roles, Nigeria may incur the displeasure of some other states purely on the basis of jealousy. But this is not a matter that should worry our friends and well-wishers. All we have to do is to gird our loins and ensure the maintenance of the internal security so that at the end of the day we shall be able to successfully discharge our obligations to our people in Nigeria, the African continent and (?whole world).

'DAILY TIMES' DISCUSSES NUMBER OF POLITICAL PARTIES

Lagos DAILY TIMES in English 29 Dec 80 p 3

[Editorial: "Number of parties"]

[Text]

THE five political parties now operating in the country constitute only about one-tenth of the over 50 parties that suddenly sprang up with the lifting of the ban on political activities in 1978.

But there are many people today who believe that even five parties are too many and would rather that we make do with just two political parties. The argument often advanced by those who hold this view is that a situation in which there are too many fairly strong parties, each putting up a presidential candidate, is never likely to guarantee a strong and widely respected leadership, for which reason the country preferred the presidential system to others.

This is not an argument completely lacking in substance. It is, for instance, tempting for political parties that lose the presidency to assume the role of opposition and to make the president's work more difficult. But the snag is not whether or not those who would want to see fewer than five parties in Nigeria have solid arguments. Rather, the problem is just how the number of parties can be reduced, even if there is a consensus on such an issue.

In deciding to register only five out of the over 50 political associations then seeking registration, the Federal Electoral Commission (FEDECO) was guided by such criteria as the need to have truly national parties and not tribal unions. To allow all the political associations to field candidates and contest the elections, as some had wanted, would have been to pave the way for chaos and thus make nonsense of the whole carefully planned transition. The screening exercise was thus necessary and understandable.

Though it has now become conventional wisdom in informed and even official circles that five parties are too many, it seems the full implications of such a view are not being pondered by its advocates. It is either that such people want to wish some of the parties out of existence or they would want some parties to be legislated out of the scene.

The former is impossible. The latter is inconsistent with the democratic spirit of the Constitution. And we cannot but agree with Vice-President Alex Ekwueme that to reduce the number of political parties we now have through legislation is to set a bad precedent, and put in motion a chain of events that is sure to bubble and boil over in unpredictable ways and places.

As the Vice-President said, to pass any legislation reducing the number of political parties now in the country is to infringe on people's fundamental right of association.

If, really, five political parties are too many, then the solution is not to arbitrarily cut down the number. Rather the only meaningful solution is to allow the parties themselves decide, through natural processes to fuse into two or more parties. That way, it will be survival of the fittest for the parties.

And that is the only step consistent with the Constitution.

GOVERNOR: JUDICIAL SYSTEM CUMBERSOME--The Ogun State Governor, Chief Bisi Onabanjo, has said that "incessant" remand of minor offenders has worsened the conditions of the country's prisons. The governor made the remark during the swearing--in ceremony in Abeokuta of a five-man review commission on the administration of criminal justice in the state. He noted that minor offenders had lost their liberty and valuable time while in prison custody. Chief Onabanjo urged the commission to find ways and means to eliminate the stigma associated with the administration of justice in the country with particular reference to Ogun State. He also observed that the country's judicial system, which he said, was a colonial heritage, was cumbersome and irrelevant to the needs of a modern society. The governor pointed out that the customary courts were reintroduced in the state to make justice available to the people regardless of their economic positions. Among others, the commission will examine and evaluate the use of remand and how the principle of restitution and personal reparation by the offender may be given a more prominent place in the administration of criminal justice. In addition, the commission, will examine the problem of delay in the administration of criminal justice and identify the factors that cause delay at criminal trials. It will also suggest practical ways of shortening the trial procedure. The commission is expected to submit its report within three and four months. PRP ORGANIZATIONAL CHANGES--The interpretation of the PRP's constitution has now been vested in the national directorate of the party. This was one of the resolutions adopted yesterday at the end of the two-day convention of the Rimi-Musa faction of the party in Lagos. The convention said the new regulations meant a repeal of article 19 of the party's constitution which gave the powers of interpretation ultimately to the national president. The convention dissolved the former national directorate and national officers of the party and appointed Chief Michael Imoudu its national president. Governors Balarabe Musa and Abubakar Rimi were made deputy national president and national secretary of the party respectively. The convention resolved to inform the FEDECO, state branches as well as the police of the new changes. The party, reaffirmed its commitment to a new social order, condemned the massacre in Kano State, and unanimously endorsed the regular meetings of the nine governors. It further urged the two PRP governors to seek further ways of bringing about peace and progress of the country. The convention ratified the recommendations of the Port Harcourt national directorate meeting of November 15 and 16 to relieve Malam Aminu Kano, Mr SG Ikoku, Dr MT Liman and others of their party posts. MORE LABOR PARTICIPATION--The national president of the Nigerian Civil Service Union, Mr David Ojeli, has said, that with the current development in the country, the Nigerian Labor Congress (NLC) should be more involved in the affairs of the nation. Speaking on NTV Benin programme, "Guest of the Week," Mr Ojeli suggested that the NLC could do this by influencing such national issues like the budget by making its own proposals to the executive before presentation to the National Assembly by the President. He argued that the NLC should not also be silent on burning national issues like the revenue allocation and the creation of more states. Mr Ojeli said that he also agreed that the present criticism of the NLC of which he is the national vice-president, stemmed from the fact that the congress had concerned itself to mainly negotiating for wages and better conditions of service for workers. Speaking on the issue of car loans, he reaffirmed that next month would be crucial in the demand of his union for the loans to be restored in the public service but refused to say what he would do if the verdict of the National Industrial Arbitration Tribunal over the issue was unfavorable. He claimed that the ego of the civil servant had been so debased during the military rule that governments ought to have done a lot to improve the outlook and equipment with which civil servants could work. He suggested that civil servants should be given special incentives for initiative and drive. [Text] [Lagos DAILY TIMES in English 29 Dec 80 p 40]

WARNING ON BARRING ALIENS--Three papers [word indistinct] on the recent religious disturbances in Kano State. The NEW NIGERIAN writes on the hatred generated for aliens in the country following the Kano disturbances caused by religious fanatics led by Mohamed Marwa (Mai Kasini), who was an alien. Asking for caution in what it calls this controversial issue, the paper is of the view that for every devilish [Mai Kasini], there are hundreds of useful aliens, some of whom have contributed to the development of this country. The NEW NIGERIAN then warns that we would be the worse affected by attempting to bar other West Africans from coming to this country for no valid reasons. If we do this, the paper adds, would only be inviting retaliation from other countries. KANO GOVERNOR CRITICIZED--The NEW NIGERIAN criticizes the broadcast by the Kano State governor on the riot in the area. The paper points out that rather than appeal for calm and cooperation from the public, the governor pointed an accusing finger at some people as the perpetrators of the riot. It advises the governor to be more careful in his utterances in such critical situations. The NEW NIGERIAN also appeals to those citizens who attacked the residence of the governor not to judge him by his statements but by tangible results of his tenure. DETAILS OF PRESIDENT'S RESIGNATION SPEECH

PA312243 Paris AFP in French 2151 GMT 31 Dec 80

[Text] Dakar, 31 Dec (AFP)--Senegalese President Leopold Sedar Senghor today announced his resignation in a message broadcast over radio and television.

In his farewell speech, Senghor voiced his optimism concerning the economic and political future of Senegal, despite the international crisis.

Senghor explained his reasons for resigning and revealed that he turned down the introduction of a bill that would have made him "lifetime president."

"I always favored alternating; whether it involve parties through free elections or whether it be within the same party by leaving room for the youth," he said.

The president added that in 1960, after he was first elected president, he decided to retire at the end of his term but that idea fell through following a confrontation with his council president, Mamadu Dia.

Senghor, 74, also mentioned his age and even though he admitted to be in good physical shape, he said he cannot work 10 hours a day, including Saturdays and Sundays, as the office requires.

"One must pass the torch on to youth," the president finished saying.

Talking about his successor, Abdou Diouf, Senghor revealed that the main international problems today are economic and financial, adding: "Diouf is an expert in the matter." He gave as evidence the fact that Diouf has authored two plans for economic stabilization and economic recovery in 1971 and 1980. Senghor stated that Diouf is "competent, honest and low-key." He said: "I might add that his personality is more firm than one might think. You will soon find out."

Senghor then summarized his 20 years in power: National independence was attained in 1960, the annual per capita income grew from $16 to $464 despite 9 years of drought, the employment rate tripled, the proportion of Senegalese capital in businesses grew from 5 to 34 percent, industry's contribution to the gross national product grew from 18 to 28 percent, and the mileage of paved roads tripled.

Senghor then noted that Senegal has the lowest prices for staples and industrial products in black Africa and that it is third after the Ivory Coast and Gabon with regard to the minimum wage, with 133.80 francs per hour.

Senghor cited a quadrupling of the number of students at the (?preschool) and grammar school level, an 8.5 percent increase in high school students, and a 13 percent increase in the number of (?college students). He was pleased with the progress made in meeting the demand for basic needs and stressed that (?cultural) expressions, literature, painting, sculpture and tapestry have come to life in Senegal.

Admitting that "everything is not perfect," Senghor added that a persistent struggle has been waged against corruption and mismanagement by 14 administrative control agencies.

He did not hide the fact that 4 difficult years, which are covered by the "recovery plan," await Senegal but he said that "offshore" oil will be exploited starting in 1983, that iron will be exploited in 1986 and that prospecting for peat, lignite and uranium is underway.

"A promising future lies ahead for our country," he finished saying, "if we know how to remain even more united on basic issues but even more aware and serious-minded, more methodical, organized, hardworking; if we know how to keep up democracy, that is, the pluralism of parties, by (?upholding) human rights and fundamental freedoms."

FREETOWN REPORTS STEVENS' INTERVIEW WITH 'PARIS-MATCH'

AB020820 Freetown Domestic Service in English 2000 GMT 1 Jan 81

[Text] President Siaka Stevens has observed that difficulties arising out of economic shortfalls due to the repeated escalation of the price of oil lead to political problems experienced by several countries. President Stevens made this comment when answering questions put to him by the correspondent of the French newspaper PARIS-MATCH, (Mr Jean Edouard Helia), who also writes for another French newspaper, LE FIGARO.

President Stevens advocated a constant dialogue between the leadership and the people of every country so that there can be understanding and sympathy for government's efforts in ensuring the welfare of the society, particularly during periods of national economic stress.

Speaking about strikes and demonstrations, President Stevens declared that while he is not opposed to such channels of expression, there must be [words indistinct] prevailing conditions in third world countries under which such actions can be exploited to cause chaos and (?insecurity) in the society.

On the question of Sierra Leone's economic revival, Dr Stevens expressed optimism for the future. He cited the national agricultural program which, he said, is his government's number one priority and paid a tribute to the particular assistance currently being received by Sierra Leone from West Germany and [words indistinct] the World Bank for the implementation of agricultural development projects in the country, the Dutch Government for the (Tomobom) rice development project and the international agencies of FAO of the United Nations and also the International Fund for Agricultural Development, INFAD.

President Stevens also spoke of the national health program, particularly the establishment of the new modern central hospital. In the mining sector, the president talked of encouraging prospects in the search for oil in Sierra Leone's offshore well and the imminent start of Kimberlite diamond mining.

President Stevens then spoke of his government's concentrated effort in the development of a sound, viable tourist industry, which will earn the country much needed foreign exchange.

Finally, speaking about his hope for Sierra Leone in the next few years, the president said it was his wish to see the young people of Sierra Leone avail themselves of the many opportunities and train for national leadership in the future. He also said it would be his avowed commitment to pass on his experience to the young, deserving cadres so that they can be of even greater service to the leadership and national development of Sierra Leone.

The PARIS-MATCH correspondent and two officials expressed their deep gratitude to the president for having granted them the interview inspite of his crowded schedule of activities. Present during the interview was the director general of broadcasting and head of the mass media, Mr Joseph Findlay, Jr.

KISSINGER INTERVIEW ON HORN, INDIAN OCEAN REPORTED

LD021622 Mogadishu International Service in English 1100 GMT 2 Jan 81 EA

[Text] The former U.S. secretary of state, Dr Henry Kissinger, left here this morning after a short private visit to Somalia. Speaking to reporters shortly before his departure, Dr Kissinger said that his visit to Somalia was an extremely educational experience for him. I was very pleased to learn from the Somali president and his principal adviser about the situation confronting Somalia, the Indian Ocean and the Horn itself.

The former secretary said that he was always of the view that the Indian Ocean, the Horn and the Arabian Peninsula are of vital importance to the security and peace of the world. He added that there is a general agreement in the United States that the territorial integrity and independence of the countries in the region should be protected from Soviet expansionism, Soviet proxy and Soviet-equipped national forces. Dr Kissinger said that the problem of the Horn affected all the countries of the region and not only one. What is needed here is an overall approach to the problem so that these countries should not (?exist) under Soviet pressure and Soviet proxies [word indistinct]. He further stated that the Horn of Africa is a lifeline of oil supplies of the industrialized countries.

And therefore peace in the world cannot be indefinitely preserved if all disputes are settled by force.

Answering questions, Dr Kissinger said he has been personally recommending American military presence in the Indian Ocean for the last 2 years. Asked about what specific recommendations he will make to the president, Dr Kissinger said that although he was on a private visit here, he would be very strong to make it clear that it should be understood that Soviet expansionism and Soviet proxy forces should not have a free run in the area and that disputes must be settled peacefully.

In an exclusive interview with NBC television network, Dr Kissinger said that the independence and territorial integrity of all the countries in the area is of vital concern to the United States, and after Afghanistan there cannot be any more Soviet expansionism or expansionism by other countries equipped, trained and (?officered) by the Soviet Union. The former secretary said that it was inconceivable that the Reagan administration will diminish the level of aid to friendly countries in the world.

It seems to me that probably they will have a strategic discussion to see what really is needed to prevent the expansionism of Soviet power in the area. He said that it should be understood that the United States has an interest in the territorial integrity and independence of the nations that have vital strategic importance in the Indian Ocean, the Persian Gulf, and Oman, Somalia, Saudi Arabia and others.

On arrival Dr Kissinger was interviewed at the airport's VIP lounge by reporters from the Ministry of Information, [words indistinct] and foreign reporters. Asked about his visit, he described it as a special visit to the region for a close study of the situation in the Horn of Africa. Dr Kissinger said that he had been invited several times by the Somali Government to study the issues of the region, because the preservation of world peace depends on the (?balance) of power. Replying to a question on whether the talks he had with the Egyptian leaders would be similar to his talks with Somali leaders, Dr Kissinger said that Al-Sadat was his personal friend and that they had discussed various issues. During his visit to Somalia he plans to have discussions with Somali leaders. Asked how different the policies of President Carter and Mr Reagan were, as regards the issues of the Horn and the (?Gulf) Dr Kissinger said it was important to understand that American policy was not based on personalities but on U.S. interests. 'AFP' INTERVIEWS BLACK COMMUNITY LEADER

AB021405 Paris AFP in English 1237 GMT 2 Jan 81

[Text] Johannesburg, 2 Jan (AFP)--A leading black community leader, Ntatho Notlana, believes that the struggle against social oppression in South Africa could see an increase in armed struggle in 1981.

In an interview with Agence France-Presse today, Mr Motlana said one hopes and prays changes will not come through violence, but added he was not optimistic.

Mr Motlana, chairman of the Committee of [words indistinct] [?unofficial] voice of most of the population of one million of the giant black township of Soweto, is one of just (?four) black African leaders still at liberty.

A former secretary general of the youth section of the banned African National Congress (ANC), he stressed the determination of young blacks who are denied such fundamental things as citizenship.

The black masses, he said, are becoming more politicized, and declared: We shall be able to defeat the system if we refuse to collaborate, to cooperate, in our own oppression.

Mr Motlana made clear that blacks are not asking the white men to jump in the sea. We think this country is rich enough and big enough for all of us. All we ask is: Let's share it.

He recognized that the election as U.S. President of Ronald Reagan, said to support the white minority regime more than the outgoing administration of Jimmy Carter, could be a negative factor.

But he added that reputed liberals such as President Carter and Senator Edward Kennedy may have simply delayed the inevitable and that Mr Reagan might bring the issue much sooner.

Mr Motlana said that black workers had the economic power seriously to threaten the economy, and that if they did that, business interests would perhaps put pressure on the government.

He described the recent banning restrictions put on trades union leader Zwelakhe Sisulu of the Media Workers Association (MWASA) as a challenge to blacks and an obvious provocation.

Mr Sisulu, he said, was a great leader and would be missed.

Mr Motlana also described the government's policy of declaring the black Bantustans, or tribal homelands to be independent states as a cruel joke.

MARION ISLAND VOLCANO--The 15 South Africans on Marion Island are quite safe in spite of volcanic activity on the small isle 1,500 miles south-east of Cape Town, a spokesman for the Department of Transport said in Pretoria yesterday. Conditions on the island had not changed during the past 24 hours and no violent eruption was expected, he said. The conditions on the island were under continuous observation. "Regular normal contact is maintained with Marion Island five times a day," he said, "but should the situation deteriorate we will be informed immediately." A major violent eruption such as at Mount St Helens in the United States would not occur on Marion Island, he said. The spokesman said the base station and its personnel--biologists, meteorologists and technicians--were not considered to be in danger unless an eruption occurred near them, and that seemed unlikely. "Even if this were to occur, there should be sufficient warning to evacuate the base and find safe shelter," he said. A team of geologists was planning to visit the island in April/May to investigate the eruption at Kaalkoppie and gather more information about the geological history of the island, he said. Signs of volcanic action were observed at Kaalkoppie by a team of biologists on November 10. [Text] [Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 23 Dec 80 p 13]

OBOTE RECEIVES ARMY OFFICERS, DISCUSSES PRODUCTION, UNLA

LD311850 Kampala Domestic Service in English 1600 GMT 31 Dec 80 EA

[Text] President Milton Obote has reiterated that every Ugandan, irrespective of his profession, has a role to play in the rehabilitation of the nation. Dr Obote, who was meeting commanding officers of the Uganda National Liberation Army [UNLA] at his office in parliament buildings, told the officers that the future is there to be conquered and asked all Ugandans to redirect their minds to the future of Uganda.

As minister of foreign affairs, the president reported to the officers that Uganda is at peace with all her neighbors, adding that any security problem in the country must be from within and not external. Dr Obote called on the officers to take their profession seriously in order to reconstruct Uganda in the shortest possible time. He lamented that the government had inherited problems, adding that the country, instead of walking on six legs is now walking on one--coffee. This leg has also been infected with smuggling, and reported that he had charged the minister of state, Ministry of Internal Affairs, Col Omaria, to stop smuggling.

Dr Obote said that his government would encourage any capable Ugandan to increase production. As minister of finance, he said, our problem is not money but how to increase production. The president criticized some foreign governments for their unsympathetic stand on Uganda. It is unfortunate, he said, that they do not understand that the effects of the war cannot be eradicated overnight.

Dr Obote urged the officers not to mind about what the world says about the UNLA. You are a young army and your duty is to defend the lives and property of Ugandans, and if you do it, you will have contributed intelligently to the reconstruction of the country, he declared. The president said he is convinced that the people of Uganda do not want to go back to the experiences of the past. We must, he added, work in a united effort to rebuild our motherland. Dr Obote commended the soldiers for their effective contribution to the total liberation of Uganda.

Earlier, the vice president and minister of defense, Mr Paulo Muwanga, urged the soldiers to do their duty deligently in this new era. Mr Muwanga attributed the reinstatement of Dr Obote as president to God's providence, and pledged the army's support to him.

Colonel (David Ojwang) [words indistinct], on behalf of the officers, thanked the president for meeting them and assured him of the army's support in his endeavors to put the country back to normal. The meeting was also attended by the commander of the UNLA, Maj Gen Tito Okello; the chief of staff, Brig David Cyite Ojok; the minister of state, office of the president, Mr Rwakasisissi; the minister of state, office of the vice president, Mr Peter Otai, and the secretary for defense, Mr Peter Ochanda.

OBOTE ADDRESSES NATION ON HIS 55TH BIRTHDAY

LD291704 Kampala Domestic Service in English 0400 GMT 29 Dec 80 EA

[Excerpt] President Milton Obote has called on all Ugandans to resolve to rid the pearl of poverty, so as to build a wealthy society and prosperous country, as from next year.

President Obote, who was celebrating his 55th birthday at State House, Entebbe, has said that the standard of living in Uganda has sunk to the bottom, either because the implements and power to make us rich have disappeared or are in low capacity. If the people and the government can work together, he stressed, this country shall once again be the pearl of Africa.

Dr Obote went on to reiterate that the Ugandan People's Congress [VPC] Government will pursue vigorously the policy of reconciliation and no revenge, even if some people did not want it.

The president, describing his birthday as personal to him and his inner family, emphasized that, like the majority of Ugandans, he comes from the peasantry stock and he has always been a peasant and a worker.

He explained that Idi Amin's rule of terror exposed a lot of the shortcomings of Ugandans because, he went on, those who spoke about democracy and human rights did not mean what they said. He observed that to talk about those principles without the courage to implement them is useless. He, therefore, urged all Ugandans to work hard and build our moral fibre.

The president declared that Uganda is at peace with all her neighbors. Therefore, he pointed out, any problem in Uganda is purely internal and not external.

He expressed gratitude to Tanzania for helping Ugandans so that they could be liberated. Dr Obote told his guests that the Tanzania economy is suffering now because of her sacrifices. But he stressed that the price Tanzania wants Uganda to pay for their sacrifice is nothing more than complete unity in Uganda.

He appealed to women in the country to come out and fight for their rights and not expect special position to be given to them on a silver plate.

The vice president and minister of defense, Mr Paulo Muwanga, likened Dr Obote to Moses, who delivered his people from bondage. Proposing a toast to the good health of the president, Mr Muwanga said that Dr Obote did a lot to contain the situation in Uganda before his return from exile. He said that Dr Obote committed the UPC against revenge and advised them to reconcile with the enemy and work for Uganda--one government and one parliament. He added that the president did a lot to ensure UPC victory in the recent general election.

The chief of state, Brigadier Oyite Ojok, cautioned that, although terror has been removed, there is still much engagement in magendo [graft] and corruption, which, he said, should be eliminated.

Earlier, President Obote, his wife, Miriam, and their younger son, (Edwin), cut the birthday cake, amid cheers.

ARMS DECREE RELATED TO NEW COUP PLOT

AB291500 Paris AFP in English 1355 GMT 29 Dec 80

[Text] Ouagadougou, 29 Dec (AFP)--The new military rulers of Upper Volta this weekend ordered the surrender of all unauthorised firearms following discovery of an apparent further coup d'etat plot.

The move was part of a series of security measures announced on Voltan radio by a spokesman for the military committee for national recovery which seized power on November 25.

Those in possession of guns were ordered to surrender them to local police chiefs in return for receipts.

An informed source said the move was in connection with the discovery of a major arms traffic following the November coup and implicating a senior member of the ousted ruling party.

Inquiries, still at an early stage, suggested a plot to assassinate President Sangoule Lamizana who was deposed in the November coup, arrest opposition party leaders and set up a single party system, the source said.

(Upper Volta is one of the few African states to have had a multi-party system.)

The plot apparently called for General Lamizana to be killed during an independence day parade on 11 December.

The implicated member of the Democratic Voltan Party--a section of the Democratic African Assembly common to several former French colonies--would have modified the constitution and had himself made head of state.

The source declined to identify the supposed conspirator, but observers believe he could be the former president of the national assembly, Gerard Kango Ouedraogo.

There has been no official or semi-official statement regarding the plot story.

Among other measures announced on the weekend was a ban on the reopening of all places of alcoholic consumption in the New Year.

CANADIAN RAILWAY AID--Lusaka, 30 Dec (AFP)--The Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) is to finance construction of a 26 km (16 mile) rail link between Mohinji, Malawi, and Chipata, Eastern Zambia, at a cost of 15 million kwacha (about U.S. $12 million). Canadian High Commission First Secretary John Licharson said CIDA had asked the Canadian Treasury Board for the money, and that work on the project, including the building of terminal facilities at Chipata, was expected to start come time next year. After this portion has been constructed, Zambia planned to link up Chipata, nearly 600 km east of the Zambian capital, with Lusaka directly or with the Tanzania-Zambia Railway (Tazara) at Serenje in the central province. COLUMNIST REVIEWS PROGRESS MADE IN 1980

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 28 Dec 80 p 10

[Text]

THE YEAR 1980 draws to an end. It will be the end not only of a significant year for Zimbabwe, but the end of a traumatic decade in the increasingly volatile history of mankind.

I recall that before the end of the 60s, a certain religious sect circulated news to the effect that 1970 would see the end of the world. Of course this alarming piece of information invariably caused a ripple of fear and despondency among the converted, while non-believers dismissed it as the work of religious fanatics.

When nothing happened in 1970, this particular religious movement was emphatic in dissociating itself with the rumour, saying their own date of the impending annihilation of the world was 1975. Still nothing happened that year, and since then, no one has tried to hazard another guess as to when the world will disintegrate into nothingness.

This is not to say man, in his blundering ways, has not made his own contribution towards the ultimate armageddon and destruction of the world. Dogged by ubiquitous wars of genocide and an increased threat of a nuclear holocaust that would wipe out the world, we tend to view the end of each year as something of a feat and achievement.

So, at each year end, many people, anxious to make amends for their transgressions before the Almighty calls a halt to their lives because the lease has expired, make impassioned pledges to reform and open new chapters in their lives for the subsequent years. Resounding resolutions of personal emancipation are proclaimed with, forgive the imputation, feigned sincerity, while nations map out new strategies for the advancement of their peoples.

For Zimbabwe, the past year was the most important in history. It was on April 18 1980 that the country became a black majority ruled sovereign state after nearly 90 years of settler domination and colonialism.

To give special significance to the year, the Prime Minister, Mr Robert Mugabe, proclaimed it the year of the people's power. For Zimbabwe, 1980 heralded the coming of a new era of peace and reconciliation after seven years of a bloody racial confrontation between black and white Zimbabweans.

Now that the year draws to the end, it is time to take stock of the progress made in our transition to true nationhood. It is time to close ranks and take a hard, searching look at ourselves to see whether in our hearts of hearts, the things we have said and done as leaders or as ordinary citizens are truly in conformity with our goals or aims as an independent nation.

Anticlimax

A few weeks ago, a great deal of ballyhoo and excitement swept through the country, sometimes with parlous effects, just before the nationwide local government elections. Ironically, however, the event itself turned out to be something of an anticlimax, and I am still to learn what all the fuss was about.

What is clear are certain inherent factors that emerged from the extensive electioneering preceding the election, which I believe can provide an invaluable lesson to Zimbabweans on the excesses and limitations of contemporary African politics

Perhaps worth noting, to begin with, is the seemingly inconsequential but vital fact that the recent election exercise marked a milestone in the country's efforts to consolidate its independence through the reconstitution of the organs of government administration to reflect the wishes and aspirations of the people.

By the same token, the event must serve as a yardstick with which to gauge the performance of our new Government in terms of commitment to their vows as representatives of the people.

The events of the pre-election period may now be just dirty water under the bridge. But that dirty water carried with it some pretty gruesome scenes, which for the many victims of the violence and lawlessness which often ensued, will be difficult to forget.

Still fresh in our minds is the senseless massacre of nearly 60 of our compatriots during the insane battle that took place at Entumbane in Bulawayo But recognising that no good can come out of witchhunting and recrimination, the whole Bulawayo spectacle must serve only as a bitter lesson to those whose political inexperience may have impaired their vision of the complexities of our situation.

For those in leadership, this is a time to reflect on their performance for the express purpose of appraising their own capabilities to cope with the incalculable demands of their onerous offices.

For the ordinary Zimbabwean, it is time to re-establish one's bearings and to re-examine one's attitudes to see whether they are in conformity with our expectations in independent Zimbabwe.

The world of today will not wait for Zimbabwe to gather its reigns in the struggle for survival faced by global food shortages, disease and ignorance. Indeed, in our world of today, it is no longer a matter of what one needs for tomorrow, but what one can find for today.

Accepting this as the reality of the situation, then the question of inexperience must be allowed to become an indefinate defence against the accountability of those we voted into power to lead us.

We cannot bury our heads in the sand like the ostrich and pretend all is well when innocent lives continue to be lost in pointless killings. It would be obnoxious and foolhardy to ignore the ominous convulsions slowly turning our society into a cesspool of confused mentalities and impaired convictions.

Well worth remembering is that power is a treacherous companion, and if mishandled, can corrode a person's mental capabilities and confound his power of reason.

MAHACHI CALLS FOR END OF PARTY RIVALRY

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 28 Dec 80 p 1

[Text]

THE Deputy Minister of Lands, Resettlement and Rural Development, Mr Moven Mahachi, yesterday urged all political parties to be "sober" during the coming year about their rivalry, particularly in matters affecting the development of the country and its people.

Mr Mahachi said: "We are now going into a new year, the second year of our independence. Let us all learn from the mistakes we made in the past year."

The Deputy Minister was speaking in an interview about the difficulties the Government's rural development policy faced in some areas because of political rivalries.

He said the biggest obstacles to development had been encountered in the Mhondoro and Beitbridge areas where leaders belonging to rival political parties had told people not to accept seed, fertiliser, equipment and even food distributed in those areas because, according to them, accepting meant support for ZANU (PF).

"Previously, some of the seed, fertiliser, equipment and food came from the United Nations' High Commission for Refugees, and some from the Agricultural Finance Corporation," Mr Mahachi said.

He added: "I want to warn that when a catastrophe such as famine, or hunger, strikes, it has no political affiliations. It does not choose whether to affect people of one tribe, one race, one colour or one political party.

"It affects all of us as a nation. This is why, in matters of development, we must all move ahead together. This is also why we must all recognise the fact that rivalry has its places, but in matters of development it has no place at all. A major-all the coming year we are all going to be sober about the whole thing."

Mr Mahachi said it was also important for people to distinguish between Government and party. Party matters were strictly party matters, but Government matters were for all the people.

Quoting examples, he said when the Government announced that primary education would be free, it did not say it would be free for children of members of ZANU (PF) alone, but for all children of the nation, irrespective of which party their parents supported.

"It is therefore ironical that while the distributions were refused in some areas on the grounds that they were ZANU (PF) distributions, no parent came forward to say his children would continue to pay school fees because the fees had been abolished by a ZANU (PF) Government," he said.

ALL PEOPLE

"As far as the Government is concerned, development policies affect all the people, not one party, one tribe, one race or one colour.

"There is no question of leaving anyone behind. Anyone who lags behind in matters of development is letting not only himself or herself down, but the country and the nation as a whole.

"So where development policies are concerned, we forget our political differences and our political ambitions. Everybody must work together for the success of those policies. This is what we must aim at in the coming year," he said.

GOVERNMENT CONTEMPLATES METAL EXPORT TAKEOVER

Mining Houses Concerned

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 27 Dec 80 p 1

[Text]

THE Government wants to be the sole trader for Zimbabwe's mineral exports which bring in hundreds of millions of dollars a year.

At the moment the producers and mining houses are responsible for selling their products throughout the world. Only gold is sold by the Government.

Although no one in the industry will comment it is apprehensive about the plan. The mining houses are especially concerned as they do not want to lose their long established trading contracts who are not only fully informed on prices but know all details of production and demand.

Producers say they are getting the best possible prices, built up on close relationships with brokers and traders throughout the world.

In some cases there is no control over prices as the London Metal Exchange is the market place for many minerals.

However, analysts, through considerable experience of the LME, can keep a sharp watch on demand and adjust production according to what they see the LME price will be several months ahead.

In most cases their predictions are remarkably accurate and this country similarly watches the foreign markets.

The Secretary for Mines, Mr Christopher Ushewokunze, declined to comment on the plan.

Dangers of Move

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 28 Dec 80 p 10

[Editorial]

[Text]

REPORTED moves by the Government towards taking over the selling of the nation's mineral production are understandable in the socialist climate of today but not necessarily in the interests of the country or the mining industry.

The people, the land, the minerals are the country's major resources and African governments, when they come to power, want to end what they term the exploitation of all three.

Mining is big business, it is one of the keys to the country's economy and prosperity and as such has to be handled with the greatest of care — and by experts. We are not suggesting Government could not set up a team of top salesmen and mining experts but Zimbabwe has such a wide range of minerals that it would be difficult to co-ordinate handling under one central authority.

Other African countries have gone further: they have nationalised the mines — and then found it did not work. The present system of allowing mining companies to sell on the best possible market seems to be the most sensible and most profitable way of handling things.

As in many facets of Zimbabwean life from now on there is going to be greater Government and worker involvement but in the new order, as in the old, it is essential not to kill the geese which lay the golden eggs. And mining is a golden egg.

SIX TRADE PACTS SIGNED WITH SOCIALIST STATES SINCE FREEDOM

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 23 Dec 80 p 1

[Text]

SIX bilateral trade agreements have so far been signed by Zimbabwe in the post-independence period. These were all with socialist countries, a spokesman for the Ministry of Commerce and Industry said in a statement to the Herald yesterday.

According to the statement, agreements had been concluded with Bulgaria, the Democratic Peoples' Republic of Korea, Iraq, Mozambique, Romania and Tanzania.

Agreements with several other countries were "under active consideration at the present time".

The agreements signed to date would come into effect from a prospective date when they would be published in the Government Gazette in terms of the Customs and Excise Act.

The main provision of all the agreements was that the parties accorded goods and produce originating in the other country most favoured nation treatment in their importation.

However, the statement said, the agreements all recognised the need for special exceptions in respect of trade relations with neighbouring countries, customs unions, and free trade areas.

Most of the agreements included lists of the major commodities which each of the countries had available for export to the other. "These lists are indicative only and not restrictive."

The agreements generally provided for duty-free entry, in accordance with the laws of the importing country, of advertising materials, samples and goods imported temporarily for fairs and exhibitions.

There was normally a provision stipulating that payment for goods would be effected in freely convertible currencies, the statement said.

It added that provision was made for joint consultative committees to meet "from time to time" to consider and review aspects of implementation.

ABSORPTION OF GUERRILLAS INTO COMMERCE, INDUSTRY URGED

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 28 Dec 80 p 1

[Text]

THE vice-president of ZAPU (PF), Mr Josiah Chinamano, yesterday urged the Government to begin a policy of absorbing into commerce and industry those remaining guerillas who could not be taken into the National Army.

Speaking in an interview about his New Year wish for Zimbabwe, Mr Chinamano said the first thing he wanted was a rapid return to normality in the coming year.

He said: "While I wish a bright future for the people of Zimbabwe, I also recognise that certain things need to be done before a complete return to normality can be achieved.

"First, former guerillas who cannot be taken into the National Army need to be absorbed into commerce and industry.

"They cannot be forgotten," he said. "You cannot say to them: 'Give us your guns and go home', because that would only make the situation far worse than it is at the moment.

"So rapid progress towards the building of the National Army should be made.

"But obviously, not every former guerilla will be taken into the National Army, as the country cannot afford to have too large an army.

"This means that the bulk of the guerillas will have to be absorbed into commerce and industry, and the sooner this is done, the quicker the return to normality."

Mr Chinamano said this would also depend on the capability of the country's economy, whose expansion in order to absorb them would also depend on capital from local sources and those abroad.

Mr Chinamano, warned, however, that such capital would never come when the country was not peaceful, and when political parties continued to make war noises which were detrimental to Government measures for reconstruction and resettlement.

He said he hoped the two major political parties, ZANU (PF) and ZAPU (PF), would continue to hold meetings like the one they held a week ago to iron out the differences between them that threatened the peace of the nation.

"Such meetings, held frequently, would not only ventilate various viewpoints about their differences, but would also map out a future that would be to the liking of all Zimbabweans," he said.

Adding to the communique issued after last week's meeting, he said the two parties were aware of the need for peace and prosperity.

He said there was a common understanding that it was necessary in the interests of the country and its people to forget past feuds and join hands for progress and development.

No divergence

Mr Chinamano said he was pleasantly surprised that in the various contributions at the meeting there was no divergence of views about the future of the country.

"I cannot divulge the details of our discussions. But I can say both parties frankly expressed their grievances. We told them what we were not happy about, and ZANU frankly told us what they were not happy about.

"In the end we decided to set up a joint committee to keep both parties informed of further grievances or actions threatening the peace of Zimbabwe. I think that was a very appropriate thing to do," he said.

BRIEFS

EXODUS FEAR UNFOUNDED--Predictions of a Christmas exodus of whites from Zimbabwe seem to have been exaggerated. There is little evidence to suggest that any more people are leaving the country than is usual for the time of year. Though some removal firms say they are getting more inquiries than usual about moves to South Africa, the majority say there is no sign of any dramatic increase in the number of people leaving. Mr RO Kershaw, area secretary for the Automobile Association in Matabeleland, said in Bulawayo yesterday: "The association has not experienced any significant increase in the overall number of touring documents issued or hotel bookings arranged this December compared with the same month last year." One removals firm said that though people were leaving Zimbabwe many were coming into the country. A spokesman said every truck his firm had sent to South Africa in the last three weeks had returned with a full load. The returning trucks were filled with the belongings of former Rhodesians returning now the war is over and with those of others, mainly British, who had emigrated to South Africa and who now feel they could be in for "a dose of what Rhodesia got" if they stay there. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 23 Dec 80 p 1]

SAUDI AID--The Minister of Finance, Senator Enos Nkala, yesterday received a cheque for U.S. $5 million from the Saudi Arabian Ambassador to Zambia, Mr Fouad S. Husseini, for the Government's programme of resettlement and basic reconstruction. The event was doubly significant. For it marked the full achievement of the Government's target of $110 million in grants from international donors for the country's immediate reconstruction and resettlement needs, according to a Treasury source. And, according to United Nations sources, it also marked Saudi Arabia's first injection of bilateral humanitarian aid into the Third World. Receiving the cheque in Salisbury, Senator Nkala pointed out that Saudi Arabia and Zimbabwe shared a common heritage of underdevelopment. He noted that the two countries were currently engaged in "talking about a number of things." And Saudi Arabia, which observed sanctions during UDI, would be "placed in the position it was before the war." In reply, the Saudi Ambassador to Zambia said his country had no political or economic motives for having provided Zimbabwe with the U.S. $5 million grant. "We do not need to market our products--they market themselves," Mr Husseini said. He added that Zimbabweans had proved to be "excellent freedom fighters" and, when it came to statesmanship, he hoped the country would perform equally well. LISBON CITES ANGOLAN REPORT ON SOUTH AFRICAN ATTACK

LD301203 Luanda ANGOP in French 0930 GMT 30 Jul 81

[Text] Luanda, 29 Jul (ANGOP)--Racist South African troops stationed in Namibia launched a large-scale military operation against southern Angola in the first fortnight of July and continue to occupy seven villages situated in the zone, according to the Angolan defense minister's communique issued on Wednesday in Luanda.

The South African troops, consisting of an infantry brigade, two mixed batallions of mercenaries and South Africans, plus a South African battalion of motorized infantry, reinforced and supported by Impala planes, Puma and Alouette helicopters armed with 155 mm guns, 81 mm mortars and AML-60 armored cars, penetrated into Angolan territory and occupied the localities of Mulemba, Nehone, Ndova, Mupa, Evale, Chana Caiolua and the village of Mutako.

The Angolan defense minister says that the command post of the invasion forces is at Mulemba and that the village of Mutako was completely destroyed by the forces. From the positions now under enemy control, mixed helicopter-borne forces of South Africans and mercenaries are constantly checking the access routes of Nehone-Ngiva, Nehone-Evale, Evale-Mupa, Evale-Mongua-Xangongo and Mulemba Chiede.

On these roads the invaders are carrying out ambushes, attacks and other actions against civilian and military vehicles. At present, again according to the communique, a batallion of motorized infantry of the racist army is moving north towards the town of Ongiva to attack and occupy the commune of Cuvelai, while its air force controls the whole of the airspace in the province of Cunene to protect its land-based units.

The South African invasion in Southern Angola began [word indistinct] toward the end of June which was marked by an escalation in bellicose actions against Angolan territory by the South African forces.

Parallel with this devastating action against Angola, the communique says, the apartheid regime reinforced its military disposition in Namibian territory (?occupied) [words indistinct] to 40,000 armed men, most of whom are stationed along the southern border with Namibia, particularly at Ondangua and between boundary marks 20 and 35.

In his communique the Angolan defense minister exhorts the Angolan Armed Forces [FAPLA], the paramilitary forces and the population in general to reinforce the country's defense system to repel the South African invasion.

The communique also alerts international public opinion about this new aggression against the national sovereignty of te People's Republic of Angola, calling for greater solidarity with the Angolan people and the FAPLA "which will be able to give a real rebuff to guarantee the defense of the threatened fatherland.."

ENERGY CONFERENCE OPENS IN LUANDA

EA311689 Luanda Domestic Service in Portuguese 0500 GMT 31 Jul 81

[Text] The People's Republic of Angola [PRA] energy minister has hailed the Southern African countries unity of action aimed at bringing about rational and meaningful use of energy reserves in order to avoid being affected by the consequences of the world energy crisis. This is what Comrade Pedro de Castro Van Dunem (Loi) told the opening session of the Energy Commission of the Southern African Development Coordination Conference [SADCC] which took place in Luanda yesterday. In his opening address to the SADCC Energy Commission, which will adopt a common position to be defended at the UN conference on new and renewable energy resources, Minister de Castro Van Dunem said that the harnessing of each country's energy resources would contribute toward the creation of a regional electric network.

Commenting, PRA Petroleum Minister Jorge de Morais Montel proposed that a regional research institute on renewable energy resources be established. He explained his proposal and the potential advantages which the Southern African region would derive from it. The minister of petroleum said that the world is facing a true energy crisis provoked by the imbalance between the growing consumption of crude oil and the relative underexploitation of large oil reserves which are capable of sustaining the present rate of prospecting for many years.

The SADCC Energy Commission will draw up a plan to conserve and protect energy resources, of which Africa has 27 percent. [Sentence as heard]

SPECIAL ENVOY DEPARTS ABIDJAN--Abidjan, 3 Aug (AFP)--Mr Dombele Mbala, the Angolan envoy who arrived in Abidjan last Friday to present to Ivorian authorities his country's viewpoint following South Africa's aggression against Angola, left Abidjan for Libreville on Monday. He expressed satisfaction with the outcome of his visit. My mission with the Ivorian authorities was to explain to them the situation of serious tension created by the coalition of Reagan's United States and racist South Africa and the far-reaching plan they have conceived to destabilize Africa, Mr Mbala stated. I leave Abidjan convinced that Angola does not stand alone in this trial and that the whole of Africa, as well as all peace-loving countries, will come together to stop the criminal hand of the imperialists and racist South Africans, he added. He affirmed that the Angolan people will continue to support the Namibian people and SWAPO in all fields, and the diabolic plan will never stop its international assistance. Mr Dombele Mbala also denounced the penetration into Angolan territory and the occupation of some villages in Cumene Province (southern part of the country) by South African troops, noting that this is part of the far-reaching plan. CUBAN COSMONAUT ARRIVES LUANDA--A Luanda dispatch reports that Col Arnaldo Tamayo Mendez, first Cuban and Latin America cosmonaut, has arrived in Angola on an official visit at the invitation of the MPLA-Labor Party and the Angolan Government. In statements to newsmen, Tamayo, alternate member of the PCC Central Committee, said he expects that an Angolan will soon conduct research work in the Cosmos, thanks to the initiative and aid of the Soviet Union. The USSR Intercosmos program makes it possible for developing countries, such as Vietnam, Mongolia and Cuba, to participate in high level scientific research work, Tamayo added. The first Cuban and Latin American cosmonaut was met at the airport by Col Pedro Maria Tonha, member of the MPLA-Labor Party Politburo and minister of defense, and other Angolan and Cuban personalities. Referring to his space travel in September 1980, Tamayo said he had been pleasantly impressed by the landscaope of the Angolan territory as well as of other African countries he had observed from the Cosmos. He added that he attributes great importance to his stay in the People's Republic of Angola, the first African country of his tour, where he will conduct a broad working agenda. BACKGROUND PROVIDED ON LAND REFORM SYSTEM

Paris AFRICA AFP in English No 2811, 17 Jul 81 pp 1-3

[Article by Francois Robinet: "Ambitious Programme for Land Reform"]

[Text] BUJUMBURA, July 15--The Republic of Burundi in the heart of Africa, one of the poorest and most over-populated countries in the world, is in the throes of an ambitious land reform programme called "villagerisation."

The aim is to build up self-sufficient villages of 250-300 families, each with its own schools, dispensaries and agricultural centre with tractors and fertilisers.

Only five percent of Burundi's estimated population of five million live in the country's few towns, making this country on the shores of Lake Tanganyika the most rural in the world together with its northern neighbour, the Republic of Rwanda. Zaire neighbors the Republic on the West and Tanzania on the East.

Burundi was a Tutsi kingdom as early as the 16th century and was incorporated into German East Africa in 1890. From 1919-62 Burundi was a League of Nations, then United Nations, mandated territory administered by Belgium. The Tutsi monarchy was overthrown in 1972 and today the country is ruled by a supreme Military Council headed by President Jean-Baptiste Baganza.

The country has no mineral resources or industries and is totally dependent on its agriculture, but the land is parcelled upon into tiny non-viable plots.

It is estimated that 80 percent of the arable land, scattered over tens of thousands of tiny hills, is divided into family plots of under 1.5 hectares (3.75 acres).

The average Burundi family is isolated in its "rugo" (hut), which is hidden by a circular thicket of bamboos or trees, and farms the lower slopes of hillsides with out-dated methods unable to produce enough food for the 2.2 percent annual increase in population.

That is why the Baganza Government, two years ago, launched its "villagerisation" project to modernise farming in a scheme similar to one introduced into Tanzania.

Real People's Power

The ruling UPRONA (Progressive) party--the only one in the country--has an obvious economic motive in launching this village project, but there is also a strong political one.

"If the people are regrouped we will be able to hold political debates with them more easily, leading to our party getting roots amongst the peasants and leading ultimately to a real people's power," a leading UPRONA official told AFP.

But the project has hit a number of snags, according to a recent party report.

"The number of villages being built is unsatisfactory owing to a lack of funds and shortage of imported material as well as the lack of interest shown by the local people in certain regions."

So far eight villages have been built, most of them in Imbo Plain north of the capital, but none are really operational as farm units. Their inhabitants are recent immigrants from other parts of the country.

But there is an even worse feature--the peasants in the new villages are refusing to change their former, traditional ways of working the land.

Luxury Living

They look on the "model" villages as a new form of luxury living, not understanding the real role.

The party has noted that Burundi courts have for long been swamped in cases brought by quarrelling landowners and tenants, for peasants here are ready to do almost anything legally in order to get possession of a plot of land, however arid.

Foreign advisers here see that peasants in the model villages just do not reason why they should walk several kilometres to work on the village crop when in their old homes the fields were just outside the front door.

The present regime abolished a head tax which was a heavy burden for peasants in the old days--the tax was levied on the size of the crop.

Absentee Landlords

For this reason, peasants have for ages hidden a portion of their bean crop, for instance, so that although the tax has been abolished the state still does not know the country's real production of this staple food.

In June 1977 the Government took action against absentee landlords, returning the land to those who worked on it. It was probably the major reform carried out so far in Burundi.

Poor Upkeep

Nevertheless, the Government is still facing many difficulties.

In 1980 there was a catastrophic coffee crop, the country's major foreign currency-earner, when production slumped by 40 percent.

One reason was bad weather, but the poor upkeep of plantations was also to blame. Tea production was also badly hit.

Cattle rearing is slumping--Burundi has an estimated 800,000 head.

President Baganza said recently: "We can at present produce enough food for our needs."

But observers wonder for how long this will continue. (AFP)

DIFFICULTIES IN TRANSPORTATION DETAILED

London WEST AFRICA in English No 3336, 6 Jul 81 pp 1558-1559

[Text]

Like a contagious disease, Tanzania's sick economy is beginning to undermine the health of its landlocked western neighbour Burundi, which is encountering increasing difficulties in moving its exports and imports, AFP reports.

Separated from the Atlantic coast by 2,000kms. (1,250 miles) of Equatorial Africa, much of it thick forest, Burundi depends on lake traff. and an ageing railway line for its overland link to the Indian Ocean 1,250kms. (780 miles) away to the east at Dar-es-Salaam.

The railway, from Dar-es-Salaam to Kigoma on Lake Tanganyika, was constructed by Imperial Germany at the turn of the century and is now on its last legs. From Kigoma, imports are transferred to a lake steamer and sailed north to the Burundi capital Bujumbura some 200kms. (125 miles) away.

A recent report drawn up by Burundi's only political party UPRONA, complains that sometimes more than a year goes by before goods ordered abroad actually arrive in the country. Deliveries of fuel and cement were recently interrupted for several weeks.

Kigoma used to handle 6,000 tons of freight each month, but this has been halved. The reasons for this drop are easy to find — old-fashioned cranes, power cuts, lack of godowns (warehouses). Sometimes it can take a couple of months to discharge and reload one of the small lake barges, and the only crane that can handle containers is operated by hand.

The ships are hardly any younger than the railway. Most of them were launched in the 1920s, and one of them, the Liemba, is an old German steamer sunk during the First World war and then salvaged.

At the other end of the line, at Dar-es-Salaam, a combination of congestion, corruption, theft and lack of storage facilities does nothing to solve the problem.

Two weeks ago Burundi was to start shipping out this year's 28,000-ton harvest of its vital cash crop, coffee. The director of the port of Bujumbura said he hoped that both sides would "make the necessary arrangements."

Following 18 months of dithering, Tanzania and the European Development Fund have just signed an agreement covering the modernisation of Kigoma port. Moreover, a 350-ton French-financed container ship is being assembled at Bujumbura. "Everything should start working within the next 20 years," Burundi Foreign Trade Minister, M. Antoine Nyankiye commented dryly.

Meanwhile Burundi's monthly exports and imports total 13,000 tons, four times more than can be handled by the "Tanzania connection." There are only two other possibilities, air or along 1,800kms. (1,125 miles) of road through Rwanda, Uganda and Kenya to East Africa's largest port, Mombasa.

Already the Government has started importing fuel this way, but the roads are not so good and the traffic has to transit through three other countries. Obviously this puts up the cost. Rail freight averages about $67 a ton, road frieght works out at $245 a ton. Petrol, which carries very little tax, costs $1.2 per litre at the pump.

Step by step, inflation moves along the line from imported goods to local products. A tube of toothpaste costs $2.70.

Air freight is probably the solution, so long as goods are not too heavy, and a new tea factory is being flown in bit by bit.

Like the airport at Kigali, capital of neighbouring Rwanda, Bujumbura's runway is being extended to receive the latest jumbos. The trouble is that work at Kigali has almost finished, and Air France and Sabena, the two European companies which serve the region, will be using Boeing 747s and DC10s from the end of the month. But they will not be able to land at Bujumbura for several more months.

OIL REVENUES USED TO DEVELOP AGRICULTURE

Paris LE CONTINENT in French 23 Jun 81 p 8

[Text] While most of the countries of West Africa are experiencing some economic difficulties, particularly because of hydrocarbon imports, Cameroon seems to be getting the most it can from the petroleum godsend.

Since the first petroleum discovery in 1978, Cameroon has been experiencing a record economic growth of 6 percent per year. And according to some financial experts, this growth could be even greater.

Currency reserves rose from $52 million in 1978 (1 dollar = 5.7 French francs) to $194 million last year. The state budget increased by 31.8 percent in relation to the previous year, and is expected to increase by 26 percent fro the 1981-1982 fiscal year.

The revenues which Cameroon has lost from its traditional exports, coffee and cocoa, it has largely recovered thanks to the sale of its petroleum.

This situation, however, has not made the Cameroonian authorities "lose their heads," as they do not wish to depend only on oil. Thus, in contrast to its oil-producing neighbors, Nigeria and Gabon, Cameroon is devoting a large part of its oil revenues to the development of its agriculture.

Indeed, the marketing of coffee, cocoa and even bananas is experiencing difficulties on international markets, but Yaounda estimates that the crisis is temporary and that oil will make it possible to go through this bad period without too much difficulty.

Modest in 1978, only 800,000 tons, Cameroon's oil production should reach 4 million tons this year, while internal consumption is scarcely 1.5 million tons per year.

Five oil companies are on site: the American companies Pecten, Mobil and Gulf Oil, and the French, Elf-Serepca and Total. But all are in association with the national oil company, which holds 60 percent of the shares in the oilfields.

The immediate effect of this economic boom has been to attract, among others, foreign banks, whose number rose from four, 3 years ago, to seven today. It follows, however, that this boom brings with it the classic consequence of this type of development: a high rate of inflation, 15 percent according to the experts, and a considerable rural exodus, this despite the government's efforts to combat these constraints.

CALM AT NIGERIAN BORDER--Yaounde--"All is calm along the entire Cameroon-Nigeria frontier," affirmed President Ahmadou Ahidjo in an interview published on 7 July by the daily newspaper CAMEROON TRIBUNE. The chief of the Cameroonian state, moreover, denied the news bulletins from foreign radio stations reporting confrontations on the Nigerian-Cameroonian frontier and affirmed that "if there might be hostilities one day, it would in no way be on Cameroon's initiative." Replying to a question on the incident of last 16 May (LE CONTINENT of 21 May) between elements of the Cameroonian and Nigerian armed forces, which had caused five deaths on the Nigerian side, President Ajidjo recalled that his country had expressed its regrets to the Lagos authorities and to the victims' families and had proposed the setting up of a joint committee to verify the facts, making it possible to clarify the matter and to draw conclusions. He indicated, in this regard, that a certain number of chiefs of state had proposed mediation for the peaceful settlement of this incident, but that the Nigerian Government had preferred to submit it to the OAU. This matter, moreover, is the official reason given by the Nigerian president, Shehe Shagari, for his refusal to participate in the last Nairobi summit, which recommended the formation of a five-country committee to mediate between the two states. "This proposal was not approved by the Nigerian party," stated Mr Ahidjo, who concluded: "We are always ready to cooperate in any initiative intended to shed light on this incident." REVOLUTION FETE ENDS: PRESIDENTS INTERVIEWED

AB021544 Brazzaville Domestic Service in French 1245 GMT 1 Aug 81

[Excerpts] The festivities marking the 13th anniversary of the Congolese Revolution ended last night. The closing event was the cocktail party held yesterday evening at the Palais Du Peuple by the Congolese presidential couple. The celebration of the 13th anniversary of the 31 July revolution was marked particularly by the inauguration yesterday morning of the Marien Ngouabi Mausoleum at the Supreme Sacrifice Square facing the Marien Ngouabi Museum.

Their excellencies Presidents Mobutu Sese Seko of Zaire, David Dacko of the CAR, Jose Eduardo Dos Santos of Angola and Goukouni Oueddei of Chad attended this ceremony whose solemn and brilliant success served to strengthen the esteem and respect that the Congolese have for their immortal leader, Major Marien Ngouabi after the inauguration of the Masoleum the chairman of the central committee of the Congolese Labor Party, Comrade Denis Sassou-Nguesso, flanked by his distinguished guests--the heads of state of Central Africa--and members of the National Political Leadership performed in the afternoon the closing ceremony of the national cultural festival at revolution stadium.

To crown the festivities the Congolese presidential couple held a cocktail party in the garden of the Palais Du Peuple, thus closing the ceremonies marking the 13th anniversary of the Congolese revolution. The distinguished guests of President Denis Sassou-Nguesso have already left the country. Presidents Mobutu and Eduardo dos Santos left last night at 1700 and 2000 respectively. Presidents David Dacko and Goukouni Queddei left his morning.

Before leaving Brazzaville, President Dacko gave his impressions about the festivities marking the 13th anniversary of the Congolese revolution to Adrien Honore Nguemie. He also refuted allegations that Congo and the CAR are at loggerheads.

[QUESTION] Mr President, during the celebration of the 13th anniversary of 31 July you had talks with your brother and friend, Col Denis Sassou-Nguesso. I think your discussions mainly concerned the future of our continent, Africa and particularly Central Africa. Mr President, can you tell us the topic of your discussions?

[ANSWER] On behalf of my delegation I would like first of all to thank President Sassou-Nguesso and the Congolese people for inviting us to attend the inauguration of the Marien Ngoubi Mausoleum which will keep alive the memory of Marien Ngouabi and immortalize him. We have learned a great deal from this inauguration.

We discussed the situation in Central Africa as well as the relations between our two countries. To tell you the truth there is no problem between us--neither between the two countries nor between their heads of state. [Passage indistinct] Tfhere are CAR citizens here in Brazzaville just as there are Congolese citizens in Bangui. [Passage indistinct] [End recording]

For his part, President Denis Sassou-Nguesso in reply to a question by one of our colleagues from Radio Bangui also reaffirmed the good relations between the CAR and Congo.

[begin recording] [Question indistinct]

[ANSWER] I think it would be an exaggeration to talk of problems between the CAR and Congo. As you know some events recently took place in Bangui which were variously interpreted [words indistinct]. President Dacko's presence in Brazzaville proves that there are really no problems.

The last head of state to leave Brazzaville, President Goukouni Oueddei of Chad told Adrien Honore Nguemie that he took the opportunity of his stay in Brazzaville to meet his central African counterparts with whom he discussed the situation in his country.

I took advantage of my visit to meet President Denis Sassou-Nguesso, the CAR president, President Mobutu Sese Seko and President Eduardo dos Santos to whom I explained the development of the situation in Chad and I also asked them to give moral, political and material support to our government and country to help it overcome its present difficulties. I have noted encouraging reactions from my brothers who promised their lasting support for the Chadian people.

BUDGET REVEALS AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTION HITS 30-YEAR LOW

London WEST AFRICA in English 20 Jul 81 pp 1672-73

[Text]

AS IS USUALLY the case with budgets, the most pertinent part of the Budget presented to The Gambia's House of Parliament by Mr. Saihou Sulayman Sabally, the Minister of Finance and Trade, last month came towards the end, when he announced tax increases to raise another D18.2m.

Mr. Sabally himself said: "Never before has government attempted to raise additional revenue of such magnitude in any one year. This development is dictated by need to generate adequate resources to meet the requirements of the state, thereby minimising the probable occasions of recourse to bank-lending. Given the economic problems facing most countries in the world today it becomes imperative for governments to tidy up their financial affairs and strenuously eschew deficit financing which would only serve to exacerbate an already difficult and delicate situation".

With this sort of philosophy behind The Gambia's Ministry of Finance, it is hardly surprising that earlier in his speech Mr. Sabally had been able to say: "Honourable Members will be happy to hear that the International Monetary Fund has expressed appreciation of our approach . . . and commended us for our composure in a difficult situation". That passage came just after the minister had announced approval by the IMF of a drawing of some D20m. under the IMF's Compensatory Financing Facility.

The minister also gave warning that "there will be an all-out drive to collect promptly all revenue due to the government and at the same time efforts at expenditure control will be intensified". He had already referred earlier to his speech to the matter of public spending.

"Perhaps it is appropriate," Mr. Sabally said, "to sound a note of warning to people in the Public Service, i.e., the Civil Service, public corporations and local government institutions. I want to make it abundantly clear that no carelessness or indifference in the management of public funds will be tolerated.

"The matter of excess or unauthorised expenditure will be dealt with firmly and promptly and appropriate sanctions will be applied.

"It is also necessary for spending officials to ensure that prices quoted on LPO's in respect of minor purchases, not requiring Tender Board approval, are reasonable. The evidence available seems to suggest that some spending officers are indifferent about prices and quality when purchases are made on behalf of government.

"This is a bad attitude that has to change. Negligence in this area will be treated as a serious default for which appropriate sanctions will be imposed.

"Last year, my predecessor made an appeal to all people of goodwill to help in the fight against 'white collar' crimes. I am pleased to say that there has been some favourable response. Indeed, some useful information, leading to the detection and apprehension of wrongdoers, has been volunteered from time to time.

"I would want the Gambian public at large to be more alive to its civic responsibility in the area of the detection and prevention of crime and I would make a plea for continued co-operation with the authorities and the law enforcement agencies in this important matter."

After announcing the increases in taxes Mr. Sabally then offered a prospect of some cheer, saying that because of the impact which his new taxes would have on price levels — he warned traders not to increase prices improperly and said that anybody caught profiteering would be liable to lose his trading licence — the government had decided "to review salaries and allowances. Hopefully, the necessary adjustments will be affected in the course of the next financial year."

Estimated revenue for the 1981-82 financial year is D100,569,000, estimated expenditure is D92,184,720 which predicates an estimated surplus of D8,384,280 for the year. As a result the Consolidated Revenue Fund is expected to be D13,045,171 by July 1, 1982.

Receipts by the Development Fund in 1981-82 are estimated to reach D68,156,000. This will come mainly from external loans and grants and a transfer of D2m. from the Consolidated Revenue Fund. Total development expenditure for the year is projected at D70,899,500.

Mr. Sabally had begun his budget speech by setting the economic scene in which The Gambia finds itself, and a very informative and lucid exposition it was. After sketching in the international background, he turned to the domestic position.

"Economic activity in The Gambia suffered a severe setback for the second consecutive year in 1980-81. Just as in 1979-80 agricultural production declined further and slumped to the lowest level in 30 years in the fiscal year just ended. The extreme low level of agricultural production was mainly due to the highly erratic rain fall during 1980 which had had a very adverse effect on the germination and growth of crops. The prevalence of insects and pests also caused considerable damage to cereal crops in several areas.

"The severe decline in groundnut production had an extremely adverse effect on the whole economy through a sharp decline in foreign exchange earnings during the year under review." Groundnut deliveries to The Gambia Produce Marketing Board this year were only 45,000 tonnes, which is 30 per cent below last year and nearly 60 per cent below the average of the past four years, which have not been good.

Per capita income

Gross Domestic Product for 1980-81, at current prices, is tentatively estimated at D399.3m. compared with D412.6m. for 1979-80, the figures on a per capita basis are D655.75 for 1980-81 compared with D695.70 in 1979-80. It may well have been the result of this fall in GDP that savings deposits rose by only 8 per cent from March, 1980, to March, 1981, although interest rates paid on such deposits went up by 2 per cent in January, 1980.

Visible external trade in 1980-81 was D331m. compared with D373.4m. the year before. Exports fell from D83.1m. to D52.8m., while imports came down from D290.4m. to D278.2m., unit value of imports was estimated to have gone up 10 per cent, the bill for petroleum products rose nearly 56 per cent. This produced a record visible trade gap of D225.4m. (compared with D207.3m. in 1979-80). Mr Sabally commented: "This calls for a more judicious use of our foreign exchange earnings, especially as regards certain classes of imports and I am to state that the necessary corrective measures have been set in motion."

Although the decline in economic activity generally, based on the disappointing outurn of the agricultural sector which is the mainspring of The Gambian economy, led to a fall in unemployment, the rate of inflation for the year was kept to single figures, unlike the rates obtaining in many other African countries and most industrialised countries; unfortunately a large part of the inflationary pressure came from increases in the "flood" and "fuels" sectors.

During the year some 21,000 hectares of rainfed and swamp rice were planted, yielding about 21,000 tonnes of paddy while irrigated rice did well, producing about 12,000 tonnes. Cotton was a disappointing crop, with 3,500 hectares planted but only about 2,500 hectares producing satisfactorily and the average yield dropping to 608kg. a hectare compared with 904kg. per hectare in the 1979-80 year. As, however, there are hopes that cotton will become a useful export crop in addition to groundnuts, the government intends to continue expansion and development plans.

Livestock sales in 1979-80 totalled D2.3m. of which D1.5m. were export earnings. The 1980-81 earnings are expected to be about D1.3m. The Livestock Marketing Board has signed an agreement to supply Nigeria with 5,000 breeding cattle over the next five years. Sales of skins and hides, a by-product of animal sales, brought in D370,000 while fishery fees earned nearly D450,000 and with various reorganisation schemes under way are expected to provide more in future.

RAWLINGS' CONTINUED POPULARITY ANALYZED

Accra THE LEGON OBSERVER in English 26 Jun-9 Jul 81 pp 166, 167

[Article by Kwame Karikari]

[Excerpts]

"A lot of people who don't like June 4 are going to lose sleep tonight," said Mr. Tsatsu Tsikata, speaking on June 5 at a symposium-turned-rally at the Accra Community Centre marking the second anniversary of the June 4 soldiers' uprising from whose shocks some may not yet have recovered, the thought of which still makes some tremble and fret, and whose mass liberatory promise still draws thousands to Jerry J. Rawlings, its leader and its symbol. And many must have been those who had nightmares that night as, well over an hour and a half after the event, a crowd of over 300 from the thousands present at the rally could still be heard singing and chanting, and be seen marching from the High Street, then along the Kwame Nkrumah Avenue, to the Circle where they ended. Nothing violent, and no accident occured. Tsatsu Tsikata — reportedly a last-minute stand-in for Rev. Father Damoah, a priest whose temporal concerns fittingly qualify him as Ghana's "liberation theologian", spoke after Mr. K. B. Asante of the Social Democratic Party, and Mr. B. D. D. Asamoah a former top civil servant "forced to retire for his stance against corruption."

Seeing Nothing and Hearing Nothing

They all spoke, a prelude to the man for whom some 6-9,000 had waited hours before schedule, and packed the hall, the roofs, the courtyard and the front lawns of the Community Centre: Jerry J. Rawlings. The crowd this year was thinner than at last year's anniversary. But that is no indication that Rawlings' popularity had waned, or the memory of June 4 lost. Far from it. The day before, virtually the whole of adult Koforidua had gathered to hear Rawlings. The event fizzled out. Authorities of the Eastern Regional capital would not make Rawlings speak: the organizers of the event allegedly had no permit. Yet, slamming the gates on Rawlings' face, believing that will stop people from identifying with what he stands for, amounts precisely to seeing nothing,, hearing nothing, and saying nothing of the actual feelings and yearnings of the millions of the faceless, nameless masses. For, this man says nothing fundamentally new — all he does is articulate and express boldly, critically and acutely exactly what the millions believe, say and feel everyday.

So, when amid some ten minutes of excitement heralding the youthful hero, Rawlings mounted the make-shift platform atop a Bedford bus, he was there not so much to "incite", as to simply reflect for the masses, mirror for them, what they themselves encounter and know from their daily experiences, and what most mainstream politicians dismiss, ignore, or simply don't see. It is this unmistakably microscopic detailing of the "ordinary man's" real life conditions that endears him to the masses, and that partly threatens those who would rather believe that without a "leader", "an instigator", the masses would lose awareness of their daily plight. This is what distances Rawlings from anything resembling a demagogue. It is the complete absence of "revolutionary rhetoric" and "sloganeering" from his lucid, down-to-earth public speeches that makes him convincing. For, he minces no words, mumbles no facts and confuses no audience — even if he sometimes lacks the high-falutin theoretical abstractions so appealing to, say, a Legon university audience. If Rawlings was loved by all, he would be irrelevant. He has been, and still is, in the eye of the storm of the class struggles in Ghana since May 15, 1979.

Restating Well-Known Facts

Rawlings, for those who have carefully followed and studied his public speeches, is no rabble rouser. That and the fact that he is not an ambitious man who intends to capitalize on his genuine popularity to cause havoc for his successor regime, must be a blessing for those who crave stability most. What worries him is that the fundamental basis of ensuring stability and the workability of a democratic constitution is not being strengthened.

Rawlings, like every popular hero of the masses, stands to be vilified. Quite a number of people — from all classes — would wish that he headed a party for 1983. And feeding on this genuine wish, and in a manner resembling the findings of a 1978 US Congressional Committee hearing that the intelligence community fed false (mis)information into both Third World and Western media, some private papers had unleashed a campaign that Rawlings would form and lead a party. That, according to Rawlings, was a trick to get people to register to avert a near spontaneous boycott of the registration exercise. And he denied flatly that he would lead or form a party for 1983. "Don't get tricked," he said. For, "the media have been used to invent and spread lie upop lie — there are newspapers which fill their pages with nothing else." It is, he said, because of the distortion of his statements, by much of the media, why he repeated at the June 5 rally, President John F. Kennedy's statement he had read a day earlier at the press conference, significant words to the wise, that: "Those who make a peaceful revolution impossible, make a violent revolution inevitable." Rawlings wasn't threatening "bloodsheds", "firing squads" or "fires next time". His whole rally was a restatement of facts well known, and actully lived, by the countless masses of Ghana.

MATERIAL INCENTIVES SEEN NEEDED TO IMPROVE ECONOMY

Accra THE LEGON OBSERVER in English 26 Jun-9 Jul 81 pp 145, 146

[Editorial: "Material Incentives and the Economy"]

[Text]

'The lesson of history is that society does not learn from the lessons of history'. In the Limann administration's choice of economic policies, how long must this cynical view continue to find justification ? The response of the present government to our numerous economic problems has been to exhort us to work hard, to trade less and to produce more. As in the recent past, under the military, moral exhortation rather than the provision of economic incentives forms the cornerstone of economic policies.

The fostering of pro-social behaviour is a laudable goal, but we must not be starry-eyed about its limitations in the economic sphere. To harp on socially-oriented economic behaviour and expect sustainable results is to fly in the face of all economic history. The self-proclaimed socialist states — Hungary, Czechoslovakia, East Germany, China and, most recently, Poland — have, one after the other, instituted their various economic reform movements. These countries have realized that if increased production is not to be an ever receding goal, then, after a degree, moral incentives must give way to material incentives.

The basic problem of the Ghanaian economy, as various correspondents have emphasised for some time now in the columns of the Legon Observer, is that of production. The history of Ghana as well as of other countries demonstrates that the best approach to the solution of the production problem is to assign a major role for economic incentives. Such incentives need to be tempered and leavened with social and economic regulations and institutional arrangements that will, at the same time, help to meet important social goals, such as social equity and the gradual satisfaction of the most important basic needs of all citizens.

Surely, the Limann administration is not ignorant of this basic fact. But does the administration have an economic vision for Ghana? Or does it truly believe the fiction that Ghana's economic problems are entirely the result of international economic trends? Or does it simply lack the courage to initiate the economic reforms that are so clearly overdue? If it is fear that is inhibiting the administration, we of the Legon Observer would like to ask who it is afraid of? Who, in our society, is afraid of an economic reform movement that will actually get the economy moving and spur the production process?

Certainly not consumers: for it would ultimately bring prices down. Not producers: for it would mean that production will become profitable once more. Not farmers: for their return too will increase. Not exporters; for their rewards too will rise. Not workers: for greater production will increase employment and wages. Who, then, is afraid? Only the traders, smugglers and recipients of import licenses could possibly fear such a reform since they are the only beneficiaries of the present economic order. If this is so, are we right in presuming that the Limann government is an administration that is committed only to protecting the interests of these parasitic groups? However powerful these groups may be, the President surely can count on the full support of the people of Ghana in an attempt to initiate an economic reform movement that can get the economy moving, and moving quickly. This is what the people have been yearning for in the past decade or so.

What then should the Limann government do to gear incentives to production? In a variety of ways, the returns to all forms of production must be increased to outstrip the returns to all forms of trading. However, that is only a necessary step: it is not sufficient. The second major economic problem faced by Ghana is the extreme shortage of foreign exchange. Ways must be found to increase the availability of foreign exchange. Since the supply of foreign exchange can, ultimately, only be increased by increasing exports, all exports (notably cocoa) must be made more profitable for producers. The persistence of smuggling is testimony to the potential for increasing the supply of foreign exchange to the government, not to mention the contribution that could come from increased production if exports were to be made more profitable for cocoa farmers. If policies along the lines suggested below are adopted to increase exports then recourse to foreign loans in the short-run is not only possible but highly advisable. As surely as charity must begin at home, foreign investors, despite their paltry credits and promises, decide on a wait-and-see attitude until they have evidence that we have a clear and viable economic strategy and a sense of political direction. If we are fooled by their civility, and the Limann administration also decides to wait to see the next move of foreign investors, then, as a people we are destined to wait interminably.

Thirdly, and finally, to encourage the growth of production, a way must be found to increase the rewards for hard work and discipline. While decreasing the profitability of trade and imports and redirecting efforts towards production and exports, one must be keenly aware of the existence of a tremendous problem of morale among wage and salary earners in our society. Through a decade of unimaginably high rates of inflation, while traders, importers and all manner of middlemen have made huge unwarranted fortunes over and over again, the purchasing power of wage and salary earners has fallen drastically. Production can take off if the problem of apathy is tackled through material incentives. It is only in this way that the purchasing power of this social group will be restored; and equity demands that this be done, and done quickly.

If the Limann administration is to get the economy moving it should re-orient incentives towards production. This can be done by rendering material incentives in production, in exporting, and rewards for hard work greater than the returns to trading, importing and indiscipline. At the same time important social objectives must be met. How all this can actually be done is a technical issue which the government's technicians can easily determine. Certainly, the recent economic history of the more successful small, export-oriented developing countries such as Korea, Colombia and Malaysia is instructive.

We of the Legon Observer would like the President to know in no uncertain terms that if he wants to get the economy moving, and moving now, then, he has to institute a programme aimed at increasing production through greater material incentives along the lines suggested above. Ghanaians will support such a programme if they have good reasons to believe that the beneficiaries will be consumers, producers, farmers, exporters and workers, and the losers will be those who have made fortunes over the past decade.

NEW PARTY--National Progressive Party (NPP) or National Unity Party (NUP) may be the name of the party to come out of the merger of the five minority parties. The symbol may be a hoe and a cutlass crossed. The proposed names and the symbol are to be approved at a meeting of the leaders next week. Alhaji Dr Abubakar Al-Hassan, chairman of the working committee set up to draw up a constitution and manifesto and to choose the colour, and symbol for the new party, disclosed this to the parliamentary press in Accra yesterday. Dr Al-Hassan hoped it would be ready before the weekend. The constitution, he said, was virtually ready for presentation to the leaders next Thursday. Meanwhile, each of the parties had been asked to nominate three candidates out of whom the leader would be chosen by the college. One of the nominees from each party would be a person who did not contest the 1979 Presidential Elections. [Excerpts] [Accra GHANAIAN TIMES in English 16 Jul 81 p 3]

PRIVATE INDUSTRIALIST INAUGURATES BAKERY, CONSTRUCTION COMPANY

Bissau NO PINTCHA in Portuguese 24 Jun 81 p 3

[Excerpts] The "African Bakery" belonging to Mateus Sanha was inaugurated last Friday in the presence of Comrade Joao Bernardo Vieira (Nino), president of the Council of the Revolution as guest of honor. This industrial unit is equipped with brand new Italian machines costing 4,401,715 pesos. The firm spent 4,228,000 pesos to remodel the installation. It has two ovens that can produce 450 kilos of bread per hour and uses gasoil or wood. The owner of the bakery announced that he is already studying the prospects for the future production of pasta and the establishment of a cafe.

Mateus Sanha said that "we believe that these initiatives will serve the interests of the people. We need the support of the authorities to import raw materials so as to avoid the paralyzation of the installation."

Minister of Commerce, Fisheries and Artisans Joseph Turpin, also present at the ceremony, stated: "The Ministry of Commerce, guided by the decisions that the government will soon adopt the field of trade, will do everything in its power to help businessmen to improve their work for the benefit of the Guinean nation."

Simultaneously with the inauguration of the African Bakery, the new administrative offices of the African Construction Company were also inaugurated in the same building. This civil construction company, also belonging to industrialist Mateus Sanha, was estabished in 1979 and had originally met with a number of difficulties because of a lack of office facilities and construction materials on the national market.

The availability of construction materials should progressively improve. During a recent meeting between the Ministry of Public Works and national contractors, this state organism promised to guarantee the importation of such materials.

MATTHEWS REFLECTS ON OAU SUMMIT MEETING

Monrovia NEW LIBERIAN in English 3 Jul 81 p 2

[Text]

Liberian Foreign Minister G. Baccus Matthews, who made his debut on the OAU's stage of action at the 17th. OAU summit in Sierra Leone last year, returned from Nairobi recently where he was part of the 20-man Liberian delegation to the 18th OAU summit of Heads of State and governments.

This year summit was rather interesting. There was the Nigerian-Camerounian border issue which led to the Nigerian President's absence from the summit after the issue was not listed for discussion; the serious pre-summit, behind - the - scene moves to debar Tripoli from hosting next year OAU; the charter on human rights in Africa; the western Saharan conflict, and the Southern African Liberation struggle.

Home - ward bound, and aboard the Air Liberia 737 jet Aircraft while in transit at Kaduna International Airport, nothern Nigeria, Minister Matthews discussed with New Liberian Executive Editor about the 18th OAU Summit.

HIGHLIGHTS

Minister Matthews pointed to Liberia's representation, "Doe's maiden attendance", as one of the main highlights of concern to Liberia, especially that he could deliver what constitutes a policy paper outlining both the inevitability of change in Liberia and the reflection of continuity as regards Liberia's policy on major issues of concern to Africa - Namibia, South Africa, Chad and the Western Sahara.

THE OAU's GOOD OFFICES COMMISSION responsible for resolving the conflict between Ethiopia and Somalia, among others, is to study the issue and report before the next ordinary session of council of Ministers in Addis Ababa next February.

For many years Liberia has served on the commission, and played a significantly contributive role toward the settlements of conflicts. The Liberian Foreign Minister said that during the OAU GOOD OFFICES COMMISSION meeting in Lagos, Nigeria last year, Liberia was one of the major contenders for a resolution which would ensure that there can be some speedy avenue toward resolving the problems between Ethiopia and Somalia.

However, he recalled with regrets, that the Somalis were not happy with the resolution, and they believed that Liberia had played a role in propagandizing a resolution which was not in their interest."Ofcourse, we were engaged in an exercise of objectivety," Minister Matthews said, pointing out that all the issues from both sides were considered, and the resolution reflected the interest of the OAU and African Continent.

Commenting on Liberia's current stature in African Affairs as compared to the past, the Minister gave assurance that Liberia's role as a mediator and conciliator is still functional On the international scene, Liberia plays a role that eminates from the LIBERIAN EXPERIENCE. "In meetings we tend to be very good operatives in corridors," Matthews said. Of late, Liberia has tried to play a role that will be acceptable, while restricting itself in most instances towards trying to develop a concensus on an issue long before it comes on the floor.

This, the Minister said, is the role in which Liberia has been most effective recently, and thereby retaining the confidence of a good number of those who have seen Liberia play this role in the past.

WESTERN SAHARA

Minister Matthews sees Mo occo's commitment toward holding a referendum in the Western Sahara as a major step toward resolving the conflict in that area. Interestingly, King Hassan who has been absent from OAU summits for quite some time attended the Nairobi summit, during which his country conceeded to the OAU's position that the people of the Western Sahara should determine their own destiny. The options now open to them are that they either choose to become independent or to align themselves in a confederation with Morocco, and become an integral part of that country.

LIBYA: O A U '82

Liberia was among the many who formed the silent majority that led to Libya's victory in the headed debate spear - headed by Ghana and Egypt against Tripoli being the next venue of the OAU. "We reserved our opinions", Minister Matthews said. He considers the hosting by Libya of the OAU summit as "a good thing for the organization and for Africa in general."

The Minister is convinced that the Libyans are now constrained to engage in significant fence mending "if indeed they wish to have a number of Heads of State to attend the Tripoli summit.

Unlike opinion expressed by the Sudan to the effect that the Tripoli Summit will be a "summit of ambassadors", the Liberian Foreign Minister shares the view that the responsibility for hosting the OAU will impose much upon Col.Gadaffi's relationship with sister African states.

"For Gadaffi to be an effective current Chairman,the accusations made against him,if they are true, will have to be resolved,and or clarified; and if many of the things we have heard of Gadaffi and Libyan policies are true, Gadaffi will be constrained to re-examine his conduct if he indeed wishes to be effective," Matthews declared.

He recalls that the Arab League have not had a meeting in Libya for quite some time,because it has not been disposed toward inviting Egypt,on matter which Minister Matthews sees as one of the issues militating against the OAU going to Libya. He is however optimistic that Libya "will take some steps towards reconciling their problem with Cairo."

Having been foreign Minister for a year and three months, Mr. Matthews sums up his views of the OAU: "Interestingly, it is the only political organization on the continental level, encompassing all the peoples of the continent of Africa. The African man was the first

TIPOTELI SPEAKS ON RELATIONS WITH JAPAN

Monrovia NEW LIBERIAN in English 16 Jul 81 pp 4-5

[Text]

YOUR EXCELLENCY:

We are indeed very happy to welcome you to the Ministry of Planning and Economic Affairs. We remain confident your experience in Liberia will be meaningful Present here with me to meet with you are members of the Senior Staff of this Ministry.

Among the industrialized countries of the world, Japan is the only country which occupies the enviable position of holding canoe and shore in terms of North-South relations. Japan is a highly industrialized country, yet she has a socio-cultural situation which obtains widely within the Third World. Perhaps, it is this socio-cultural factor, more than any other factor, that lays the basis for the strengthening of economic ties between Japan and the Third World, of which Liberia is a part.

We note with interest that the outlook for the Japanese economy reflects a course of steady and stable growth as is indicated in the estimated real growth rate of 5.3% for fiscal year 1981. It is in fact useful to observe the four-pointed approach being used to foster such growth: Firstly,economic policy for 1981 is directed toward a steady expansion of domestic demand and assuring steady employment. Domestic consumer spending is expected to rise by 9.9% over the previous year, while private equipment investment is expected to gain 10.7% rise and housing investment 8.5%. Government spending is expected to go up by some 2.6% while mining and industrial production will attain some 5.3% rise. The increase in gainfully employed workers is expected to be about 1.0% while the number of unemployed may drop slightly below the 1980 level.Secondly, emphasis is being placed on stabilizing prices. As a result of an expected decline in external factors that have pushed up wholesale prices in the past, the increase in wholesale prices is expected to slow down, dropping by about 4.1%. Japanese authorities report that prices are stabilizing as a result of which their increase may be around 5.5%. Thirdly, Japan is securing stable sources of energy and efforts are being stepped up to lessen the dependence of the economy on oil. Finally, Japan is endeavoring to fulfil its responsibilities in a manner commensurate with its position in the international community.

We cannot go on looking at Japan's economy without mentioning here its overseas' loans and investments. Japan's overseas economic cooperation fund-pledge amounted to a record $2.9 billion for overseas loans and investment during fiscal year 1980, a 70% increase over fiscal year 1979.

Direct credits to foreign government accounted for $2.8 billion and investments in private projects abroad accounted for $80 million.

At the United Nations sponsored International Conference on Assistance to Refugees in Africa held in Geneva, it is remarkable to note that Japan pledged $20 million in aid to African refugees during the current fiscal year, on top of its ordinary contributions to international bodies, including the office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. This includes $5 million to the African Refugee Relief Programme under the United Nations Organization and $15 million in food assistance through the World Food Programme.

In terms of loans that directly relate to Africa, it is pleasing to note that a Japanese consortium of 12 banks, including the Long-term Credit Bank of Japan and 8 life insurance companies, signed a contract in Tokyo with the African Development Bank to extend two loans totalling $75 million.

While we have observed with interest the steady and stable growth of the Japanese economy, it is only fair that we make mention of some of the major structural problems our own economy faces and strategies adopted by the Liberian Government with the view to encouraging the wider participation of Liberians and meaningful investments by foreigners in developing the Liberian economy.

Our analysis of the Liberian economy upon the commencement of the People's Redemption Council Government indicates that the Government inherited a four-pointed set of structural problems:

1. The downward price spiral in the international iron ore market and the exacerbation of the iron ore situation by the energy crisis;
2. The inability of the previous Government to give effective priority to agricultural development to compensate for the fall in the relative share of the iron ore sector in gross domestic income;

3. The highly inefficient management of the public sector; and
4. The lack of participation of the masses of the people in economic decision-making.

Against the background of a negative growth rate, our New Government found itself in the midst of chronic underdevelopment which is in effect the manifestation of the structural problems our economy continues to face. While our problems are indeed grave, they are in no way insurmountable. Therefore, our Government has adopted a set of strategies which are consistent with making some modest contribution to minimizing the structural problems over the medium-term. It is most important that we get our economy growing again while maintaining existing employment rates. Top priority is being given to integrated rural development with emphasis on food production. Those foreign investments with a high domestic resource utilization content are being encouraged. Oil exploration and alternative energy search activities figure prominently in the economy. The public sector is being reviewed with the view to making its management efficient. Plans are underway to concretize to the participation of the masses of our people in economic decision-making.

Cooperation between Liberia and Japan dates from November 1971 when a Japanese Government's Economic Mission touring Africa visited Liberia to hold discussions for the purpose of promoting economic relations and friendly ties between Liberia and Japan. In 1973, Liberia and Japan decided to exchange diplomats at Ambassadorial level as an effective means of promoting cooperation between our two countries.

During November 1974, a team of six Japanese officials which included a survey mission from the Japanese Ministry of International Trade and Industry, and the Japan International Cooperation Agency (JICA) visited Liberia to discuss possibilities of technical and economic cooperation between Japan and Liberia in the fields of Industry, Mining and Power. Consequently, the Government of Japan has been giving two types of assistance, namely, technical and economic assistance to the Government of Liberia. On the technical assistance side, the Government of Japan has provided grants for feasibility studies and surveys, experts, training, fellowships and equipment and on the capital side the Government of Japan has provided loans for investment to finance public development projects whose viability have been predetermined by appropriate feasibility studies.

The Japanese assistance to Liberia, although quite recent, already spans several sectors of our economy.

The following are the programs and projects receiving technical assistance on a grant basis_

1. The Japan Overseas Technical Cooperation Agency has extended since 1975 invitations to the Government of Liberia to participate in several technical training seminars in Japan. Up to this year, Liberians have been successfully trained in the following areas:
   - Telecommunications
   - Finance and Taxation
   - Port Management and Aid to Navigation
   - Agriculture including post harvest technology, vegetable growing, animal husbandry and irrigation;
   - Woodwork Technology.
2. Financing of the construction of a Maternity Hospital on a totally grant basis.
3. Agricultural equipment supplied for use in the Gbedin Integrated Rice Project which has the following components - irrigation, seed multiplication project, rice cultivation etc. The value of agricultural machinery is 40 million Yen equivalent to US $200,000. A team of JICA officials, is expected in Liberia on the 25th of July to discuss with Ministry of Agriculture officials the final details before implementation of the project.
4. Technical assistance and equipment to the Monrovia Vocational Training Institute which is supervised by the National Youth and Sports Commission.
5. The Government of Japan has officially confirmed the application of Government for a supply of 40 Japanese Volunteer teachers to Liberia to teach mathematics, science and agriculture in specified rural schools throughout the country. The volunteers are expected to arrive early February.

In addition, the Government of Liberia has submitted the following requests to the Government of Japan:

1. Request for Agricultura Machinery and Equipment under the Kennedy Round II (KR 2) Grant Fund under which the Government of Japan provides agricultural equipment and other machinery to boost agricultural production. The items requested were, rice mills and agricultural machinery.
2. Request from Government for the supply of 40,000 metric tons of rice on a commodity grant scheme.

3. Ministry of Health has requested for several medical personnel in related fields, to teach in medical school and work in hospitals throughout the country.
4. Request for twenty postal vans of different specifications for use by the Ministry of Postal Affairs for improving the efficiency of the Ministry.
5. Request for soft loan to finance telecommunications developmental expansion project submitted by the Managing Director of Liberia Telecommunications Co-operation to the Ministry of Planning and Economic Affairs for onward transmission to the Embassy of Japan.

The Government of Liberia had expressed interest in receiving development loan to finance the construction of infrastructural facilities for the exploitation of the Wologisi Mines. The three projects related to the development of the Wologisi Mines are as follows:

(a) Construction of a monrovia Port Expansion
(b) Construction of the Boololu-Belleh-Yellah Kolahun Road
(c) Construction of a Wologisi town site

Against the background of lack of progress being made to get Japanses investors to effectively commit themselves to the Wologisi Mining Venture, the Government of Liberia expresses the hope that the Government of Japan will spare no efforts in using its good offices to encourage the relevant Japanese investors to support the Wologisi Mining Project.

Your Excellency, we trust that your brief visit with us here at the Ministry of Planning and Economic Affairs will provide you with relevant information which you can utilize effectively in the fostering of efficient economic co-operation between Japan and Liberia.

PLANNING MINISTER CALLS FOR CLOSER TIES WITH NIGERIA

Monrovia NEW LIBERIAN in English 13 Jul 81 pp 1, 6

[Text]

The need for Liberia to advance economic and technical cooperation among African countries was stressed last Friday by the Planning Minister, Dr. Togba Nah-Tipoteh.

He said in the midst of Liberia's immense financial difficulties and its conventional tendency to look towards the industrialized countries, government must not forget about the great importance of such a cooperation.

Minister Tipoteh made the observation when he discussed with the Nigerian Ambassador to Liberia, Edward Martins, measures that could reactivate the forstering of economic and technical cooperation between the two countries.

He said studies show that benefits from such cooperation could be considerable, besides the clear social and cultural links they develop.

In the past, draft agreements on economic, scientific, technical and trade had been exchanged between the governments of Liberia and Nigeria.

Minister Tipoteh and Ambassador Martins agreed that concrete steps be taken to review and conclude the agreements which are aimed at improving trade, technical and economic cooperation between the two countries.

Dr. Tipoteh underscored the importance for Nigeria and Liberia to expand economic activities in all areas, including agriculture, industry and trade.

He informed Ambassador Martins that the PRC Government places more emphasis on bilateral ties unlike government of the past.

Dr. Tipoteh spoke of the agreement between Nigeria and Lamco to purchase over $125 million worth of iron ore from Liberia, and said it was a positive sign of cooperation between the two countries.

He later disclosed that government was taking positive measures to launch its Four-Year Development Plan shortly, adding that efforts were being made to ensure that the Liberian plan directly relates to the Lagos Plan of Action, which is the African Plan for Development through collective self-reliance.

For his part, Ambassador Martins said through such economic ties, the Nigerian Government would be willing to explore the possibility of selling crude oil to Liberia.

RUSSIANS APPEAR INEPT IN LIBERIAN DEALINGS

London WEST AFRICA in English 13 Jul 81 pp 1586-1587

[Article by David Williams: "White Ties and Red Faces"]

[Text]

TO SOVIET officials Liberia has long seemed a little anomalous. Formerly the only independent West African state, it was devoted to capitalism; now revolutionary, at the top at least it is pro-American.

The Soviet regime's original direct contact with West Africa's first republic was in 1956, when Mr. Volkov, President of the Supreme Soviet, was sent to represent the USSR at President Tubman's fourth inauguration, the first to which the Liberians invited the whole world. He was accompanied by an interpreter, almost as tall as Mr. Volkov, a huge and genial man; by a short English-speaking Foreign Ministry man, Mr. Barzakine, who had served in Washington; and by a camera team.

The Russians seemed to be very ignorant both about West Africa and about Liberian customs. I was assured that they had been told about the Liberian rule that white ties and tails were obligatory at some functions, such as the inauguration itself, and morning tail coats at others. But they turned up at the Inauguration conspicuous in dark lounge suits.

At the Inauguration Ball that evening, however, they were white-tied and tailed. Rumour had it that they had been persuaded on the previous day that their hosts would feel offended at their sartorial independence. So they had hastily sent their special aircraft to London. The pilot, with the assistance of their London Embassy, and armed with their measurements, was to fetch suitable apparel from the inexhaustible stocks of Moss Brothers. The aircraft also brought back generous supplies of caviare and vodka, although Liberian hospitality was lavish enough.

What really puzzled the Russians, however, was the presence in Monrovia of the Ghanaian (still Gold Coast) delegation, re 'endent in Kente, led by the impressive Mr. Kojo Botsio. Deceived, as ever, by their own propaganda, Moscow officials, who after his 1951 election victory had denounced Kwame Nkrumah as a stooge of imperialism, had paid no attention to the coming independence of Ghana since, presumably, they reasoned that the British, like themselves, would never really give up a colony. Mr. Botsio, Mr. Edusei and the other Ghanaians in Monrovia, however, bore little resemblance to downtrodden colonials. They convinced the Russians that their country would indeed achieve genuine independence in the following year. Subsequently Mr. Barzakine, to my astonishment, asked me to suggest to him a reading list for West Africa; "we do not seem," he said, "to be very well-briefed on this part of the world."

Hysteria in US newspapers

Although the hysteria in certain American newspapers about this first official Soviet mission to West Africa was ludicrous, it was even taken up by some London newspapers, including the late, and unlamented, Daily Sketch. Mr. Volkov told me that he had no time to read such rubbish. But the Russians, entirely legitimately, had decided that it was time that they had a "permanent presence" in West Africa; and since they could not imagine the possibility of independence for any colony (in West Africa or anywhere else), they decided that Liberia, the sole independent state in the area, was the only possible place to establish themselves.

It was, incidentally, at this time that the Belgians, surprisingly, invited an official Soviet mission to the then Belgian Congo — but independence for that territory was not contemplated.

What the Russians made of Mr. Tubman's generous awards of Liberian decorations to foreign millionaires during the inauguration I did not discover; but clearly, as Lenin had long before advised, they were ready to make the best of what was available abroad.

So it was that Mr. Volkov, at a party in the seafront mansion of Mr. Henry Ford Cooper (the Liberian Ambassador in London) which the Russians had rented for their visit — a party for which they had hired the Liberian Frontier Force band under its Italian bandmaster — in a speech welcoming the President, both invited a Liberian parliamentary delegation to visit the Soviet Union and suggested the possibility of a Soviet Embassy in Monrovia. "That," murmured President Tubman to me as I stood next to him, "is one embassy that will never be opened." Nor, in his lifetime, was it.

His administration continued to be deeply hostile to Communism, to prevent students going to Communist countries, and to see Communist influence in any expression of dissent. Nor was Mr. Tubman's attitude dictated by the Americans. He genuinely believed Communism to be evil, although he was prepared to have formal relations with some Communist states. He was, however, a skilled diplomat, and was able to establish cordial relations with Sékou Touré, in spite of Guinea's Eastern European and Chinese connections: he must have enjoyed Sékou Touré's expulsion of the Soviet Ambassador. He certainly regarded Nkrumah's Pan-Africanism as more menacing than Sékou Touré's brand of socialism.

After President Tubman's death in 1971 his successor, Mr. Tolbert, regularised relations with Moscow, visited the USSR and allowed a modest Soviet embassy to be opened in Monrovia. Abandoning Liberia's long-established connection with Taiwan he eventually established relations with Peking, which he visited, and established cordial relations with, for example, Rumania.

The Russians, in any case, profiting from the revised view of West Africa that the contact with the Ghanaians in Monrovia had given them during the inauguration, soon lost interest in Liberia and concentrated on Ghana. Their relations with Dr. Nkrumah were often prickly, but Ghana at least used the language of socialism instead of that of the apostles of the free market. They were later content for their man in Sierra Leone to represent them in Monrovia.

The first one was a pleasant character, with whom I once had a friendly argument in which I tried to persuade him, utterly incredulous though he was, that there were influential people in Liberia to the right of President Tubman, of whose efforts to bring hinterland people into the main stream of politics they disapproved.

The first resident Soviet Ambassador in Monrovia was a mild, elderly, man at the end of his diplomatic career. He told me over a leisurely lunch in his Monrovia residence that his career had taken him to Communist countries and to India. So he was delighted to have, at last, this opportunity of studying at first hand the operation of capitalism, of which he had heard so much, in its purest, if that is the right word, form. He doubted if the Soviet Union would be very active in Liberia, but they were anxious to do anything that the Liberians might ask them to do, I remain convinced that he spoke the truth.

Slowly, however, as is the custom of Soviet embassies, this one began to expand, although there had been no corresponding increase in trade or in Soviet assistance to Liberia. Its size in the end was totally out of line with the strength of Liberia's Moscow embassy.

SHIPPING AGENCY IS FINED OVER SOVIET SHIP INCIDENT

Monrovia NEW LIBERIAN in English 3 Jul 81 p 1

[Article by Napoleon A. Teage]

[Text] A Monrovia based shipping agency, SCANSHIP, has been fined $25,000 by the National Port Authority, for allowing the Soviet cargo vessel, IVAN BELOSTOSKIY, which it represents here, to violate a number of port regulations when it docked at the Freeport June 18.

According to Captain Ernest B. Jones, Jr., NPA Deputy Managing Director for Operation, the ship which was ordered detained by government on June 22 for illegally attempting to load three boxes contained sophisticated communication equipment directly into a waiting Embassy car at the Freeport after it had berthed there on June 18, did violate three of the port's regulations.

He said the crew of the vessel had discharged the three boxes and attempted loading them directly into the car, "but when their attempt was forestalled, due to the intervention of dock workers, the boxes were re-loaded into the vessel without a re-loading manifest." This, Jones said, was the first violation.

He explained that the crew of the BELOSTOSKIY had also failed to channel the cargo (boxes) through the port billing superintendents before attempting to load it directly into the Embassy vehicle that had gone to the port after normal working hours for the boxes.

The second violation, according to Capt Jones, was when the crew of the vessel removed the three boxes containing the communication devices from the pier in the absence of a port stevedore. This violation, he pointed out, was "smuggling of cargo" and is against the port's regulation.

The third offense, Jones told the NEW LIBERIAN Tuesday, was the fact that the Russian vessel crew, 35 in all, had failed to present a stowage plan and hatch list to port officers stating the point of origination of the cargo.

He said it was rare to unload cargo at any port without a manifest stating the port of origination of the cargo and its contents.

Another rare action of the BELOSTOSKIY's crew members, Jones emphasized, was the assault done to a number of port superintendents who had insisted that the cargo go through all necessary port procedures before being allowed to leave the port for its destination.

As a result of the assault, Jones explained, warehouse superintendents have requested guarantee from NPA management, which in turn has assured them of protection against the re-occurrence of such incidents.

Already, Capt Jones said, a series of communications have been going on between NPA, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and shipping agencies regarding the rigid enforcement of port regulations.

He explained that the Foreign Ministry has also been informed that effective immediately, all diplomatic goods would have to be channeled through that Ministry whenever they arrived at the Freeport.

"Diplomats will not be allowed on the pier anymore," Jones said, explaining that this measure will ensure against the re-occurrence of the Soviet incident recently, when the ship's crew jumped into a scuffle with the port workers over "diplomatic" cargo.

CANADIAN COWS EXPECTED TO BOOST DAIRY INDUSTRY

Blantyre MALAWI NEWS in English 11-17 Jul 81 p 1

[Text]

A K11-MILLION project aimed at establishing a self-sufficient dairy industry in Malaŵi is expected to be launched in the near future.

The project, financed mainly by Canada, seeks to establish herds of high-yield dairy cattle that will produce sufficient milk for local consumption and allow other dairy products to be made.

Production of butter, cheese and yoghurt is envisaged, while condensed and powdered milk are also distinct possibilities once the project is fully underway, according to a Malaŵi News Agency report.

The Malaŵi-Canada Dairy Cattle Development Project is being financed by a Canadian grant of about K9.1 million. The Malaŵi Government is contributing K2.2 million.

Under the project, Canada will provide 500 Holstein dairy cattle whose progeny will be distributed to progressive farmers throughout the country, either as pure-bred or cross-bred cattle.

Veterinary Department officials quoted by Mana say the first 250 cows are expected to arrive in Malaŵi sometime in September.

The report says the cows will be flown to Malaŵi in a giant DC8 transport aircraft — and the flight has to await completion of the new Kamuzu International Airport at Lilongwe as it cannot land at Chileka.

The cows will come in as calves aged between four and nine months and it is hoped that the older calves will themselves start calving by the end of 1983.

The cows are expected to start yielding milk in quantity by 1984. Pure bred Canadian Holstein cows yield on average 18 to 23 litres of milk a day. By contrast, the average Malaŵian Zebu cow yields about 2.25 litres a day.

The cows will be based at two farms being developed under the project. One is at Chinsapo, in Lilongwe, to supply the Capital Dairy. The other is at Ndata, south of Mikolongwe in Thyolo District, to supply the new Blantyre dairy.

A third farm is planned for breeding purposes.

FISH YIELD INCREASE--Mangochi, Tuesday--Fish yields have increased from 13,000 tons to 70,000 tons a year during the past 17 years, a senior official from the Ministry of Forestry and Natural Resources said here yesterday when he officially opened a ten-day seminar on fish processing and quality control. The seminar which is being attended by 10 inspectors is being held at Mphwepwe Fisheries Training Centre. The official attributed this dramatic change in fish yields to the MDC-owned Maldeco Fisheries which, he said, is itself "the result of several years of Government active research and planning through the Department of Fisheries." The official stated that because of the increase in tonnage which leaves the country with some surplus for export to neighbouring countries, the department "has found it necessary to carry out research in the processing and preservation of fish." He stated that because the fish which crossed the borders earned the country the much needed foreign exchange, the quality of such fish was therefore of great concern to the Government. The official added that the proper fish preservation was also important in keeping fish in use at home because, he said, "We cannot expect our lakes and rivers to produce more than nature allowed to support."--MANA [Text] [Blantyre DAILY TIMES in English 15 Jul 81 p 4]

MITTERRAND REPROACHED FOR ACTIONS TOWARD AFRICA

AB031154 Lagos Domestic Service in English 0600 GMT 3 Aug 81

[Unattributed commentary]

[Text] During his last campaign for the Elysee Palace French President Francois Mitterrand gave the developing world a flurry of hope. Among other things the Socialist, as the presidential candidate, promised to increase French economic aid to the Third World. He also pledged to impress on his colleagues in the industrial West the need for a more equitable distribution of the world's wealth, which at the moment is unjustifiably concentrated in the hands of a few industrial nations.

In fact, at his inauguration last April President Mitterrand rightly observed that there could be no real international community as long as two-thirds of the planet must sacrifice their labor and goods against hunger and humiliation. On Africa, Mr Mitterrand stated his intention to relax French military presence on the continent. He was quoted as saying that he would favor the imposition of sanctions against apartheid South Africa. Although one realizes that the reactor program is one of the agreements inherited from his predecessor, the decision to execute the project is certainly a departure from the political and ideological path which the Socialist president pledged to uphold.

In fact, there are many people who cannot explain this action in any way other than that French economic interests was the motive behind the decision. But, in fact, we could say here that African leaders cannot but see continued mutual cooperation with the racist regime as a direct threat to the security of the continent.

One other factor which has attracted African concern is France's refusal to withdraw her troops currently stationed in some parts of Africa. The official argument is that the troops are there to maintain internal security and protect French citizens abroad. One would ask, however, whether it is only in Africa that French citizens reside outside their homeland. The only question people have often asked is whether or not military cohesion can ever bring the desired peace and stability. In fact, the whole issue of sovereignty always becomes [word indistinct] when the majority of many independent states are not allowed the means to shape the destiny of their countries by choosing their leaders through popular and democratic processes. Africa's problems are more related to the raising of the standard of living of the people, and this is why France has to make some impact by way of cooperation with our African countries for the execution of viable economic projects.

By stationing troops in Africa while at the same time executing nuclear projects with the racists in South Africa amounts to double standards. [as heard] But all said and done, it may be premature to write an account of Franco-African relations of Mitterrand's era. This is because 3 months into a 7-year term of office can certainly not present a complete picture. One can only hope at this point that Francois Mitterrand will take another look at his previous pronouncements and channel the course of his country's foreign policy to reflect these stated objectives.

NEW KADUNA GOVERNOR BEGINS SETTING UP GOVERNMENT

Lagos DAILY TIMES in English 21 Jul 81 p 40

[Article by Kola Ojo]

[Text] This week, Governor Abba Rimi of Kaduna State will ask the House of Assembly to approve his list of names for commissionerships.

He is believed to have chosen 13 persons already, two short for the state's 15 ministries.

The list does not seem to include the names compiled by Governor Abba's predecessor, Alhaji Balarabe Musa, and rejected by legislators. Nor does it tell to which parties the nominees belong.

When Governor Abba took office, he promised that his cabinet would reflect all the five parties, although he mentioned no percentages for the participation.

The House of Assembly, which thrice threw out the former Governor's nominees, immediately promised to give the new Governor's administration a "maximum co-operation."

Meanwhile, the Kaduna State Capital Development Board (KCDB) has been dissolved and replaced with a new one.

Political observers believe this is a fulfillment of some agreements between the Legislature and the Executive, in their bid to promote (unity, peace, and cordial relationship" between them.

The Legislature had insisted on the reconstitution of government parastatals and boards.

The State's Deputy Governor, Alhaji Mu'azu Aliyu Ahmed, will take the oath of office today at a ceremony taking place at the Murtala Square, Kaduna.

[Text] The Lagos State Police Command has announced the promotion of 345 junior officers.

In a statement in Lagos over the weekend, the police public relations officer, Mr A.J.E. Umoffia, said that the promotions made within the first six months of this year were meant to serve "as incentives to motivate policemen of other ranks."

Two hundred constables, 116 Corporals, and 29 Sergeants benefitted from the promotion exercise.

Mr Umoffia pointed out that the promotions were in recognition of increased police success in containing the wave of crime in the state and particularly in the Lagos metropolis.

The Police Public Relations Officer attributed the success of Police operations to the discovery of the tactics and the hideouts of criminals and noted: "the notorious and dangerous ones are on the run."

However, during the same period, 16 policemen died on active duty; 10 retired from the service, two resigned, while 42 were dismissed, Mr Umoffia added.

EXPULSION OF IGBO STUDENTS IN RIVERS CONDEMNED

Enugu WEEKLY STAR in English 12 Jul 81 p 24

[Text] The Anambra State Students' Association, University of Ife, Ile-Ife, has described as a callous act capable of generating disunity in the minds of Nigerians, the recent expulsion of over 240 students of Anambra and Imo State Origin by the Rivers State Government from all its state-owned institutions of learning.

In a statement signed by the president of the association, Mr Goddy Onwughalu, the association observed that the Rivers State Government, by that action, was laying a dynamite of disunity in the minds of young Nigerians. This, it said, may trigger off some cataclysm that may destroy the much-talked-about national unity which elder statesmen and the younger politicians are trying to preserve.

The association wondered whether the basis of that unity still exists in a country where a citizen cannot pursue education in the Rivers State merely because he happens to be Igbo.

It warned the Rivers State Government that the extension of unhealthy, political persecution to its educational arena by victimising innocent Nigerians, on account of their state of origin could affect their own youths in the near future.

The association recalled that the Rivers State Government, in a most inhuman way, stripped the Igbos of their properties under the pretext that the properties were abandoned in the Rivers State.

The association said there was no need to look at a distance for enemies of Nigerian unity when they exist right here at home.

It appealed to the Anambra State Government under the able leadership of Governor Jim Nwobodo to save the expelled students from frustration by ensuring that they are reabsorbed in appropriate institutions so that they can take their sessional examinations when due.

The Rivers State Government has since explained that the students were suspended, not expelled, following an allegation of irregularity in their admission. It said an investigation was going on and that those found innocent would be recalled. It further said that they would be allowed to take their examinations even while in suspension.

DEVELOPMENT SAID AIMED AT MAKING RURAL AREAS ATTRACTIVE

Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 20 Jul 81 p 9

[Text]

GOVERNOR Solomon Daushep Lar of Plateau State has said that integrated rural development has to do with the ability to harness all the available human and natural resources to make the rural areas as attractive as the urban areas.

This was contained in the governor's address read on his behalf by the state's Commissioner for Establishments, Alhaji Yakubu Hussaini, during the opening ceremony of a four-day Workshop on Integrated Rural Development, organised by the Nigerian National Commission for UNESCO, in Jos.

Governor Lar explained that this will raise the quality of life in the rural areas and create a social system founded on the principles of equality, freedom and social justice.

He said that his government has always aimed at achieving such objectives, taken into cognisance the fact that majority of our people live in the rural areas.

The governor told the participants that his administration has been committed to encouraging effectively co-ordinated community development programmes, through self-help projects and the provision of basic essential amenities, such as educational, health, water, electricity and good roads to the rural areas.

Another aspect of development, which has been the corner-stone of his administration, the governor, went on, was agricultural development or transformation.

Governor Lar said that apart from basing development on the 48 constituencies to the state's House of Assembly, his government undertook the exercise of creating more local governments, not only to bring the government nearer to the people, but also to raise their standard of living, aimed at checking the problem of rural/urban migration.

The governor who commended the commission for organising the workshop, said the problem facing developing countries in the world, was rural integration and urged them to find solution to it.

Governor Lar explained that this was because the Third World countries, which Nigeria is a member, are generally characterised by their backwardness in their social, educational and economic development, particularly in the rural areas.

SETTLEMENTS SUBMERGED AS DAM DISPLACES 20,000

Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 14 Jul 81 pp 1, 25

[Article by Ab Tapido]

[Text]

MOST of the neighbouring settlements at the site of the multi-million Naira Kiri Dam in Guyuk, Gongola State have been submerged following a recent downpour in the area and other places along River Gongola.

The settlements completely submerged are Dackwaga, Chindiwet and Bowaskara. Others partially submerged include Tallum, Kiri, Gundo, Lukumna, Bobbere and Jumbul. About 6,000 people have been temporarily displaced while a total of 20,000 people will be displaced in the dam area.

Although, the displaced persons have been warned by the committee of the possibility of the area being submerged it is feared that they have lost some few household properties and other valuable items during their movement to the temporary resettlement site.

Investigation showed that most of the displaced persons on the left and right banks of River Gongola have erected temporary structures at the new resettlement site.

The project managers of the construction company, NECCO, working on the Kiri Dam were said to have travelled to Lagos for reasons not unconnected with the project.

Some of the engineers interviewed at the site observed that all the neighbouring villages would be submerged by the end of this month or early next month when the volume of water in the dam would have attained its peak.

The engineers explained that the present volume of water in the dam was approximately 162 million cubic metres and when it increased to 170 million cubic metres it will subsequently overflow and the present settlement of the people will be threatened, unless they are able to move to the new resettlement site within the next few days."

They also stated that the gates of the main and secondary channels, main drains and sluice gates have not been closed down "that is why some areas have not been completely submerged as at now."

The pace of construction work at four newly acquired sites at Kiri, Shelleng, Banjiram and Purokayo was not very impressive as at last weekend.

Contract for the construction of the new site was awarded to Songhai Construction Company Limited at the cost of 3,975,447 Naira early this year.

Lagos BUSINESS TIMES in English 20 Jul 81 p 1

[Text] Oil production fell to 1.293 million barrels a day and exports to 1.069 million barrels daily during May. Both were 10-year lows.

According to statistics prepared by the Oil Producers' Trade Section of the Lagos Chamber of Commerce and Industry, May production was down 39.6 percent when compared with May 1980, while exports decreased by 49.5 percent.

All the producing companies made cuts in the month. But the biggest and most significant was made by Shell/NNPC. The company which usually accounts for about 56 percent of total production, produced at the rate of 572,794 barrels per day--down 54.2 percent on the May 1980 level.

Cuts by the other main producers were more modest, with Gulf/NNPC down 24.4 percent to 267,466 barrels per day, Mobil/NNPC down 14.2 percent, to 177,153 barrel per day and Agip/Phillips/NNPC down 12.8 percent to 154,307 barrels a day.

Delivering to the local refineries remained as low as it had been in April, at 123,998 barrel a day. Total domestic refinery capacity is 260,000 barrels daily, but actual throughput has rarely been near that level because of problems at one refinery or the other at various times.

NNPC REPORTED STARTING ON PETRO-CHEMICAL INDUSTRY

Lagos BUSINESS TIMES in English 13 Jul 81, p 32

[Article by Odafe Othihiwa and Henry Atenaga]

[Text] The Nigerian National Petroleum Corporation (NNPC) has embarked on a three phase development of the Nigerian Petro-chemical industry.

This was disclosed by a team of NNPC experts during a visit to the Daily Times at Ikeja.

Under the programme phase one will involve the production of detergents and solvents from the Kaduna refinery.

The Warri refinery will produce polypropylene and carbon black.

The polypropylene is used for plastics and heavy duty fibres while carbon black is used for tyres and printing ink.

The phase two of the programme which is expected to commence next month will involve mostly chemicals.

According to the NNPC officials, by the time the third phase is concluded in 1990, the 12 of the 3,000 basic petro-chemical products would have been developed.

According to the General Manager, Project and Engineering Division Mr. Kufeji, this would mean a bonanza for Nigeria entrepreneurs.

The officials also disclosed that the NNPC was capable of sustaining Nigeria oil production should the foreign oil companies decide to "pack up" exploration of exploitation.

He said as of now, all the foreign companies put together produce only one third of Nigeria's Total Oil production.

He disclosed that the NNPC was engaged in the moment in prospecting for oil in the Benue through, the Bida Basin and the Lak Chad area.

A ₦60m petroleum research centre is to be built by the NNPC at Port Harcourt within the next five years.

According to Dr. E. C. Ibe, the head of NNPC's Research and Development department in an interview with the Corporation's house quarterly NAPETCOR, the proposed centre will be used for more sophisticated research.

Work had started on this laboratory in 1979 but it could not become operational till this year because of late arrival of equipment.

Established as a one-man outfit in 1979, NNPC's R. and D. department has grown in stature over the years and now employs about 41 people: half senior staff.

It has two major units viz the petroleum engineering and processing units. The first of the two is concerned with structural engineering research for the oil industry and is currently testing a multi-dimensional three-phase all purpose black oil reservoir.

DISAGREEMENT REPORTED OVER NNPC DEAL

Lagos DAILY TIMES in English 16 Jul 81 p 1

[Text]

TWO Federal Government institutions have disagreed over what was believed to be a deal involving N24 million—about 36,500,000 US dollars.

They are the Central Bank of Nigeria, Lagos and the Nigerian National Petroleum Corporation (NNPC).

The deal was alleged to involve some top management staff of the corporation.

Dependable sources revealed in Lagos yesterday that the entire affair blew open when the corporation applied to the Central Bank of Nigeria, Lagos, for the opening of a fresh letter of credit last month.

Earlier, the sources pointed out, the NNPC had applied for the opening of a letter of credit to the bank to the tune of N166 million.

It was gathered that the initial application was to enable the corporation effect payment for equipment it intended to buy from an Italian company known as "Snamprogretti of Italy"

But soon after the bank began action on the application, the NNPC put up a second application asking it to increase the value by N24 million.

Officials of the bank became suspicious when it was discovered that the application was made in "a most irregular manner".

Said one official: "We could not help but tell the NNPC management that the application they made on Form "D" was wrong since Form "D" is not used for the purpose of opening a letter of credit, but Form "M".

When the bank's reply got to the NNPC management, it was discovered that all procedures for contracts and purchases had been violated.

It was gathered that the bank's reply raised eyebrows in the Finance Department of the NNPC, which had previously advised the management against incurring the additional expenditure.

NPA, NNPC DISAGREED ON OIL JETTY

Lagos DAILY TIMES in English 20 Jul 81 p 48

[Text] The refusal of the Nigerian Ports Authority (NPA) to allow oil vessels to berth at the Calabar Wharf is delaying the building of an oil jetty in the Cross River State.

For three years now, the NNPC had been begging the NPA in vain to allow it to put up a tanker jetty (where oil tankers would anchor) and a booster station (from where oil could be pumped into the storage tanks) at the Calabar Port Complex.

But the NPA refused, saying that fuel was a "dangerous cargo."

Because of this, the NNPC engineers have chosen to build the jetty and booster station on parcels of land very far away from the fuel depot.

The tug-of-war between the NPA and the NNPC was revealed to a team of newsmen on a nation-wide tour of oil installations by Mr John Emordi, an NNPC engineer.

Mr Emordi disclosed that the building of the jetty and booster station on the parcels of land now being considered would hike the overhead cost from N3.4 million to about N6.5 million.

He also said the work might not be completed until 1983 because the areas chosen were marshy and had to be sand-filled and left to "settle."

And the finishing of work in 1983, he said, depended very much on getting permission from the state's Ministry of Land and Housing.

Mr Emordi disclosed that for a long time now, the NNPC had been exchanging correspondence with the ministry on the use of the alternative location without getting a reply.

SOKOTO STATE BUYS 100,000 BAGS OF THAILAND RICE

Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 17 Jul 81 p 13

[Article by Ibrahim N. Salihu]

[Text]

THE Sokoto State Supply Company (SOSCO) has purchased another consignment of 100,000 bags (5,000 tonnes) of Thailand rice in the bid to beat down scarcity of the commodity in the open market and maintain a manageable price for it.

Disclosing this to the New Nigerian in his office yesterday, the General Manager of the company, Alhaji Ibrahim Adua said they had already received an initial 6,000 bags, while 60 trucks were in transit to Sokoto.

He said because of the importance the state government attach[illegible] the local population, it had revised the previous allocation formula to favour them most. He said 75,000 bags or 75 per cent of this allocation would go to the local governments, 15,000 bags or 15 per cent to the co-operatives and 10,000 bags or 10 per cent to the SOSCO.

Alhaji Ibrahim Adua recalled that the previous formula allowed just 50 per cent to the local governments, 35 per cent to the co-operatives and 15 per cent to his company.

He said that the first consignment of American long grain was yet to be exhausted, because there was still outstanding 20,000 bags to be collected from Lagos due to transportation problems. He however said that arrangement for the collection had been finalised.

The General Manager assured that the commodity would continue to be supplied to the local governments gradually in order to ensure its adequate spread over a long period.

He explained that the price of the commodity was 85 kobo per measure (mudu) that is throughout the local government irrespective of the distance from the state headquarters. He said the local governments had been granted a two Naira margin by SOSCO which sells the rice at 32 Naira per bag to them. They would in turn realise 34 Naira per bag through the 85 kobo sale per measure system, which should enable them to offset any extra cost.

According to him, the state commissioners and advisers have been reporting successes over the operation which has been going on free of malpractices.

PRODUCTION at the Peugeot Automobile (Nig) Limited (PAN) Kaduna may soon be suspended as a result of a depleting stock of parts.

This is sequel to the two-week strike action by train drivers which has now paralysed the transportation of raw materials from Lagos ports to the factory.

As a result, the company has lost the production of 815 cars since the strike action began.

Speaking to the New Nigerian in his office yesterday, the Assistant General Manager (Admin), Alhaji Isa Ozi Salami disclosed that the company now produces less than 100 cars daily as against a target of 250.

He revealed that since the changing of the former system of air-freighting the parts from France to Kano Airport to the present shipping and rail system, the company has been experiencing inadequate supply of parts.

When the present system of transportation was introduced, the company was expected to have a daily supply of parts. But now, it receives only two supplies a week.

The result is that over 300 assembled cars of all brands which should have gone to the market, are now waiting to be fitted with essential parts like brakes, bumpers, steering, gear levers and dash-board covers which are not available.

During an inspection of the factory, our correspondents discovered that the depot for storage of parts was virtually empty.

Commenting on the prices of the company's products, the assistant general manager said that a Peugeot GL costs 8,105 Naira, the GR 6,000 Naira, while the 505 costs less than 11,000 Naira.

Meanwhile, a general notice was yesterday issued to the 4,000 workers at the factory not to report for work until Thursday when normal operations are expected to resume.

The notice, which was signed by the personnel manager, called for "understanding and co-operation from all workers during this difficult and trying period."

Contacted, the station manager of the Nigerian Railway Corporation, Kaduna refused to comment on the on-going strike action by train drivers.

BRIEFS

PARTY COALITION BREAKS DOWN--After only 21 months in power, the coalition government formed by the National Party (NP) of President Shehu Shagari and the [Nigerian] People's Party (NPP) broke down on Wednesday, 8 July. The breakdown of the Nigerian Government coalition came about when the NP, taking the NPP at its word, accepted the abrogation, "effective immediately," of the government agreement which linked the two formations since the return of civilian pwoer to Lagos on 1 October 1979. At the beginning of this week, the NPP leaders had announced their intention of putting an end, within a 6-month period, to the coalition. Accepting, without further delay, the implementation of the NPP decision, the National Party leaders write: "We expect that all the NPP ministers, the vice president of the Senate and the speaker of the House of Representatives will immediately resign." "Such is," they add, "the honorable way." [Text] [Paris LE CONTINENT in French 10-11 Jul 81 p 1] 9434

SOUTH AFRICA DENOUNCED--Writing on the latest development on Southern Africa, the DAILY TIMES condemns racist South Africa for its military occupation of Angolan territory. The paper sees the action as an attempt by the Pretoria Cabal to deny Angola the peace which is essential for progress, and a violation of its sovereignty and territorial integrity. It believes that under the present provocating circumstances, Angola may be compelled to seek foreign military assistance for the protection of her sovereignty. The TIME therefore calls on the United Nations and the Western alliance to keep the racists in check for the sake of world peace. COAL POWER STATIONS, MILLS--The Federal Government is to build a coal power station in Makurdi for the Ajaokuta Steel Mill. The power station will have a capacity of 600 mega watts. The chairman of the House of Representatives Committee on Mines and Power, Chief P. A. Gbunye, announced this in Makurdi last Thursday when the committee members paid a courtesy call on the Benue State Governor, Mr. Aper Aku. The chairman noted that the Federal Government attached great importance to the development of alternative energy to facilitate Nigeria's industrial take-off. Responding, Governor Aku pointed out that there were untapped natural resources including petroleum in his state. He called on the committee to ensure that the resources were tapped. He said that his government planned to go into partnership with foreign firms to utilise the by-products of the coal mills at Okaba and Orukpa. Also exchanging views with the committee members in his office, the Presidential Liaison Officer for Benue, retired Major Paul Dickson, disclosed that the Federal Government had intensified efforts to re-activate the Okaba and Orukpa Coal Mills. CALL FOR FEWER PARTIES--Former Steel Minister Paul Unongo has called for a reduction in the number of political parties. He also stressed the need for the PRP, NPP, GNPP--"and if possible the UPN--to contrive a functional and structural unity of approach" to resist what he described as NPN drive for a neo-fascist one-party state in Nigeria. Mr Unongo was speaking in Jos on the abrogation of the NPN/NPP accord. He also spoke of "an NPN strategy" which involved "a programmed disorganisation of other parties." He said this could only be effectively countered by using "a politically programmed centralised resistance, brought about by the unity of action on all parties opposed to one-party state." He said this form of unity would reduce the number of opposition parties and also "enhance a functional electoral cooperation in the entire opposition camp." POLICE COMMISSIONER REMOVAL REQUEST--A motion calling on the Federal Government to remove the Kano State Commissioner of Police, Alhaji Sanni Wali from the state capital until further notice, was yesterday passed at the Kano House of Assembly. The motion was moved by a member for Jakana constituency in the house, Alhaji Lawal Danbazau. Speaking on the motion, Alhaji Danbazau said that everybody was aware of the rampage which occurred in Kano on July 10, as a result of which lives were lost and private and public properties were damaged. He said that as a result of the sad occurrence, the Kano State Government set up a six-man tribunal to investigate the cause of the rampage. He said that it would be in the interest of justice, if the state commissioner of police was removed from Kano until the tribunal has completed its investigation. In his own contribution, the majority leader in the House, Alhaji Ammani Inuwa said that the call for the removal of the police commissioner and his assistant Alhaji Ibrahim Ahmed from Kano was in order. Their continued stay in Kano, he said, would scare away people who would wish to testify before the tribunal. The motion was later passed. [Text] [Lagos DAILY TIMES in English 20 Jul 81 p 23]

NEW INVESTMENT CODE BILL ADOPTED BY CABINET

Dakar LE SOLEIL in French 29 Jun 81 p 3

[Excerpts] After adopting the Sixth Economic and Social Plan, the members of our Assembly studied the draft legislation embodying an investment code. As Mr Joseph Mathiam, chairman of the commission, pointed out, this is the fourth time in 20 years that the National Assembly has been asked to vote on legislation embodying an investment code, contrary to certain African countries who have granted themselves similar legislation. According to the chairman it is a matter of bringing our practices and our legislation into conformance and of taking into account the development of the industrial fabric. In Mr Mathiam's opinion, it is better to change the texts each time it proves necessary than to maintain them only to violate or circumvent them.

The chief innovation in the draft code proposed to the members of the Assembly concerns the elimination of the advantages granted by Article 19 of the code in force and their replacement by a credit called a value-added credit. This value-added credit, stressed the chairman, is the greatest innovation of the draft code submitted to the Assembly. It involves deducting from the amount of tax on sales volume a credit said to be based on the value created by the enterprise. Under the former system, approved businesses could be exempted from import duties on shipments of raw materials. This was, commented Mr Mathiam, an incentive to import and it favored new businesses who were possibly competing with old ones. This article of the code was frequently criticized.
